Perkin was a Fleming by descent, though born in England; and it might, therefore, be doubted, whether he was included in the treaty between the two nations; but as he must dismiss all his English retainers, if he took shelter in the Low Countries, and as he was sure of a cold reception, if not bad usage, among people who were determined to keep on terms of friendship with the court of England, he fitted for some time, in the wilds and fastnesses of Ireland. Impatient, however, of retreat, which was both disagreeable and dangerous, he held consultations with his followers, Ferne, Selken, and Astley, three broken tradesmen; by these he was resolved to try the issue of Cornwall, whose mutinous disposition, notwithstanding the king's severity, still subsisted after the suppression of their rebellion. No sooner did he appear at Bodmin in Cornwall than the people, in a number of three thousand, flocked to his standard; and Perkin, elated with this appearance of success, took him, for the first time, the appellation of Richard IV., King of England. Not to say, for the expectations of his followers to languish, he presented himself before Exeter; and, by many fair promises, invited that city to join him. Finding that the inhabitants shut their gates against him, he laid siege to the place; but being unprovided with artillery, ammunition, and every thing requisite for the attempt, he made no progress in his undertaking. Messengers were sent to the king, informing him of this insurrection; the citizens of Exeter, meanwhile, were determined to hold out to the last extremity, in expectation of receiving succour from the well-known vigilance of that monarch.

When Henry was informed that Perkin was landed in England, he expressed great joy, and prepared himself with all the speed he could to overtake him, in his great length, to put a period to pretensions which had so long given him vexation and inquietude. All the courtiers, sensible that their activity on this occasion would be the more calculated to the best purpose which they could render the king, displayed their zeal for the enterprise, and forwarded his preparations. The Lords Daubeney and Broke, with Sir Rice ap-Thomas, hastened forward with a small body of troops to the relief of Exeter. The Earl of Devonshire, and the most considerable gentlemen in the county of that name, took arms of their own accord, and marched to join the king's generals. The Duke of Buckingham put himself at the head of a troop, consisting of young noblemen and gentry, who served as volunteers, and who longed for an opportunity of displaying their courage and their loyalty. The king himself prepared to follow with a considerable army; and thus all England seemed united against a prince, who had at first engaged their attention, and divided their affections.

Perkin, informed of these great preparations, immediately raised the siege of Exeter, and retired to Taunton. The king now summoned the number of over seven thousand, and seemed still resolved to maintain his cause, he himself depaired of success, and secretly withdrew to the sanctuary of Beaulieu, in the New Forest. The Cornish rebels submitted to the king's mercy, and found themselves not yet exhausted in their behalf. Ex-about that very time, that one Wilford, a cordwainer's son, encouraged by the surprising credit given to other impostures, had undertaken to personate the Earl of Warwick, with the consent of the said earl's wife and the head and solicitation of some of her relations. For which cause he was committed for the said crime, the desire of liberty must have been regarded as natural and innocent,) but of forming designs to disturb the government, and raise an insurrection among the people, who, seeing an unhappy prince, that had long been denied all the privileges of his high birth, even been cut off from the common benefits of nature, now at last de-admit of. He called the king, father, patron, protector; and, by his whole behaviour, expressed a strong desire of conciliating the friendship of England. The Duke of Orleans had appealed to the English council, by creating the appellation of Lewis XII. and having carried his arms into Italy, and subdued the duchy of Milan, his progress begat jealousy in Maximilian, Philip's father, as well as in his own father-in-law. By the council, therefore, of these monarchs, the young prince endeavoured by every art to acquire the acuity of Henry, whom they regarded as the chief counterpoise to the greatness of France. No particular plan, however, of alliance seems to have been formed between these two princes with a view to interview; all passed in general professions of affection and regard; at least in remote projects of a closer union, by the future intermarriages of their children, who were then in a state of infancy.

The Pope, too, Alexander VI. neglected not the friendship of a monarch, whose reputation was spread over Europe. He sent a nuncio into England, who exhorted the king to take part in the great alliance, projected for the recovery of the Holy Land, and to lead in person his forces against the infidels. The general frenzy for crusades was now entirely extinguished in Italy, but he still thought a necessary piece of decency to pretend zeal for those affairs. Henry regrets to the uncoo the distance of his situation, which rendered it inconvenient for him to expose his person in defence of the Christian cause. He promised to make use of all the means in his power to assist; on which the Pope should go alone to the holy wars, unaccompanied by any monarch, he even promised to overlook all other considerations, and to attend in person. He only required, as a necessary condition, that all differences should previously be adjusted among Christian princes, and that some sea-port towns in Italy should be consigned to him for his retreat and security. In so easy to conclude, that Henry had determined not to interested in the war against the Turk: but as a great name, without any real assistance, is sometimes of service, the Knights of Rhodes, who were at this time esteemed the bulwark of Christendom, chose the king protector of their order. But the prince, whose alliance Henry valued the most, was Ferdinand of Aragon, whose vigorous and steady policy, always attended with success, had rendered him as many respects the most considerable monarch in Europe. There was also a remarkable similarity of character between these two princes: both were full of craft, intrigue, and design; and though a resemblance of this nature the absolute dread of confidence and anxiety, where the interests of the one were so nearly connected with all parties, such was the situation of Henry and Ferdinand, that no jealousy ever on any occasion arose between them. The king had now the satisfaction of completing a marriage, which had been projected and negotiated during the course of seven years, between Arthur, Prince of Wales, and the Infanta, Catherine, fourth daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella; he near sixteen years of age, the eighteen. But this marriage proved in the issue unpromising. The young prince a few months after sickened and died, much regretted by the nation. Henry, desirous to continue his alliance with Spain and, also unwilling to restore Catherine's dowry, which was two hundred thousand ducats, obliged his second son Henry, whom he created Prince of Wales, to be contracted to the infant. The prince made all the opposition of which a youth of twelve years of age was capable; but as the king persisted in his resolution, the espousals were at length, by means of the Pope's dispensation, contracted between the parties: an event which drew onwards attended with the most important consequences.

The same year another marriage was celebrated, which was also, in the next age, productive of great events: the marriage of Margaret, the King's eldest daughter, with James King of Scotland. This alliance had been negotiated during three years, though interrupted by several broils; and Henry hoped, from the completion of it, to remove all source of discord with that neighbouring kingdom, by whose animosity England had so often been the indifferent, and was by the influence of France, created and fortified. The English council, some objected that England might, by means of that alliance, fall under the dominion of Scotland. "No," replied Henry, "Scotland in that event will only become an accessary to England." Among these prosperous incidents the king met with a 4th Feb. domestic calamity which made not such impression on him as it merited: his queen died in childbed; and the infant did not long survive her. This blow, however, did not deter the king from the general affection for her increased, on account of the harsh treatment which it was thought she met with from her consort.

The situation of the king's affairs, both at home and abroad, was now in every respect very fortunate. All the efforts of the European princes, both in war and negociation, were turned to the side of Italy; and the various events which arose made Henry's alliance be courted by every party, yet interested him so little as never to touch him with concern or anxiety. His close connexions with Spain and Scotland insured his tranquillity; and his continued successes over domestic enemies, owing to the prudence and abilities of his favourite mercenaries, ensured him entire submission and obedience. sible or impossible to be executed. The sole end of the king and his ministers was to amass money, and bring every one under the lash of their authority. Through the prevalence of such an arbitrary and iniquitous system, the nation, that might safely be affirmed, were considerable losers by their ancient privileges, which secured them from all taxes, except such as were imposed by their own consent in parliament. Had the king been empowered to levy general taxes at pleasure, and without the advice or consent of his subjects, he might have absolved himself from these oppressive expedients, which destroyed all security in private property, and begat an universal distress throughout the nation. In vain did the people look for protection from the court, but the law was at that time a thing so uncertain and precarious as had been adopted during this reign. That assembly was so over\-awed, that at this very time, during the greatest rage of his oppressions, the parliament, meeting in the house of commons, chose Dudley their speaker, the very man who was the chief instrument of his iniquities. And though the king was known to be immensely opulent, and had no pretence of wars or expensive enterprises of any kind, they granted him the subsidy which he demanded.

A. D. 1505. That year he levied a new benevolence, and renewed that arbitrary and oppressive method of taxation. By all these arts of accumulation, joined to a rigid frugality, and a more than opulent state, the parliament was enabled to fill the treasury, and to leave an annual revenue of 1,800,000 pounds; a treasure almost incredible, if we consider the scarcity of money in those times. Being himself by the spoils of his oppressed people, there happened an event abroad which engaged his attention, and was even the object of his anxiety and concern. Isabella, Queen of Castile, died about this time: and it was foreseen, that by this accident the fortunes of Ferdinand, her husband, would be much affected. The king was not only attentive to the fate of his ally, and watchful lest the general system of Europe should be affected by so important an event: he also considered the similarity of his own situation with that of Ferdinand, and regarded the issue of these transactions as a precedent for himself. Joan, the daughter of Ferdinand, by Isabella, was married to the Archduke Philip, and being, in right of her mother, heir of Castile, seemed entitled to dispute with Ferdinand the present possession of that kingdom. Henry knew, that, notwithstanding his own pretensions by the house of Lancaster, the greater part of the nation was convinced of the superiority of his wife's title; and he dreaded lest the Prince of Wales, who was daily advancing towards manhood, might be tempted by ambition to lay immediate claim to the crown. By his perpetual attention to depress the pretensions of the Yorkists, and to deprive the House of Lancaster of all hope, he increased their desire of shaking off that yoke under which they had so long laboured, and of taking every advantage which his oppressive government should give his enemies against him. And as he possessed no independent force, like Ferdinand, and governed a kingdom more turbulent and unruly, which he himself, by his narrow policies, had confirmed in factious prejudices; he apprehended that his situation would prove in the issue still more precarious.

Nothing at first could turn out more contrary to the king's wishes than the transactions in Spain. Ferdinand, as his heir, was a rival of the suzerain of the Low countries from a like cause, his former exactions and impositions; and the states of Castile discovered an evident resolution of preferring the title of Philip and Joan. In order to take advantage of these favourable dispositions, the archduke, now King of Castile, attended by his consort, embarked for Spain during the winter season; but meeting with a violent tempest in the channel, was obliged to take shelter in the harbour of W wymouth. Asserting his right to the succession of his wife as King of Castile, he ordered the coast of Dorset, hearing of a fleet upon the coast, had assembled some forces, and being joined by Sir John Cary, who was also at the head of an armed body, he came to that town. Finding that Philip, in order to relieve his sickness and fatigue, was already come ashore, he invited him to his house; and immediately despatched a letter to Ferdinand, informing him of his important incident. The king sent in all haste the Earl of Arundel to compliment Philip on his arrival in England, and to inform him, that he intended to pay him a visit in person, and to give him a suitable reception in his dominions. Philip knew that he could not now descend without the king's consent; and therefore, for the sake of despatch, he resolved to anticipate his visit, and to have an interview with him at Windsor. Henry received him with much parade and ceremony, and took an instance to have him retain his recordal; but he resolved, notwithstanding, to draw some advantage from this involuntary visit paid him by his royal guest.

Edmond de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, nephew to Edward IV., and brother to the Earl of Lincoln, slain in the battle of Stoke, had some years before killed a man in a sudden fit of passion, and had been obliged to apply to the king for a remission of the crime. The king had granted his request; but being little indulgent to all persons connected with the house of York, he obliged him to appear openly in court and plead his pardon. Suffolk, more resenting the imputation of the passion, than of his hazard, came to him, and taken shelter with his aunt, the Duchess of Burgundy: but being promised forgiveness by the king, he returned to England; and obtained a new pardon. Actuated, however, by the natural temper of his temper, and beset by debts which he had contracted by his great expense at Prince Arthur's wedding, he again made an elopement into Flanders. The king, well acquainted with the general discontent which prevailed against his administration, neglected not this incident, which might become of importance; and he employed his usual artifices to elude the efforts of his enemies. He directed Sir Robert Curson, governor of the castle of Hammes, to desert his charge, and to instruct the aforesaid Edward, Earl of Suffolk, by making him a tender of his services. Upon information secretly conveyed by Curson, the king seized William Courteney, eldest son to the Earl of Devonshire, and married to the Lady Catherine, sister of the queen; William de la Pole, brother to the Earl of Suffolk; Sir James Tyrrel, and Sir James Windham, with some persons of inferior quality; and committed them to custody. Lord Alverstone, and Sir Thomas Green, were apprehended; but were soon after released from their confinement. William de la Pole was long detained in prison; Courteney was attainted, and though not executed, he recovered not his liberty during the king's life-time. But Henry's crafty subtleties could not restore Wintour, and Sir James Tyrrel, who were brought to their trial, condemned, and executed: the fate of the latter gave general satisfaction, on account of his participation in the murder of the young princes, sons of Edward IV. Notwithstanding these discoveries and executions, Curson was still able to maintain his credit with the Earl of Suffolk: Henry, in order to remove all suspicion, had ordered him to be excommunicated, together with Suffolk himself, for his pretended rebellion. But after that traitor had performed all the services expected from him, he suddenly deserted the earl, and came over to England, where the king received him with much favour and distinction. Suffolk, astonished at this instance of perfidy, finding that even the Duchess of Burgundy, tired with so many fruitless attempts, had become indifferent to his cause, fled secretly into France, thence into Germany, and returned at last, into the Low Countries; where he was protected, though not encomanenced, by Philip, then in close alliance with the king.

Henry neglected not the present opportunity of complaining to his own house, and the princes of the blood, what many conspiracies have become above their force, by the increase of gold and silver in Europe. And what is a circumstance of still greater weight, all other states were then very poor in comparison of what they are at present. Their treasure made their treasure appear very great; and may lead us to conserve the apprehensions of his government.
set you far above apprehensions from any person of so little consequence: but, to give you satisfaction, I shall banish you from my state. " I expect that you will carry your complaisance further," said the king; "I desire to have Suffolk put in my place, without asking for my submission and obedience." " That measure," said Philip, "will reflect dishonour upon you as well as myself. You will be thought to have treated me as a prisoner." "Theo-

the last was at an end," replied the king, "for I will not have that dishonour upon me; and so your honour is saved." The King of Castle found himself under a necessity of complying; but he first exacted Henry's promise that he would not proceed to the Tower; and the King of Castle, having fully satisfied Henry, as well by this concession, as by signing a treaty of commerce between England and Castle, which was advantageous to the former kingdom, was at last allowed to depart, after a stay of three months. He landed in Spain, was joyfully received by his subjects, and put in possession of his throne. He died soon after; and Joan, his widow, falling into deep melancholy, Ferdinand was again enabled to reinstate himself in authority, and to reign till the day of his death the whole Spanish monarchy.

The kingdom survived these transactions two years; but nothing memorable occurs in the remaining part of his reign. He was actuated by his second daughter, Mary, to the young Archduke, Charles, son of Philip of Castle. He entertained also some intentions of marriage for himself, first with the Queen-dowager of Napier, but afterwards with the Duchess-dowager of Savoy, daughter of Maximilian, and sister of Philip. But the decline of his health put an end to all such thoughts; and he began to cast his eyes towards the future existence, which the misfortunes and sufferings of his reign rendered a very dismal prospect to him. To allay the terrors under which he laboured, he endeavoured, by distributing alms and foundering relics, to make atonement for his crimes, and to purchase, by the sacrifice of part of his ill-gotten treasures, a reconciliation with his offended Maker. Renorse even seized him, at intervals, for the abuse of his authority by Empson and Dudley; but not sufficient to make him stop the repugnance of those oppressors. Sir William Capel was again fined two thousand pounds, under some frivolous pretence, and was committed to the Tower for daring to murmur against the king. His son, an alderman, was suspected, and died of vexation before his trial came to an issue. Sir Laurence Almer, who had been mayor, and his two sheriffs, were condemned in heavy fines, and sent to prison till they made payment. The king gave countenance to all these oppressions; till death, by its nearer approaches, impressed new terrors upon him; and he then ordered, by a general clause in his will, that restitution should be made to all those whom he had injured. He died of a consumption, at his favourite palace of Richmond, after a reign of twenty-three years and eight months, and in the fifty-second year of his age.

The reign of Henry VII. was, in the main character, man, fortunate for his people at home, and honourable abroad. He put an end to the civil wars with which the state had long been harassed, he maintained peace and order in the state, he depressed the former exorbitant power of the nobility, and, together with the friendship of some foreign princes, he acquired the consideration and regard of all. He loved peace without fear, and he never agitated with contempt his servants and ministers, he discovered no timidity, either in the conduct of his affairs, or in the day of battle; and though often severe in his punishments, he was commonly less actuated by revenge than by maxims of policy. The services which he rendered the people were derived from his views of private advantage, rather than the motives of public good; and every one he devoted to interested regards, it was unknown to himself, and ever from the malignant prejudices of faction, or the mean projects of avarice; not from the sallies of passion, or allurements of plunder. He was determined to found a lasting kingdom of peace and generosity. His capacity was excellent, but somewhat contracted by the narrowness of his heart; he possessed inattention and address, but never employed those talents to found a kingdom, or to give the people an empire, to be gained; and while he neglected to conciliate the affections of his people, he often felt the danger of resting his authority on their fear and reverence alone. He was always extremely attentive to affairs; he possessed not the faculty of seeing far into futurity, and was more expert at providing a remedy for his mistakes, than judicious in avoiding them. Avarice was, on the whole, his ruling passion; and he remained an instance, almost singular, of men placed in a high state and possessed of talents for great affairs, in whom that passion predominated above ambition. Even among private persons, avarice is commonly nothing but a species of ambition, and is only supported by the possession of distinction, and consideration, which attend on riches.

The power of the kings of England had always been somewhat irregular or discretionary; but was scarcely ever so much limited by the crown than in the establishment of the great charter, as during that of Henry. Besides the advantages derived from the personal character of the man, full of vigour, industry, and severity, delivered to the crown in all its projects, something was attended with caution as well as good fortune in every enterprise; he came to the throne after long and bloody civil wars, which had destroyed all the great nobility, who alone could have formed opposition, and after all the people were tired with discord and intestine convulsions, and willing to submit to usurpations, and even to injuries, rather than plunge themselves anew into miseries; the fruitless efforts against him were always, as is usual, to confirm his authority; as he ruled by a faction, and the lesser faction, all those on whom he conferred offices, sensible that they owed every thing to his protection, were willing to support his power, though at the sacrifice of their interest and of that of the state. He seem the chief causes, which at this time bestowed on the crown so considerable an addition of prerogative, and rendered the present reign a kind of epoch in the English constitution.

This prince, though he exalted his prerogative above law, is celebrated by his historian for many good laws, which he made to be enacted for the government of his subjects. Several considerable regulations, indeed, are found among the statutes of this reign, both with regard to the police of the kingdom, and its commerce; but the former are generally continued with much better judgment than the latter. The more ample ideas of order and equity are sufficient to guide a legislator in every thing that regards the internal administration of justice: but the principles of commerce are much more complicated, and require long experience and deep reflection to be well understood in any state. The real consequence of a law or practice, is there often contrary to first appearances. No wonder that during the reign of Henry VII. these matters were frequently mistaken; and it may safely be affirmed, that even in the time of Lord Chancellor, very imperfect and erroneous ideas were formed on that subject.

Early in Henry's reign, the authority of the Star-chamber, which was before founded on crown law and ancient practice, was, in some cases, confirmed by act of parliament. Lord Bacon extols the utility of this court; but men began, even during the age of that historian, to feel that some arbitrary jurisdiction was incompatible with liberty; and in proportion as the spirit of independence still rose higher in the nation, the aversion to a monarch who till then it was entirely abolished by act of parliament in the reign of Charles I., a little before the commencement of the civil wars.

This reign passed in this reign, ordaining the king's suit for mercy to be carried on within a year and a day. 1 Formerly, it did not usually commence till after; and as the friends of the murdered, often, in the interval, composed matters with the criminal, the crime frequently escaped with little punishment, and the person paid as poor in form as pauper, as it is called; that, without paying dues for the writs, or any fees to the council, was a good law at all times, especially in that age, when the peace, revenues, and customs, and even by judgment, for a law difficult to be carried into execution. A law was made against carrying off any woman by force. 2 The benefit of clergy was abolished 3 and the criminal, on the first offense, was to be burned in the hand, with a letter denoting his crime; after which he was punished capitally for any new offense. Sheriffs were no longer allowed to fine any person, without previously summoning him to appear to in any court. In such practice should ever have prevailed. Attain'd of attains was granted in cases which exceeded forty pounds value 4 a law which has an appearance of equity, but which was afterwards found inconvenient. Actions popular were no longer allowed to be ordered or supposed necessary, in the sense of the king's conspired against the life of the steward, treasurer, or comptroller of the king's household, this design, though not followed by any overt act, was made liable to the forfeiture of felony for murder. This was enacted for the security of Archbishop Morton, who found himself exposed to the enmity of great numbers.

There rarely passed any session during this reign without the business of punishment being violently agitated in them, or in badges or penalties; 6 a practice by which they were, in a manner, enlisted under some great lord, and were kept in readiness to assist him in all wars, insurrections, riots, violence, and even in his vengeance for him; or to courts of justice. 7 This disorder, which had prevailed during many reigns, when the law could give little pretence to the subject, was then deeply rooted in England; and it required all the vigilance and rigour of Henry to extirpate it. There is a story of his severity against this abuse, and it seems to merit praise, though it is commonly cited as an instance of his avarice and rapacity. The Earl of Oxford, his favourite general, in whom he always placed great and deserved confidence, leaving splendidly appointed tables at his table, and more than his fortune was too narrow for such magnificence. They are, most of them, subjoined he, "my retainers, who are come to do me service at this time, when they know I am honoured with your majesty's presence." The king started a little, and said, "By my faith, my lord, I thank you for your good cheer, but I must not allow my laws to be broken in my sight. My attorney must speak with you." And he expressed a just displeasure, pleased to call luxury, that as much as an industrious tradesman is both a better man and a better citizen than of those idle retainers, who formerly depended on the great families; so more than a nobleman more laudable than that of an ancient baron. 8 was enacted during the reign of Henry, was that by which the nobility and gentry acquired a power of breaking the ancient entail, and of alienating their estates. By means of this law, joined to the beginning luxury and refinement of the age, the great fortunes of the barons were gradually dissipated, and the property of the commons increased in England. It is probable that Henry foresaw and intended this consequence; because the constant scheme of his administration was to depress the great, and exalt the churchmen, lawyers, and men of new families, who were more dependent on him. The King’s love of money naturally led him to encourage commerce, which he had curtailed; but if we may judge by most of the laws enacted during his reign, trade and industry were rather hurt than promoted by the care and attention given to them. Severe laws were made against taking interest for money, which was then denounced as usury. Even the profits of exchange were prohibited as soavouring of usury, which the superstition of the age zealously proscribed. All evasive contracts, by which profits could be made: from the loan of money, were also carefully guarded against. It is needless to observe how unreasonable and unjust these laws, how impossible to be executed, and bow hurtful to trade, if they could take place. We may observe, however, to the praise of the people, that in many instances, in order to promote commerce, he lent to merchants sums of money without interest, when he knew that their stock was not sufficient for those enterprises which they had in view.

In the same reign against the exportation of money, plate, or bullion: a precaution, which serves to no other purpose than to make more be exported. But so far was the anxiety on this head carried, that merchants alien, who imported commodities into the kingdom, were obliged to invest in English commodities all the money acquired by their sales, in order to prevent their conveying it away in a clandestine manner.

It was prohibited to export horses; as if that exportation endangered the breed. To make them more plentiful in the kingdom. In order to promote artichoke, no bowes were to be sold at a higher price than six shillings and four pence, reducing money to the denominator of our time. The only effect of this regulation must be, either that the people would be supplied with bad bowes, or none at all. Prices were also affixed to woollen cloth, to caps and hats: and the wages of labourers were regulated by law. It is evident that these matters ought all to have been left to the discretion of the persons conducting the course of business and commerce. To some, it may appear surprising, that the price of a yard of scarlet cloth should be limited to six-and-twenty shillings, money of our time, which is almost the same price as at present, and is not much inferior to the present wages given in some parts of England. Labour and commodities have certainly risen since the discovery of the West Indies; but not so much in every particular, as is generally imagined. The greater industry of the present times has increased the number of tradesmen and labourers, so as to keep wages nearer a par than could be expected from the great increase of gold and silver. And the additional art employed in the finer manufactures, has even made some of these commodities fall below their former value.

To mention that merchants and dealers, being con- tented with less profit than formerly, afforded the goods cheaper to their customers. It appears by a statute of this reign, that goods bought for sixteen pence would sometimes be sold for ten, and the profit thereby made.

The commodities, whose price has chiefly risen, are butchers’ meat, fowl, and fish, (especially the latter,) which cannot be much augmented in quantity by the increase of art and industry in the country. The profession of these was extending its boundaries, and was sometimes embraced by persons of the lowest rank, was the church: by a clause of a statute, all clerks or students of the university were forbidden to beg, without a permission from the vice-chancellor. The great cause of the low state of industry during this period, was the restraints put upon it; and the parliament, or rather the king, (for he was the prime mover in every thing,) enlarged a little some of these limitations, but not to the degree that was requisite. A law had been enacted during the reign of Henry IV. that no man could bind his son or daughter to an apprenticeship, unless he were possessed of twenty shillings a-year in land; and Henry V.

The profession of inamorata was then beginning, and the wages of these were increased, and were obtained by numerous numbers, if in Norwich from the want of hands, exempted that city from the penalties of the law. Afterwards, the whole county of Norfolk obtained a like exemption with regard to some of the arts of the woolen manufacture, and a few other limitations proceeded from a desire of promoting husbandry, which, however, is never more effectually encouraged than by the increase of manufacturers. For a like reason, the law enacted against enclosures, and for the keeping up of common-land, which were very high prizes bestowed on it by Lord Bacon. If husbandmen understand agriculture, and have a ready vent for their commodities, we need not dread a diminution of the people employed in the arts of the country. All that is wanting is supporting populosity, except by the interest of the proprietors, are violent and ineffectual. During a century and a half after this period, there was a frequent renewal of laws and edicts against the enclosure of land which we may infer that none of them were ever executed. The natural course of improvement at last provided a remedy.

One check to industry in England was the erecting of corporations; an abuse which is not yet entirely corrected. A law was enacted in 1662 that all corporation by any by-laws without the consent of three of the chief officers of state. They were prohibited from imposing tolls at their gates. The cities of Gloucester and Worcester had even imposed prohibitions to the entrance of any strangers to these towns. There is a law of this reign, containing a preamble, by which it appears, that the company of merchant adventurers in London had, by their own authority, debared all the other merchants of the kingdom from trading to the great marts in the Low Countries, unless each trader previously paid them the sum of near seventy pounds. It is surprising that such a by-law (if it deserve the name) could even be carried into execution, and that the authority of parliament should be requisite to altogether it.
It was during this reign, on the second of August 1492, a little before sun-set, that Christopher Columbus, a Genoese, set out from Spain on his memorable voyage for the discovery of the New World, and a few years after, Vasquez de Gamá, a Portuguese, passed the Cape of Good Hope, and opened a new passage to the East Indies. These great events were attended with important consequences, by publishing, giving new impetus to the arts and sciences, and to those industries which were wintering in obscurity, and not immediately concerned in those naval enterprises. The enlargement of commerce and navigation increased industry and the arts everywhere: the nobles dissipated their race, and the ordinary men, of whatever rank both acquired a share in the landed property, and created to themselves a considerable property of a new kind, in stock, commodities, art, credit, and correspondence. In some nations, the privileges of the commons increased by this increase of property: in most nations, the kings, finding arms to be dropped by the barons, who could no longer endure their former rude manner of life, established standing armies, and subdued the liberties of other kingdoms; but in all places, the condition of the people, from the depression of the petty tyrants by whom they had formerly been oppressed rather than governed, received great improvement; and they acquired, if not entire liberty, at least the most considerable advantages of it. And as the general course of events thus tended to depress the nobles and exalt the people, Henry VII., who also embraced that system of policy, has acquired more praise than blame in the pursuit of the same objects. Nobody, more than himself, was anxious to deserve, on account of any profound wisdom attending them. It was by accident only, that the king had not a considerable share in those great naval discoveries by which the present age was so much distinguished. Columbus, after meeting with many refusals from the courts of Portugal and Spain, sent his brother, Bartholomew, to London, in order to explain his projects, and to request the crown to protect his execution for the sake of the missions. The king invited him over to England; but his brother, being taken by pirates, was detained in his voyage; and Columbus, meanwhile, having obtained the countenance of Isabella, was supplied with a small fleet, and happily executed his enterprise. Henry was not discouraged by this disappointment; he fitted out Sebastian Cabot, a Venetian, settled in Bristol; and sent him westwards, in 1498, in search of new countries. Cabot discovered the main land of America towards the sixtieth degree of northern latitude: he sailed southwards along the coast, and discovered Newfoundland, and other countries, but returned to Portugal, in order to explain his proceedings and discoveries to King Henry VII.; and, as Cabot, Elliot, and other merchants in Bristol, made a like attempt in 1502, the king expended fourteen thousand pounds in building one ship, called the Great Harry, with the finest materials, giving her the name of the English navy. Before this period, when the princes wanted a fleet, he had no other expedient than hiring or pressing ships from the merchants. But though this improvement of navigation, and the discovery of both the Indies, was the most memorable incident that happened during this or any other period, it was not the only great event by which the age was distinguished. In 1453, Constantinople was taken by the Turks; and the Greeks, among whom some remains of learning were still preserved, being scattered by those barbarous, took shelter in Italy, and imported, together with their admirable language, a tincture of their science and of their manners. At the same time, the study of antiquity became fashionable, and the esteem for literature gradually propagated itself throughout every nation. In the meantime, the invention of gunpowder changed the whole art of war: mighty innovations were soon after made in religion, such as not only affected the state, but that adhered to the ancient faith and worship: and thus a general revolution was made in human affairs, throughout this period of the world; and men gradually attained that situation with regard to commerce, arts, science, government, police, and cultivation, in which they have ever since persevered. Here, therefore, commences the useful as well as the more agreeable part of modern annals; certainty has place in all the considerable, and even most of the minute parts of historical narration; a great variety of events, preserved by painting, give rise to all the art of adorning, as well as adorning, the facts which he relates; and as each incident has a reference to our present manners and situation, instructive lessons occur every moment during the course of the narration. The king, in his unceasing researches into preceding periods is moved by a curious, liberal, and studious spirit; and not by any necessity for acquir- ing knowledge of public affairs, or the arts of civil government.

CHAP. XXVII.

HENRY VIII.

The death of Henry VII. had been attended with as open and visible a joy among the people as decency would permit; and the event has still greater consequence, the accession and coronation of his son, Henry VIII., spread universally a declared and unequivocal satisfaction. Instead of a monarch, jealous, severe, and aversive, who, in proportion as he advanced in years, was sinking still deeper in those unpopular vices, than his father, his son, who, hitherto he was expected to be a blooming and ruddy countenance, with a lively air, with the appearance of spirit and activity in all his demeanour. His father in order to remove him from the knowledge of public business, had hitherto occupied him entirely in the pursuits of literature; and the proficience which he made, gave no prognosis of his powers and capacity. Even the event of the king's death, brought him to greater moderation and maturity. And as the contending title of York and Lancaster were now at last fully united in his person, men justly expected from a prince, noxious to no party, that impartiality of administration which had long been unknown in England. These favourable prepossessions of the public were encouraged by the measures which Henry embraced in the commencement of his reign. His grandmother, the Countess of Richmond and Derby, was still alive; and as she was a woman much celebrated for prudence and virtue, he wisely showed great deference to her opinion in the establishment of his new council. The members were Warham, Archbishop of Canterbury; and Chancellor; the Earl of Shrewsbury, steward; Lord Herbert, chamberlain; Sir Thomas Lovel, master of the wards, and constable of the Tower; Sir Edward Poyntz, comptroller; Sir John Dacre, Lord Darnley, and Sir Thomas Dacre, afterwards Lord Darcy; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of laws; and Sir Henry Wyatt. These men had long been accustomed to business under the late king, and were the least unpopular of all the ministers employed by that monarch.

But the chief competitors for favour and authority under the new king, were the Earl of Surrey, treasurer, and Fox, Bishop of Winchester, secretary and privy seal. This prelate, who enjoyed great credit during all the former reign, had acquired such habits of caution and frugality as he could not easily lay aside; and he still opposed by his remonstrances, those schemes of dissipation and expense which the youth and passions of Henry rendered agreeable to him. But Surrey was a more dexterous courtier, and though few had borne a greater share in the fragile politics of the late king, he knew how to conform himself to the humour of his new master; and no one was so forward in promoting that liberality, pleasure, and magnificence, which his youth had induced him to prevail upon.

By this policy he ingratiated himself with Henry; he made advantage, as well as the other courtiers, of the lavish disposition of his master; and he engaged him in such a course of play and idleness as rendered him unnecessary affairs, and willing to intrust the government of the state entirely into the hands of his ministers. The great treasures amassed by the late king were gradually dissipated in the giddy expenses of Henry. One party of pleasure succeeded to another: tilts, tournaments, and carousals were exhibited with all the magnificence of the age; and as the present tranquillity of the public permitted the court to indulge itself in every amusement, serious business was but little attended to. Or, if the king interrupted the course of his festivity, he chiefly employed himself in an application to music and literature, which were his favourite amusements, and which were so well adapted to his genius. He had made such proficience in the former art, as even to compose some pieces of church music which were sung in his chapel. He was initiated in the elegant learning of the time. And there were so many distinguished talents as were so fortunate as to be seduced into a study of the barren controversies of the schools, which were then fashionable, and had chosen Thomas Aquinans for his favourite author, he still discovered a capacity fitted for more useful and extraordinary knowledge.

The frank and careless humour of the king, as it led him to dissipate the treasures amassed by his father, rendered him negligent in protecting the instruments whom he had placed in his hands. A proposal being issued to encourage complaints, the rage of the people was let loose on all informers, who had so long exercised an unbounded tyranny over the nation: they were thrown into prison, condemned to the pillory, and most of them lost their lives by the violence of the populace. Empson and Dudley, who were most exposed to public hatred, were immediately apprehended, in order to make answer for their conduct, which had rendered them so obnoxious. Empson made a shrewd apology for himself, as well as for his associate. He told the council, that so far from casting off his public duties, he had, on the contrary, increased them by his perjury; it had been impossible for him, in the presence of his prince, to have protected himself from his public conduct, his enemies themselves grounded their clamour on actions which seemed rather to merit reward and approbation: that a strict execution of law was the crime of which the Dudley were accused; though no law had been established by general consent, and though they had acted in obedience to the king, to whom the administration of justice was intrusted by the constitution: that it belonged not to them, who were instruments in the hands of supreme power, to determine what laws were recent or obsolete, expeditious or blurtful; since they were all alike valid, so long as they remained unrepealed by the legislature: that it was natural for a licentious populace to stigmatize as an heresy any passion of an honest man; but all wise states had ever made their glory consist in the just distribution of rewards and punishments, and had annexed the former to the observance and enforcement of the latter; and they were guilty of the crime, that a sudden overthrow of all government might be expected where the judges were committed to the mercy of the criminals, the rulers to that of the subjects.

Now, while they sought to defend themselves, Empson and Dudley were sent to the Tower; and soon after brought to their trial. The strict execution of laws, however ostolée, could never be imputed to them as a crime in a court of justice: and it is likely that, even where they had exercised arbitrary power, the king, as they had acted by the secret commands of his father, was not willing that their conduct should undergo so severe a scrutiny. In order, therefore, to avoid even the appearance of the remonstrance of these obnoxious ministers, crimes very improbable, or indeed absolutely impossible, were charged upon them; that they had entered into a conspiracy against the sovereign, and had intended, on the death of the late king, to substitute Henry himself by monarchical appointment. The jury were so far moved by popular prejudices, joined to court influence, as to give a verdict against them; which was afterwards confirmed by a bill of attainder passed against them, and, at the earnest desire of the people, was executed by warrant from the king. Thus, in those arbitrary times, justice was equally violated, whether the king sought power and riches, or courted popularity.

Henry, while he punished the instruments of past tyranny, had yet such a deference to former engagements as to deliberate, immediately after his accession, concerning the conclusion of his alliance with the Infant Catherine, to whom he had been affianced during his father's lifetime. Her former marriage with his brother's King's marriage, and the inequality of their years, were a sufficient reason for the choice of the English princess, who was in all respects adapted to interest; but, on the other hand, the advantages of her known virtue, modesty, and sweetness of disposition, were insisted on; the affection which she bore to the king; the large dowry to which she was affianced; the justice of cementing a close alliance with Spain; the necessity of finding some confederate to counterbalance the power of France; the expediency of fulfilling the engagements of the late king; when these considerations were weighed, they determined to deviate from the opinion of his party, to give Henry their advice for celebrating the marriage. The Countess of Richmond, who had concurred in the marriage of his grandson, was now disposed.
enemies. Ferdinand gave secret orders to his general, Gonzalvo, whom the Spaniards honour with the appellation of the Great Captain, to attack the armies of France, and make himself master of all the dominions of Naples. Gonzalvo prevailed in every enterprise, defeated the French in two pitched battles, and insured to his prince the entire possession of that kingdom. Lewis, unable to procure redress with the by now displeased pope, desisted from less negotiation with Ferdinand for the recovery of his share of the partition; and all Italy, during some time, was held in suspense between these two powerful monarchs. A. D. 1511. The balance of power was better secured in Europe, and seemed more able to maintain itself without any anxious concern or attention of the princes. Several great monarchies were established; and one so far surpassed the rest as to give any foundation, or even pretence, for jealousy. England was united in domestic peace, and by its situation happily secured from the invasion of foreigners. The coalition of the several kingdoms of Spain had formed one powerful monarchy, which Ferdinand maintained by arts, fraudulent indeed and deceitful, but full of vigour and ability. Lewis XII. a gallant and generous prince, had, by espousing Anne of Brittany, widow to his predecessor, and marrying with that princess, by which the safety of his kingdom so much depended. Maximilian, the emperor, besides the hereditary dominions of the Austrian family, maintained authority in the emperor's house. He was a prince of vast possessions, and was able to unite the German princes in any great plan of interest, at least of defence. Charles, Prince of Castile, grandson to Maximilian and Ferdinand, had already succeeded to the vast possessions of Burgundy; and, being as yet in early youth, the government was entrusted to Margaret of Savoy, his aunt, a princess endowed with signal prudence and virtue. The internal force of the empire was still greater and more invincible than by the active and enterprising genius of Julius II., an ambitious pontiff, first excited the flame of war and discord among them. By his intrigues, a league had been formed at Cambrai; between himself, Maximilian, Lewis, and Ferdinand; and the object of this great confederacy was to overwhelm, by their united arms, the commonwealth of Venice. Henry, without any motion or movement, allowed his name to be inserted in the confederacy. This oppressive and iniquitous league was but too successful against the republic. Ferdinand, in a secure situation of the considerable monarchies prevented any one from aspiring to any conquest of moment; and though this consideration could not maintain general peace, or remedy the natural inquietude of any country, it was sufficient to dispose the inhabitants to desert engagements, and change their alliances, in which they were retained by honour and caprice, rather than by any natural or durable interest. Julius had no sooner baulmed the Venetian republic, than he was inspired with a nobler ambition, that of expelling all foreigners from Italy, or, to speak in the style affected by the Italians of that age, the freeing of that country entirely from the dominion of barbarians. He was determined to make the tempest fall first upon Lewis; and in order to pave the way for this great enterprise, he at once sought for a ground of quarrel with that monarch, and courted the alliance of other princes. He declared war against the Duke of Burgundy, the confederate of Lewis. He solicited the favour of England, by sending Henry a sacred rose, perfumed with musk, and anointed with chrism. He engaged in his interests Bamborough, Archbishop of York's; and Henry, the Pope's, success, disposed him to desert engagements, and change their alliances, in which they were retained by honour and caprice, rather than by any natural or durable interest. Buonaviso, an agent of the Pope's at London, had been corrupted by the court of France, and had previously revealed to Lewis all the treasures which he entertained against him. But this unfitness did the king inconceivable prejudice, in comparison of the treachery which he experienced from the selfish purposes of the ally on whom he chiefly relied for assistance. Ferdinand, his father-in-law, had so long persevered in a course of envoys and envoys that he began even to value himself on his dexterity in fraud and artifice; and he made a boast of those shameful successes. Being told one day, that Lewis, a prince of a very suspicious temper, had complained of his having once cheated him: “he lies, the drunken lad!” said he, “I have cheated him above twenty times.” This prince considered his close connections with Henry only as the means with which to draw him the farther, to the end that he might not entertain so invade France by the way of Calais, where he himself should not have it

Expeditus to his power to assist him; he exhorted him

Ferdinand, rather to send forces to Fontarrabia, where he could easily make a conquest of Gueneue, a province in which, it was imagined, the English had still some adherents. He promised to assist this conquest by the junction of a Spanish army. And so forward did he seem to promote the interests of his son-in-law, that he even sent vessels to England in order to transport over the forces which Henry had levied for that purpose. The Marquis of Dorset commanded the disembarkation of these forces, that consisted of ten thousand infantry: Lord Howard, governor of the Earl of Surrey, Lord Broke, Lord Ferrers, and many others of the young gentry and nobility, accompanied him in this service. All were on fire to distinguish themselves in the enterprise. He had already made a considerable pretence of importance for their master. The secret purpose of Ferdinand, in this unequalled generosity, was suspected by nobody.

The small kingdom of Navarre lies on the frontiers between France and Spain; and as John d'Albat the sov- reign was connected by friendship and alliance with Lewis, the opportunity seemed favourable to Ferdinand, while the Englishmen against the French, to make one of his adherents to the council of Pius lay under the sentence of excommunication, to put himself in possession of these dominions. No sooner, therefore, was Dorset landed in Guipuscoa, than the Spanish monarch declared his readiness to join him with his forces, to make with united arms an invasion of France, and to form the siege of Bayonne, which opened the way into Gueneue; but he remarked to the English general, how dangerous it might prove to leave him, and so long persevered in a course of envoys and envoys, which, being his closest alliance with France, could easily give admittance to the enemy, and cut off all communication between Spain and the combined armies. To provide against so dangerous an event, it was required that John should, from their neutrality in the present war; and when that prince expressed his willingness to enter into any engagement for that purpose, he also required, that security should be given for the strict observance of it. John having likewise agreed to this condition, Ferdinand demanded, that he should deliver into his hands six of the most considerable places of his dominions, together with his eldest son as a hostage. These were not terms to be proposed to a sovereign; and as the Spanish monarch expected a refusal, he gave immediate orders to the Duke of Alva, his general, to make an invasion on Navarre, and to reduce that kingdom. But the French, who made himself master of all the smaller towns; and being ready to form the siege of Pamplona, the capital, he summoned the Marquis of Dorset to join him with the English army, and concert together all their operations.

Dorset began to suspect that the interests of his master were very little regarded in all those transactions; and having no orders to invade the kingdom of Navarre, or make war anywhere but in France, he refused to take any part in the enterprise. He remained at the court of the King of Navarre, for the time, at the camp of Fontarrabia; but so subtle was the conduct of Ferdinand, that, even while the English army lay in that situation, it was almost equally serviceable to his purpose, as if it had acted in conjunction with his. He kept the French in awe, and prevented it from advancing to succour the king- dom of Navarre; so that Alva, having full leisure to conduct the siege, made himself master of Pampluna, and obliged John to fly out of France. The Spanish general applied again to Dorset, and invited him to conduct with united counsels the operations of the holy league, so it was called, against Lewis: but as he still declined forming the siege of Bayonne, and rather insisted on the invasion of the deistical province of Orléans, he determined to conduct with the King of Navarre's dominions, which lies on the French side of the Pyrenees, Dorset, justly suspicious of his master's intentions, represented that, without new orders from his master, he could not concur in such an undertaking. In order to procure these orders, Ferdinand despatched Martin de Ampuero to London; and persuaded Henry, that by the refractory and scrupulous humour of the English general, the most favourable opportunities were lost, and that it was necessary he should, on all occasions, act in concert with the Spanish commander, who was best acquainted with the situation of the country, and the resources of every operation. But before orders to this purpose reached Spain, Dorset had become extremely impatient; and observing that his further stay served not to promote the man undertaking, and that his army was daily perishing by want and sickness, he demanded ship- ping from the French admiral to transport his army. Ferdinand, who was bound by treaty to furnish him with this supply, whenever demanded, was at length, after many delays, obliged to yield to his importunity; and Dorset, embarked his troops in good time. Meanwhile, the messenger arrived with orders from Henry, that the troops should remain in Spain; but the soldiers were so discontented with the treatment of which they were subject, that they mutinyed, and obliged their commanders to set sail for England. Henry was much displeased with the ill success of this enterprise; and it was with difficulty that Dorset, by explaining the state of the present conduct of Ferdinand, was at last able to appease him.

There happened this summer an action at sea, which brought not any more decisive advantage to the English. The Thomas Kennoit, master of hms, was sent to the coast of Brittanit, with a fleet of forty-five sail; and he carried with him Sir Charles Brandon, Sir John Carew, and many other young courtiers, who longed for an opportunity of displacing their valour. After they had commuted some dépêches; that is, messages, he came to Brest, under the command of Primauget, and began an engagement with the English. Fire seized the ship of Primauget, who, finding his destruction inevitable, bore down upon the vessel of the English admiral, and, engaging with her, resolved to make her share his fate. Both fleets stood some time in suspense, as spectators of this dreadful engagement, and all men saw with horror the flames which consumed both vessels, and heard the cries of fury and despair, which came from the miserable combatants. At last, the French ship blew up; and at the same time destroyed the English. The rest of the French fleet made their escape into different harbours.

The war which England waged against France, though it brought no advantage to the former kingdom, was of great prejudice to the latter; and by obliging Lewis to withdraw his forces, for the defence of his own dominions, lost him that superiority, which his arms, in the beginning of the campaign, had attained in Italy. Gaston de Foix, his nephew, a young hero, had been intrusted with the command of the French forces; and in a few months performed such feats of military art and valor, that he was sufficient to render illustrious the life of the oldest captai. His career finished with the great battle of Ravenna, which, after the most obstinate conflict, he gained over the English admiral, with a prodigious number of ships and men; and he lost his victory was complete; and with him perished the fortune of the French arms in Italy. The Swiss, who had rendered themselves extremely formidable by their bands of disciplined infantry, invaded the Milanese with a force of foot and horse, and proposed to meet the populace in a revolt against the dominion of France. Genoa followed the example of the duchy; and thus Lewis, in a few weeks, entirely lost his Italian conquests, except some garrisons; and Maximilian Storm, the son of Ludovic, was reinstated in his inheritance.

A.D. 1515.

Julius discovered extreme joy on the discomfiture of the French; and the more so, as he had been helden for it to the Swiss, a people whose councils, he hoped, he should one day be able to influence and govern. The Pontiff enjoyed this success a very little time; and in his place was chosen John de Valois, Medicis, who took the appellation of Leo X., and proved one of the most illustrious princes that ever sat on the papal throne. Humane, benevolent, generous, affable; the patron of every art, and friend of every virtue; he had a soul no less capable of forming great designs than his predecessor, but was more gentle, patient, and artful in employing means for the execution of them. The sole defect, indeed, of his character, was too great fineness and artifice; a fault which, both as a priest and an Italian, it was difficult for him to avoid. In the negociation of Lewis, Emperor Maximilian was separated from the French interest; and Henry, notwithstanding his disappointments in the former campaign, was still encouraged to prosecute his warlike measures against Lewis.

Henry had summoned a new session of parliament, and obtained a supply for his enterprise. It was a poll-tax, and imposed different sums, according to the stations and riches of the person. A duke paid ten marks, an earl five pounds, a baron four pounds, a knight four marks; every man valued at eight hundred pounds in goods, four marks. An imposition was also granted of two shillings and four-pence.1 By these supplies, joined to the supplies out of the exchequer, and the money of his father, and which was not yet entirely dissipated, he was enabled to levy a great army, and render himself formidable to his enemy. The English are said to have been much encouraged in this enterprise, by the arrival of a vessel in the Thames under the papal banner. It carried presents of wine and hams to the king, and the more eminent courtiers; and such fond devotion was at that time entertained towards the court of Rome, that these trivial presents were everywhere received with the greatest triumph and exultation.

In order to prevent all disturbances from Scotland, where Henry's arm was to be employed on the continent, Dr. West, Dean of Winchester, was sent as an embassy to James, the king's brother-in-law, and instructions were given him to accommodate all differences between the kingdoms, as well as to discover the intentions of the court. Such an embassy had already been made on both sides. One Barton, a Scotchman, having suffered injuries from the Portuguese, for which he could obtain no redress, had procured letters of marque against that nation; but he had no sooner put to sea, than he was guilty of the grossest abuses, committed depredations upon the English, and much infested the narrow seas.2 Lord Howard and Sir Edward Howard, admirals, and some of his fleet, went out against him, fought him in a desperate action, where the pirate was killed; and they brought his ships into the Thames. As Henry refused all satisfaction for this act of justice, some of the borderers, who wanted but a pretence for depredations, entered England under the command of Lord Hume, warden of the marches, and committed great ravages on that kingdom. Notwithstanding these mutual grounds of dissatisfaction, matters might easily have been accommodated. He was not, however, for Henry's intended invasion of France, which roused the jealousy of the Scottish nation.

War with Scotland.

The ancient league, which subsisted between France and Scotland, was conceived to be the strongest mutual security on both sides; but was universally believed, that were it not for the contemnence which they received from this foreign alliance, they had never been able so long to maintain their independence against a people so strong. Henry had been incited to take part in the quarrel by the invasions of Anne, Queen of France, whose knight he had ever in all tournaments professed himself, and who summoned him, according to the ideas of romantic gallantry prevalent in that age, to aid in the defence of his native fields in behalf of the King himself and his true and valorous champion. The remonstrances of his consort and of his wisest counsellors were in vain opposed to the mutual ardour of this prince. He first sent a squadron of ships to the assistance of France; the only fleet which Scotland seems ever to have possessed. And though he still made professions of maintaining a neutrality, the English ambassador easily forewarned, that a war would in the end prove inevitable; and he gave warning of the danger to his master, who sent the Earl of Surrey to put the borders in a posture of defence, and to resist the expected invasion of the enemy.

Henry, all on fire for military fame, was little discouraged by this appearance of a diversion from the north; and so much the less, as he flatterer himself with the assistance of all the considerable potencies of Europe in his invasion of France. The Pope still continued to employ his excommunications against Lewis, and all the adherents of the schismatical council; the Swiss Canton made professions of violent animosity against France; the ambassadors of Ferrandino and Maximilian had signed with those of Henry, in the treaty of alliance; and he had stipulated the time and place of their intended invasion; and though Ferdinand disavowed his ambassador, and even signed a truce for a twelvemonth with the common enemy, Henry was not yet fully convinced of his selfish and sinister intentions, and still hoped for his concurrence after the expiration of that term. He had now got a minister who complied with all his inclinations, and flattered him in every scheme to which his sanguine and imbecile temper never lent an objection.

Thomas Wolsey, Dean of Lincoln, and Welsey, minister, the king, surpassed in favour all his ministers, and was fast advancing towards that unrivalled grandeur which he afterwards attained. This man was son of a butcher at Ipswich; but having got a learned education, and being endowed with an excellent capacity, he was admitted into the Marquis of Dorset's family, as tutor to that nobleman's children, and soon after the friendship and countenance of his patron. He was recommended to be chaplain to Henry VII., and being employed by that monarch in a secret negociation, which regarded his intended marriage with Margaret of Savoy, Maximilian's daughter; he was made ambassador to the court of Florence, and in a short time had acquired most of the situation.3 But on second thoughts, said the king, "I found that somewhat was omitted in your orders; and have sent a messenger after you with fuller instructions." "I sent the messenger," replied Wolsey, "on my return. But as I had reflected on that omission, I ventured of myself to execute what I knew must be Your Majesty's intentions."4 The death of Henry soon after this incident retarded the advancement of Wolsey, and prevented his reaping any advantage from the good opinion which that monarch had entertained of him; but thenceforwards he was looked on at court as a rising man; and Fox, Bishop of Winchester, cast his eye upon him as one who might be serviceable to him in his present situation. This prelate, observing that the Earl of Surrey had totally eclipsed him in favour, resolved to introduce Wolsey to the young prince's family, and obtained by that means a court, which he was thought in his amusing arts, and yet be content to act in the cabinet part subordinate to Fox himself, who had promoted him. In a little time Wolsey gained so much on the king, that he supplanted both Surrey in his favour, and Fox in his trust and confidence. He had come to court, and was admitted to the king's presence, he took the lead in every joint conversation, and promoted all that frolic and entertainment which he found suitable to the age and inclination of the young monarch. Neither his own years, which were now upwards of forty, nor his character, by any restraint upon him, or engaged him to check, by any useless severity, the gaiety, in which Henry, who had small propension to debauchery, passed his careles hours. Henry's pleasure of August produced bountiful ment, and instated those auxiliaries of conduct which he was desirous his master should adopt. He observed to him, that while he intrusted his affairs into the hands of his father's counsellors, he had the advantage indeed of employing men of wisdom and experience, but men who owed not their promotion to his favour, and who scarcely thought themselves accountable to him for the exercise of their authority: that by the factions, and cabals, and jealousies, which had long prevailed among them, they more obstructed the advancement of his affairs, than they promoted it by the knowledge which age and practice had conferred upon them: that while he thought proper to pay so much respect to those pleasures, which his age and royal fortune invited him, and in those studies which would in time enable him to sway the sceptre with absolute authority, his best system of government would be to intrust his authority into the hands of some one friend, who was the executor of his will, and who could enter upon no view but that of promoting his service: and that if this minister had also the same relish for pleasure with himself, and the same taste for science, he could more easily at intervals account to him for his whole conduct, and introduce his master gradually into the knowledge of public business; and thus, without tedious constraint or application, initiate him in the science of government.

In all the views of his character, he saw nothing so capable of effecting this plan of administration as the person who proposed it, he soon advanced his favourite, from being the companion of his pleasures, to be a member of his counsel, and from being a ouiller of his council, to be his sole and absolute minister. By this rapid advancement and uncontrolled authority, the character and genius of Wolsey had full opportunity to display itself. Instable in his acquisitions, he had contrived to make himself master of a vast wealth; of an extensive capacity, but still more unbounded enterprise; of ambitions of power, but still more desires of glory; intemperate, ingenuous, persevering; and, by turns, lofty, choleric, and haughty; ambitious in his own advancement; oppressive to the people, licentious to his friends; more generous than grateful; less moved by injuries than by contempt; he was framed to take the ascendant in every intercourse with others, but excelled in the superiority of nature with such ostentation as exposed him to envy, and made every one willing to recall the original inferiority, or rather meanness of his fortune.

The branch of administration in which Henry most excelled himself, while he gave his entire confidence to Wolsey, was the military, which, as it suited the natural gallantry and bravery of his temper, as well as the ardour of his youth, was the principal object of his attention. England did not then supply a sufficient number of men by sea and land to resist him, he was no less careful to levy a formidable army, and equip a considerable fleet for the invasion of France. The command of the fleet was intrusted to Sir Edward Howard; who, after securing the Channel for some time, presented himself before Brest, where the French navy then lay; and he challenged them to a combat. The French admiral, who expected from the renown of his name, and the galleys behind the command of Prejoint de Bidouze, kept within the harbour, and saw with patience the English burn and destroy the country in the neighbourhood. At last Prejoint ar-ned with six galleys, and put into Conquet, a place within a few leagues of Brest; where he secured himself behind some batteries, which he had planted on rocks that lay on each side the bay. Having fixed the land batteries, standing, determined to make an attack upon him; and as he had but two galleys, he took himself the command of one, and gave the other to Lord Ferrars. He was followed by some raw barges, and some cranes under clews, and galleasses, which were brought by the William Sidney, and other officers of distinction. He immediately fastened on Prejoint's ship, and leaped on board of her, attended by one Carrier, a Spanish cavalier, and seventeen Englishmen. He was repulsed from Prejoint's ship to that of the enemy, being cut, the admiral was thus left in the hands of the French; and as he still continued the combat with great gallantry, he was pushed overboard by their pikes. Lord Ferrars, seeing the admiral's galley fall off, followed with the other small vessels; and the whole fleet was so discouraged by the loss of their commander that they retired from before Brest. The French navy came out of harbour; and even ventured to invade the coast of Sussex. They were repulsed, and Prejoint, their commander, lost an eye by the shot of an arrow.

Lord Howard, brother to the deceased admiral, succeeded to the command of the English fleet; and little memorable passed in the French enterprise.

Great preparations had been making at land, during the whole winter, for an invasion on France by the way of Calais; but the summer was well advanced before every thing was in preparation. The French army was at this time in order, consisting of about 6000 men, of whom the principal consisted of cavalry. The English army consisted of about 8000 men, the greater part of whom were men of the middle sort, with a few gentlemen and officers. The 'French army, which the kingdom had enjoyed, had somewhat unfitted the English for military expeditions; and the great change which had lately been introduced in the art of war, had rendered it still more difficult to procure them to the use of the arms now employed in action. The Swiss, and after them the Spaniards, had shown the advantage of a stable infantry, who fought with pike and sword, and were able to resist even the heavy-armed cavalry of the English. The English force now consisted of fire-arms became common; though the caliver, which was the weapon now in use, was so inconvenient, and attended with so many disadvantages, that it had not entirely displaced the bow, a weapon in which the English excelled all European nations. A considerable part of the forces, which Henry levied for the invasion of France, consisted of archers; and as soon as affairs were in readiness, the vanguard of the army, under the Earl of Suffolk, under the command of the Earl of Shrewsbury, sailed over to Calais. Shrewsbury was accompanied by the Earl of Derby, the Lords Fitzwater, Hastings, Godman, and Sir Richard Thorpe, captain of the Earl of Derby's men. So agreeable was the journey after followed under the command of Lord Herbert, the chamberlain, attended by the Earls of Northumberland and Kent, the Lords Andley and Delawur, together with Caron, Curzon, and other gentlemen.

The king himself prepared to follow with the main body and rear of the army; and he appointed the queen regent of the kingdom during his absence. That he might secure her administration from all disturbance, he ordered Edward de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk, to be guardian of the Tower, the nobleman who had been attainted and imprisoned during the late reign. Henry was led to commit this act of violence by the dying commands, as is imagined, of his father, that he would fight; he was not to be afraid from danger, while a man of so turbulent a disposition as Suffolk was alive. And as Richard de la Pole, brother of Suffolk, had accepted of a command in the French service, and foolishly attempted to revive the York faction, and to instigate them against the present government, he probably, by that means, drew more suddenly the king's vengeance on this unhappy nobleman. At last, the Earl of Pembroke, Duke of Buckingham, and many others of the nobility, arrived at Calais, and entered upon his French expedition, from which he foudly expected so much success and of all those allies on whose assistance he relied, the Swiss alone fully performed their engagements. Being put in motion by a sum of money sent them by Henry, 201 and incited by their victories obtained in Italy, and, though he had already made a truce with Francis I, they were preparing to enter that kingdom with an army of twenty-five thousand men; and no equal force could be opposed to their incursion. Maximilian had received an immense army of 120,000 men from Hungary, and had promised to reinforce the Swiss with 8000 men; but failed in his engagements. That he might make atonement to the king, he himself appeared in the Low Countries, and, by his animosity against France, and Flemish soldiers, who were useful in giving an example of discipline to Henry's new levied forces. Observing the disposition of the English monarch to be more bent on glory than on interest, he enlisted himself in his service, wore the cross of St. George, and received pay, a hundred crowns a day, as one of his subjects and captains. But while he exhibited this extraordinary spectacle, of an Emperor of Germany serving under a King of England, he was treated with the highest respect by Henry, and really directed all the operations of the English army.

Before the arrival of Henry and Maximilian in the camp, the Earl of Shrewsbury and Lord Herbert had formed three lines of fortifications on the frontiers of Picardy; and they began to attack the place with vigour. Toulus and Crequigny communicated in the town, and had a garrison not exceeding three thousand men; yet made such stout resistance as prostrated the siege a month and a half. Thus was there a long sanguinary warfare, from want of provisions and ammunition than from the assaults of the besiegers. Having conveyed intelligence of their situation to Lewis, who had advanced to Amiens with his army, that Prince gave orders to throw relief into the place. Fontaines appeared at the head of 800 horsemen, each of whom carried a sack of gunpowder behind him, and two quarters of bacon. While they were forming for siege; and their unexpected eruption into the English camp, and surrounding all resistance, advanced to the fosse of the town, where each horseman threw down his burden. They immediately returned at the gallop, and were so fortunate as again to break through the English, and to suffer little or no loss in this dangerous attempt.

But the English had, soon after, full revenge for the insult. Henry had received intelligence of the expedition of the Considerable. Hearing of the retreat of the Swiss, and observing the season to be far advanced, he thought proper to return to England; and he carried the greater part of his army with him. Success had attended him in every enterprise of naval or military importance. Lady Ford, being taken prisoner in her castle, was presented to James, and so gained on the affection of that prince, that he wasted in pleasure the critical moment which, during half a century, he should have employed in pushing his conquests. His troops, living in a barren country, where they soon consumed all the provisions, began to be pinched with hunger; and, as the authority of the prince was feeble, and military discipline during that age, extremely relaxed, many of them had stolen from the camp, and retired homewards. Meanwhile the Earl of Surrey, having collected a force of and take possession of the throne. This fond conceit was long entertained among the Scots.

The King of Scotland and most of his chief nobles being slain in the field of Flodden, so this battle was called, an inviting opportunity was offered to Henry of gaining advantages over that kingdom, perhaps of reducing it to subjection. But he discovered, on this occasion, a mind truly great and generous. When the Queen of Scotland was brought to the birth of her child by the side of her husband, who had given her no satisfaction answer, he made a feint of marching north; as if he intended to enter Scotland, to lay waste the borders, and cut off the provisions of the enemy. The Scottish army, not knowing what he pur-pursued, and now set fire to the huts in which they had quartered, they descended from the hills. Surrey, taking advantage of the smoke which was blown towards him, and which concealed his movements, passed the Till with his artillery and vanguard at the bridge of Twisel, and sent the rest of his army to seek a ford higher up the river.

An engagement was now become inevitaable, and both sides prepared for it with tranquility and order. The English divided their army into two lines; Lord Howard led the main body of the first line, Sir Edmund Howard the right wing, Sir Marquess of Dorset the left. The Earl of Surrey, himself commanded the main body of the second line, Lord Dacre the right wing, Sir Edward Stanley the left. The front of the Scots presented three divisions to the enemy: the middle was led by James, his eldest son; the right by the Earl of Huntley, assisted by Lord Hume; the left by the Earls of Lenox and Argyll.
A fourth division, under the Earl of Bothwell, made a body of reserve. Huntley began the battle; and after a sharply-contested fight on the left of the English, led and chased them off the field; but, on returning from the pursuit, he found the whole Scottish army in great disorder. The division under Lenox and Argyll, elapsed with thei u leaders, and broke their one ranks, and, notwithstanding the remonstrances and entreaties of La Motte, the French ambassador, had rushed headlong upon the enemy. Not only Sir Edmund Howard, at the head of his division, received them with great valour; but Dacres, who commanded the second line, wheeling about during the action, fell upon their rear, and put them to the sword without resistance. The division under James, and that under Bothwell, animated by the valor of their leaders, still continued in the way of the English, but threwing themselves into a circle, protracted the action, till night separated the combatants. The victory seemed yet undecided, and the numbers that fell on each side were now equal. But the English, not on rising the next morning discovered where the advantage lay. The English had lost only persons of small note; but the flower of the Scottish nobility had fallen in battle, and their king himself, after the most diligent inquiry, could no where be found. In searching the field, the English met with a dead body which resembled him, and was arrayed in a similar habit; and they put it in a leaden coffin and sent it to London. During some time it was kept unburied;
because James died under sentence of excommunication, on account of his confederacy with France, and his opposition to the holy see; but upon Henry's application, who pretended that this prince had, to the instant before his death, discovered against the English, had been given him, and his body was interred. The Scots, however, still asserted that it was not James' body which was found on the field of battle, but that of one Eiphin-stone, who had been arrived in arms resembling his king's, in order to divide the attention of the English, and share the danger with his master. It was believed that James had been seen crossing the Tweed at Kelso; and some were of opinion that he had become the vassal of Lord Hume, whom that nobleman had instigated to commit so enormous a crime. But the populace entertained the opinion that he was still alive, and, having secretly gone in pilgrimage to the Holy Land, would soon return.

the honourable settlement of a sister, for whom he had entertained a tender affection. Such a complication, therefore, of injuries gave him the highest displeasure, and inspired him with a desire of expressing his disdained affection towards those in his youth and inseparable, and had abused his too great facility.

The Duke of Longueville, who had been made prisoner at the battle of Guinegate, and who was still detained in England, was ready to take advantage of all these dispositions towards Henry, and would, manifestly view this advantageous alliance, which he knew to be passionately desired by his master. He represented to the king that Anne, Queen of France, being lately dead, a door was opened thereby for an alliance, and an alliance, which would serve to terminate honourably all the differences between them; that she had left Lewis no male children; and, as he had ever entertained a strong desire of having heirs to the crown, no marriage seemed more suitable to him than that with the Princess of England, whose youth and beauty afforded the most flattering hopes in that particular: that, though the marriage of a princess of sixteen with a king of fifty-three might seem unsuitable, yet the other advantages attending the alliance were more than sufficient compensation for this inequality: and that Henry, in loosening his connections with Spain, from which he had never reapplied any advantage, would consent to accept a character of the greatest dignity in his whole life, had invariably maintained the character of probity and honour.

As Henry seemed to hearken to this discourse, with whole dispositions, Lewis, who inculcated the master of the possibility, which he discovered, of bringing the matter to a happy conclusion; and he received full powers for negotiating the treaty. The articles were easily adjusted between the monarchs. Lewis agreed that the great

Tournay should remain in the hands of the English; that Richard de la Pole should be banished to Mentz, there to live on a pension assigned him by Lewis; that Henry should receive payment of a new hundred crowns, being the arrears due by treaty to his father and himself; and that the princess Mary should bring four thousand crowns as her portion, and enjoy as large a jointure as any Queen of France, even the former, who was heiress of Brittany. The two princes also agreed on the succours with which they should mutually supply each other, in case either of them were attacked by an enemy.

In consequence of this treaty, Mary was sent over to France with a splendid retinue, and Lewis met her at Abbeville, where the espousals were celebrated. He was enchanted with the beauty, generosity, and numerous accomplishments of the young princess; and, being naturally of an generous disposition, which his advanced age had not entirely cooled, he was seduced into such a course of generosity and pleasure, as proved very unsuitable to his declining state of health.

A.D. 1513.

He died in less than three months after the 1st Jan. marriage, to the extreme regret of the French nation, who, sensible of his tender concern for their welfare, gave him, with one voice, the honourable appellation of father of his people.

Francis, Duke of Angouline, a youth of one and twenty, who had married Lewis's eldest daughter; succumbed on the throne; and, by his activity, valor, generosity, and abilities, he had adorned and glorified his reign. This young monarch had been extremely striking with the charms of the English princess; and, even during his predecessor's life-time, had paid her due and conspicuous court, as made some of his friends apprehend that he had entertained views of gallantry towards her. But, being warned that, by indulging this passion, he might probably exclude himself from the throne, he forbore all further addresses; and even watched the young divorcer with a very careful and parental solicitude during her widowhood. Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, was, at that time, in the court of France, the most comely personage of his time, and the most accomplished in all the exercises which were then thought to befit a courtier and a soldier. He was Henry's chief favourite; and that monarch had even once entertained thoughts of marrying him to her sister, and had given indulgence to the mutual passion which took place between them. The queen asked Suffolk whether he would have the honour to reflect, to espouse her? and she told him, that her brother would more easily forgive him for not asking his consent, than for acting contrary to his orders. Suffolk declined not so inviting an offer; and their nuptials were secretly celebrated at Paris. Francis, who was pleased with this marriage, as it presented Henry from forming any powerful alliance by means of his sister, interposed his good offices in appeasing him: and even Wolsey, having entertained no jealousy of Suffolk, who was content to participate in the king's pleasures, and had no ambition to engage in public business, was active in reconciling the king to his sister and brother-in-law; and he obtained them permission to return to England.

CHAP. XXVIII.

The numerous enemies whom Wolsey's sudden elevation, his aspiring character, and his haughty deportment had raised against him, served only to rivet him faster in Henry's confidence; who valued himself on supporting the choice which he had formed, and who was incapable of yielding to the murmurs of the people, or the discontents of the great. That artful prelate, likewise, well acquainted with the king's imperious temper, concealed from him the absolute ascendant which he had acquired; and while he secretly directed all public councils, he ever pretended a blind submission to the will and authority of his master. By entering into the king's pleasures, he preserved his afcction; by conducting his business, he gratified his indolence; and by his unlimited complaisance in both capaccities, he precluded all that jealousy which to his exorbitant acquisitions, and his splendid ostentations train of life, should naturally have given birth. The archbishop of York falling vacant by the death of Bambridge, Wolsey was promoted to that see, and resigned the bishopric of Lincoln. Besides enjoying the administration of Tournay, he got possession, on easy leases, of the revenues of Bath, Wroclorster, and Hereford, bishoprics filled by Italians, who were all disposed to sell their benefices in order to compound for this indulgence, by yielding a considerable share of their income. He held in commendam the abbey of St. Alban's, and many other church prebends. He was even allowed to unite with the see of York, first that of Durham, next that of Winchester; and there seemed to be no end of his acquisitions. His further advancement in ecclesiastical dignity served him as a pretence for engrossing still more revenues: the Pope, observing his great influence over the king, was desirous of engaging him in his interests, and created him a cardinal. No churchman, under colour of exacting respect to religion, ever dared to a greater height the state and dignity of that character. His train consisted of eight hundred servants, of whom many were knights and gentlemen; some even of the nobility put their children into his family as a place of education; and in order to gain them favour with their patron, allowed them to bear offices as his servants. Whaever was distinguished by any art or science paid court to the cardinal; and none paid court in vain. Literature, which was then in its infancy, found in him a generous sponsor, instead of a subject of banter; and his prodigious private bounty, he gave encouragement to every branch of erudition.

Not content with this munificence, which gained him the approbation of the wise, he strove to dazzle the eyes of the popular, by the splendour of his equipage and furniture, the costly embroidery of his liverys, the lustre of his apparel. He was the first clergyman in England that wore silk and gold, not only on his habit, but also on his saddles and the trappings of his horses. He caused his cardinals' hat to be born and lit by a person of rank; and when he came to the king's chapel, would permit it to be laid on no place but the altar. A priest, the tallest and most comely he could find, carried before him a pillar of silver on whose top was placed a cross; but not satisfied with this parade, to which he thought himself entitled as cardinal, he provided another priest of equal stature and beauty, who marched along, bearing the cross of York, even in the diocese of Canterbury; contrary to the ancient rule, that no admittance was allowed to these of rank.

The people made merry with the cardinal's ostentation; and said they were now sensible, that one crucifix alone was not sufficient for the expiation of his sins and offences.

Warham, Chancellor and Archbishop of Canterbury, a man of a moderate temper, averse to all disputes, chose rather to retire from public employment, than maintain an unequal contest with the haughty cardinal. He resigned his office of chancellor; and the great seal was immediately delivered to Wolsey. If this new accumulation of dignity increased his enemies, it also served to exalt his personal character, and to divert the envy of his country.

A trial of administration of justice took place during the admission of justice of this high office; and no chancellor ever discovered greater impartiality in his decisions, deeper penetration of judgment, or more enlarged knowledge of law and policy.

The Duke of Norfolk, finding the king's money almost entirely exhausted by projects and pleasures, while his inclination for expense still continued, was glad to resign his office of treasurer, and retire from court. The Duke of Suffolk had also taken offence that the king, by the cardinal's persuasion, had refused to pay a debt which he had contracted during his residence in France; and he thereon forth resolved to live in privacy. These incidents left Wolsey to enjoy, without a rival, the whole power and favour of the king; and they put into his hands every kind of authority. In vain did Fox, before his retirement, warn the king, "not to suffer the servant to be greater than his master." Henry replied, "that he was not aware how to retain all his subjects in obedience;" but he continued still an unlimited deference in every thing to the directions and counsels of the cardinal.

The situation was so well established in England, the obedience of the people so entire, the general administration of justice by the cardinal's means so exact, that no domestic occurrence happened considerable enough to disturb the repose of the king and his ministers: they might even have dispensed with giving any strict attention to foreign affairs; were it possible for men to enjoy any situation in absolute tranquillity, or abstain from projects and enterprises, however fruitless and unnecessary.

The will of the late King of Scotland, who left his widow regent of the kingdom, and the vote of the convention of states, which confirmed that will; did not effectually limit her authority to the condition of her remaining unmarried; but notwithstanding this limitation, a few months after her husband's death, she espoused the Earl of Angus, of the name of Douglas, a nobleman of great family and promising hopes. Some of the nobility now proposed the chietship of Angus to the regency, and recommended this choice as the most likely means of preserving peace with England: but the jealousy of the great families, and the fear of exaltation of the Douglases, began opposition to this metastasis. Lord Hume, in particular, the most powerful chieftain in the kingdom, insisted on recalling the Duke of Albany, son to a brother of James III. who had been banished into France, and who, having there married, had left posterity that were the next heirs to the crown, and the nearest relations to their young sovereign. Albany, though first prince of the blood, had never been in Scotland, was totally ignorant of her situation, unacquainted with the language; yet such was the favour attending the French alliance, and so great the authority of Hume, that this prince was invited to accept the reins of government. France, cardiac to not give offence to the King of England, detained Albany some time in France; but at length, sensible how important it was to keep Scotland in his interests, he permitted him to go over and take possession of the regency: the events which accompanied this kingdom, though it implied such a close connexion as might be thought somewhat to interm at his alliance with England.

When the regent arrived in Scotland, he made inquiries concerning the state of the country, and character of the people; and he discovered a scene with which he was hitherto but little acquainted. That turbulent kingdom, he found, was rather to be considered a confederacy, and that not a close one, of petty princes, than a regular system of civil policy; and even the king, much more a regent, possessed an authority very uncertain and precarious. Aberdeen, the capital, and most of the country, were not under the semblance of a government, and no general laws, or courts of law, existed, though the name of justice was used to the title of a person in power. The nobility, in whom the whole power resided, were so connected by hereditary alliances, or so divided by inveterate enmities, that it was impossible, without a civil war, to impose on them an armed force. In the most flagrant guilt, or give security to the most entire innocence. Rape and violence, when exercised on a hostile tribe, instead of making a person odious among his own clan, rather recommended him to their esteem and approbation; and by rendering him useful to the chief, entitled him to a preference above his fellows. And though the necessity of mutual support served as a close cement of society, yet the passion of revenge against enemies, and the desire of prosecuting the deadly faults, (so they were called,) still appeared to be passions the most predominant among that uncultivated people.

The persons to whom Albany on his arrival first applied for information with regard to the state of the country, happened to be ineretive enemies of Hume; and they represented that powerful nobleman as the chief source of abuse to the kingdom, and the violation of the laws and the administration of justice. Before the authority of the magistrate could be established, it was necessary, they said, to make an example of this great offender. They proposed a moderate system of revenge against enemies, and the desire of prosecuting the deadly faults, (so they were called,) still appeared to be passions the most predominant among that uncultivated people.

the Earl of Arran, his brother-in-law; and was for some time detained prisoner in his castle. But having persuaded Arran to enter into the conspiracy with him, he was no longer regarded, and the Earl being absent, was upon the regent. A new accommodation ensued, not more sincere than the foregoing, and Hume was so impatient as to intrust himself, together with his brother, into the hands of that prince. They were immediately seized, committed to custody, brought to trial, condemned, and executed. No legal crime was proved against these brothers: it was only alleged, that at the battle of Hudden the prince was present. And it is said, that as this backw ardness could not, from the course of their past life, be ascribed to cowardice, it was commonly implored to a more criminal motive. The evidence, however, of guilt produced against them was far from being valid or convincing; and the people, who hated them while living, were much dissatisfied with their execution.

Such violent remedies often produce, for some time, a decent tranquillity; but as they destroy mutual confidence, and begot the most invertebrate animosities, their consequences are commonly fatal, both to the public and to those who have recourse to them. The regent, however, took advantage of the present calm which prevailed; and being now sure of Hume's support, he at once willing to gratify Henry, he went into France; and was engaged to remain there for some years. During the absence of the regent such confusions prevailed in Scottland, and such mutual enmity, rapine, and violence among the subjects, that the country was for a long time utterly disabled, both from offending its enemies and assisting its friends. We have carried on the Scottish history some years beyond the present period; that, as that country had little connexion with the general system of Europe, we might be the less interrupted in the narration of those more memorable events which were transacted in the other kingdoms.

Maximilian, the young emperor, was ready to embrace every overture for a new enterprise; especially if attended with an offer of money, of which he was very greedy, very prodigal, and very indigent. Richard Fear, formerly secretary to Cardinal England, was the diplomat which Wolsey had entertained against the French monarch.

Henry, on the conquest of Tournay, had refused to admit LewisGuillart, the bishop elect, to the possession of the temporalities, because that prince declined taking the oath of allegiance to his new sovereign; and Wolsey was appointed, as above related, administrator of the bishopric.
As the cardinal wished to obtain the free and undisturbed enjoyment of the revenues of his see, he immediately required him to bestow on Guillart some see of equal value in France, and to obtain his resignation of Tournay.
Francis, who still hoped to recover possession of that city, and who feared that the full establishment of Wolsey in the bishopric would produce some force in his name, and continued to consider him, had hitherto neglected to gratify the haughty prelate; and the Bishop of Tournay, by applying to the court of Rome, had obtained a bull for his settlement in the see. Wolsey, who expected to be indulged in every request, and who was respectful from the greatest princes, resented the slight put upon him by Francis; and he pushed his master to seek an occasion of quarrelling with that monarch.

A.D. 1516.

While an universal peace prevailed in Europe, that event happened which had been so long looked for, and from which such important consequences were expected, the death of Ferdinand the Catholic, and the succession of his grandson Charles to his extensive dominions. The more Charles was advanced in power and authority, the more was Francis sensible of the necessity he himself lay under of gaining the confidence and friendship of Henry; and he took at last the only means by which he could obtain success, the paying of court by presents and flattery to the haughty cardinal.

Boniviet, Admiral of France, was despatched to London, and he was directed to employ all his nomination and address, qualities in which he excelled, to procure for himself a place in Wolsey's good graces. After the ambassador had succeeded in his purpose, he took an opportunity of expressing his master's regret, that by mistakes and misapprehensions he had been so unfortunate as to lose a friendship which he so much valued as that of His Eminence. Wolsey was not deaf to these honourable advances from so great a monarch; and he was therewith observed to express himself on all occasions as one of the greatest of France's princes. The means to engage him in his interests, Francis entered into such confidence with him, that he asked his advice even in his most secret affairs; and had recourse to him in all difficult emergencies, as to an oracle of wisdom and profound policy. Francis did not make so secret a private correspondence; and Henry was so possessed in favour of the great capacity of his minister, that he said he very much believed he would govern France as well as himself.

When matters seemed sufficiently prepared, Boniviet opened to the cardinal his master's desire of recovering Tournay; and Wolsey immediately, without hesitation, engaged to effect his purpose. He took an opportunity of representing to the king and council, that Tournay lay so remote from Calais, that it would be very difficult, if not impossible, in case of war, to keep the communication open between these two places; that as it was situated on the frontiers both of France and the Netherlands, it was exposed to attacks from both these countries, and must necessarily, either by force or famine, fall into the hands of the first assailant: that even in time of peace it could not be preserved without a large garrison, to restrain the numerous and mutinous inhabitants, ever discontented with the English government; and that the possession of Tournay, as it was thus precarious and expensive, so was it of no usefulness, and afforded little or no means of gaining, on occasion, the dominions either of Charles or of Francis.

Tournay ceded to England. These reasons were of themselves con-"   fident, and were sufficient with no opposition when they came from the mouth of the cardinal. A treaty, therefore, was entered into for the ceding of Tournay; and in order to give to that measure a more graceful appearance, it was agreed that the dauphin and the Princess Mary, both of them infants, should be betrothed, and that this city should be considered as the dowry of the princess. Such kinds of agreement were then common among sovereigns, though it was very rare that the interests and views of the parties were so steady as to render the intended marriage effectual. But as Henry had been at considerable expense in building a citadel at Tournay, Francis agreed to pay him 600,000 crowns at twelve annual payments, to put into his hands eight hostages, all of them men of quality, for the performance of the article; and, lest the cardinal should think himself neglected in these stipulations, Francis promised him a yearly pension of twelve thousand livres, as an equivalent for the administration of the bishopric of Tournay.

The French monarch, having succeeded so well in this negotiation, began to enlargie his views, and to hope for more considerable rewards, passages in the van of his thoughts and self-conceit of the favourite. He redoubled his flat-terces to the cardinal, consulted him more frequently in every doubt or difficulty, called him in each letter, father, tutor, governor, and professed the most unbounded dependence on his advice and opinion. The Cardinal prepared for a negotiation for the delivery of Calais, in consideration of a sum of money to be paid for it; and if we may credit Polydore Virgil, who bears a particular allusion to this, the Cardinal was being dishonest in his employment and thrown into prison by that minister, so extraordinary a proposal met with a favourable reception from the cardinal. He ventured not, however, to lay the matter before the council; he was content to sound privately the opinion of the other ministers, by dropping hints in conversation, as if he thought Calais a useless burden to the kingdom; but when he found that all men were strongly riveted in a contrary persuasion, he thought it dangerous to proceed any further in his purpose; and as he fell soon after into new connexions with the King of Spain, the great friendship between Francis and him began gradually to decline.

The pride of Wolsey was now more increased by a great accession of power and pretentious dignity. Cardinal Campeggio had been sent as legate into England, in order to procure a tithe from the clergy, which Wolsey refuse to pay to the Pope; a danger which was became real, when he was formed to all Christendom, but on which the politics of the court of Rome had built so many interesting projects, that it had lost all influence on the minds of men. The clergy were by no means disposed to procuare the Pope the candidate he was recalled: and the king desired of the Pope that Wolsey, who had been joined in this commission, might alone be invested with the legatine power, together with the right of visiting all the clergy and monasteries, and even with suspending all the laws of the church during a twelvemonth. Wolsey having obtained this new dignity, made a new display of that state and parade to which he was much addicted. On these occasions, he was not content with the mass alone after the manner of the Pope himself: not only had he bishops and abbots to serve him; he even engaged the first nobility to give him water and the towel. He affected a rank superior to what had ever been claimed by any churchman in England. Warham, the Primate, having written him a letter, in which he subscribed himself, your loving brother, Wolsey complained of his presumption, in thus challenging an equality with him. When Warham was told what offence he had given, he made light of the matter:—'Know ye not,' said he, 'that this man is drunk with too much prosperity?'

But Wolsey carried the matter much further: for with the title of a cardinal he erected an office, which he called the legatine court; and as he was now, by means of the Pope's commission and the king's favour, invested with all power, both ecclesiastical and civil, no man knew what bounds were to be set to the authority of his new tribunal. He conferred on it a kind of inquisitorial and censorial powers, even over the lay, and directed it to inquire into all matters of conscience; into all conduct which had given scandal; into all actions which, though they escaped the law, might appear contrary to good morals. Offence was taken at this commission, which was really unbounded; and the people were the more disgusted, when they saw a man, who indulged himself in so much pride and pleasure, so severe in repressing the least appearance of licentiousness in others. But to render his court more obnoxious, Wolsey made one John Allen judge in it, a person of scandalous life, whom he himself, as chancellor, had himself judged, condemned for perjury; and as it is pretended, that this man either extorted fines from every one whom he was pleased to find guilty, or took bribes to drop prosecutions, men concluded, and with some appearance of reason, that he might have been in communication with the cardinal himself. The clergy, and in particular the monks, were exposed to this tyranny; and as the libertinism of their lives often gave a just handle against them, they were obliged to purchase a discharge, by paying the composition, which the legate or his judge. Not content with this authority, Wolsey pretended, by virtue of his commission, to assume the jurisdiction of all the bishops' courts; particularly that of judging of wills and testament. And his decisions in those important points were deemed not a little arbitrary. As if he himself were Pope and bishop of the Father of his Church, he absolutely dispose of every ecclesiastical precept, he presented to whatever princes or benefices he pleased, without regard to the right of election in the monks, or of perpetuity to the abbeys. Thus he set himself up as a judge, an expectation, Marignan, in the, action. And if he be not, as he himself holds, "is not so blind anywhere as in his own house: but do you, father," added he to the primate, "go to Wolsey, and tell him, if any thing be amiss, that he amend it."

A reproach of this kind was not likely to be effectual: it only served to augment Wolsey's enmity to Warham: but one London having prosecuted Allen, the legate's judge, in a court of law, and having convicted him of malversation and insolvency, the clamour at last reached the king's ear; and he was apprised of such displeasure to the cardinal, as made him ever after more cautious in exerting his authority.

While Henry, indulging himself in pleasure and amusement, intrusted the government of this imperious minister, an incident happened abroad, which excited his attention. Maximilian the emperor died; and though the imperial see was not vacated, yet such was the consequence; but as his death left vacant the first station among Christian princes, it set the passions of men in agitation, and proved a kind of era in the general system of Europe. The last of the kings of France and Spain immediately declared themselves candidates for the imperial crown; and employed every expedient of war or intrigue, which promised them success in so great a prize. Henry, who was encouraged to advance his pretensions; his minister, Warham, who was despatched to the electors, found that he began to solace too late, and that the votes of all these princes were already pre-engaged either on one side or the other.

Francis and Charles made profession from the beginning of carrying on this rivalry with emulation, but without enmity; and Francis in particular declared, that his brother Charles and he were, fairly and openly, authors to the same maritime powers. He was encouraged to advance his pretensions; but his minister, Pace, who was despatched to the electors, found that he began to solace too late, and that the votes of all these princes were already pre-engaged either on one side or the other.

It was Charles, who at length prevailed, to the great disgrace and reproach of the French monarch, who still continued to the last in the action. The Duke of Buckingham, who, having engaged a college in his favour. And as he was some years superior in age to his rival, and, after his victory at Marignan, and conquest of the Milanese, much superior in the eyes of the world, he could not suppress his indignation at being thus, in the face of the world, after long and anxious expectation, disappointed in so important a pretension. From this competition, as much as from opposition of interests, arose that emulation between those two great maritime powers, which, for some years a whole age in their movement, sets them in such a remarkable contrast to each other; both of them princes endowed with talents and abilities; brave, aspiring, active, warlike; beloved by their servants and subjects, dreaded by their enemies, and respected by all the world: Francis, open, frank, liberal, munificent, carrying these virtues to an excess which prejudiced his affairs; Charles, political, close, artful, fraudulently; better qualified, in every respect, to be a monarch, and the electors, especially the latter. The one the more amiable man: the other the greater monarch. The king, from his over-sights and indiscretions, naturally exposed to misfortunes; but qualified, by his spirit and inconstancy, to extricate himself from them with honour: the emperor, by his designing interested character, fitted, in his greatest successes, to excite jealousy and opposition even among his allies, and to rob them of a multitude of enemies in the place of one whom he had subdued. And as the personal qualities of these princes thus counterpoised each other, so did the advantages and disadvantages of their dominions. Fortune alone, without the concurrence of prudence or valour, never produces a sudden change in the state of the world, that which centred in the Emperor Charles. He reaped the success of Castile, of Arragon, of Austria, of the Netherlands: be inherited the conquest of Naples, of Grenada; elected Henry the Tenth as his successor, and the whole power of the globe seemed to be enlarged a little before his time, that he might possess the whole treasure, as yet entire and unrivalled, of the new world. But though the concurrence of these advantages formed an empire, greater and more extensive than any known in Europe since that of the Romans, the kingdom of France alone, being close, compact, united, rich, populous, and being interposed between the provinces of the emperor's dominions, was able to make a vigorous opposition to his progress, and maintain the contest against him.

Henry possessed the feculency of being able, both by the native force of his kingdom and its situation, to hold the balance between the two powers; and to improve, by policy and prudence, this singular and inestimable advantage, he was really, by means of it, a greater potentate than either of those mighty monarchs, whom seemed to strive for the possession of the universal empire. This prince was, in his character, heedless, inconvenient, express, impolitic; guided by his passions or his favourite; vain, imperious, haughty; sometimes actuated by friendship for foreign powers, often by resentment, seldom by his true interest. And thus, though exulted in that superiority which his situation in Europe gave him, he never employed it to his own essential and durable advantage, or to that of his kingdom.

Francis was well acquainted with Henry's character, and endeavoured to accommodate himself to his conduct to it. He solicited an interview; and Francis at Warham Calais; in expectation of being able, by familiar conversation, to gain upon his friendship and confidence. Wolsey earnestly seconded this proposal; and hoped, in the presence of both courts, to make parade of his riches, his splendour, and his influence over both monarchs. As Henry himself loved show and magnificence, and had entertained a curiosity of being personally acquainted with the French king, he cheerfully adjusted all the preliminaries of this interview. The nobility of both nations was each engaged to make its expense: many of them involved themselves in great debts, and were not able, by the penury of their whole lives, to repair the vain splendour of a few days. The Duke of Buckingham, who, though very rich, was somewhat addicted to frugality, finding his preparations for this festival amount to immense sums, threw out some expressions of displeasure against the cardinal, whom he believed the author of that measure; an imprudence which was not forgotten by this minister.

While Henry was preparing to depart for Calais, he heard that the emperor was arrived at Dover; and he immediately hastened to meet him at Tilbury, 25th May.

The Emperor's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to this country, but that which, however, very suspicious, both of the open pronouncement of the homilies, and because the parliament, when they afterwards examined Wolsey's conduct, could find no proof of any material offence he had ever committed to that was the sole point of elevation beyond his present greatness, it was sure to attract his wishes with the same ardour as if fortune had never yet favoured him with any of her presents. In confidence of reaching this dignity by the emperor's assistance, he secretly devoted himself to that monarch's interests; and Charles was perhaps the more liberal of his promises, because Leo was a very young man, and had only lived many years, he should be called upon to fulfil his engagements. Henry easily observed this courtship paid to his minister; but instead of taking umbrage at it, he only made it a subject of vanity; and believed that, as his favour was Wolsey's sole object, the manner of such mighty monarchs to his servant, was in reality a more conspicuous homage to his own grandeur.

The day of Charles's departure, Henry 20th May. went over to Calais with the queen and his whole court; and thence proceeded to Guines, a small town near the frontiers. Francis, attended in like manner, came to Arders, a few miles distant; and the two monarchs met, for the first time, in the fields, at a place situated between these two towns, but still within the English pale: for Francis agreed to pay this compliment to Henry, in consideration of that prince's passing the sea that he might be present to witness Wolsey's coronation, which had intrusted the regulation of the ceremonial, contrived this circumstance, in order to do honour to his master. The nobility both of France and England here displayed their magnificence with such emulation and profuse expenditure, as to the place of interview the name of the field of the clothe of gold.

The two monarchs, after saluting each other in the most cordial manner, retired into a tent which had been erected on this occasion; and there they held a long conference together. Henry here proposed to make some amendments on the articles of their former alliance; and he began to read the treaty, I, Henry, king: these were the first words; and he stopped short. He subjoined only the words of England, without adding France, the usual style of the English monarchs. Francis remarked this delicacy, and expressed by a smile his approbation of it.

He took an opportunity soon after of paying a compliment to Henry, of a more flattering nature. That generous prince, full of honour himself and incapable of distrustimg others, was shocked at all the precautions which were observed, whenever he had an interview with the English monarch; the manner of their guards and attendants, and carefuuly reconnned on both sides: every step was scrupulously measured and adjusted: and if the two kings in tended to pay a visit to the queens, they departed from the camp, attended by their guards at the same time, which marked by the firing of a cannon; they passed each other in the middle point between the places; and the moment that Henry entered Arders, Francis put himself into the hand of the English at Guines. In order to break off this tedious ceremonial, which contained so many dishonourable implications, Francis, one day, took with him two gentlemen and a page, and rode directly into Guines. The guards were surprised at the presence of the monarch, who called aloud to them, You are all my prisoners: carry me to your master. Henry was equally astonished at the appearance of Francis; and taking him in his arms, My brother, said he, you have here played me the most adorable trick in the world, and have showed me the full confidence I may place in you; I surrender myself your prisoner from this moment. He took from his neck a collar of pearls worth 15,000 angels; and putting it about Francis's neck, begged him to wear it for the sake of his prisoner. Francis agreed, but on condition that Henry should wear a bracelet, of which he made him a present, and which was double in value to the collar. The king went away from the camp, without guards; and confidence being now fully established between the monarchs, they employed the rest of the time entirely in tournaments and festivals.

A letter was sent by the two kings to each other's court, and through all the chief cities in Europe, importing that Henry and Francis, with fourteen aids, would be ready, in the plains of Picardy, to answer all comers that were gentlemen, at tilt, tournament, and barbers. The monarchs, in order to fulfil this challenge, advanced into the field on horseback, Francis surrounded with Henry's guards, and Henry with those of Francis. They were gorgeously apprised; and were both of them the most expert in every military exercise. They carried away the prize at all trials in those rough and dangerous pastimes; and several horses and riders were overthrown by their vigour and dexterity. The ladies were the judges in these feats of arms, and the emperor and monarchs, whenever they judged it expedient. Henry erected a spacious house of wood and canvas, which had been framed in London; and there he feasted the French monarch. He had placed a monarch on this fab. under the best English archer embroidered on it, Cos used, a present. He presents whom I favour: expressing his own situation, as holding in his hands the balance of power among the potentates of Europe. In these entertainments, more than in any serious business, did the two kings pass their time, till their departure.

Henry paid then a visit to the emperor 24th June. and was received by him, whom both kings had engaged to go with him to Calais, and pass some days in that fortress. The artful and politic Charles here completed the impression, which he had begun to make on Henry and his favourite, and effaced all the friendship between the Frank and English monarchs, Francis had given birth. As the house of Austra began sensibly to take the ascendancy over the French monarch, the interests of England required, that some support should be given to his friends, and which important wars should be prevented, which might bestow on either of them a decisive superiority over the other. But the jealousy of the English against France has usually prevented a cordial union to which everything amiable in the nature of this hereditary amity, and desirous further to flatter Henry's vanity, had made him an offer, (an offer in which Francis was afterwards obliged to concur,) that he should be entirely upon his own account and at his choice, that might arise between the monarchs. But the masterpiece of Charles's politics was the securing of Wolsey in his interests, by very important services, and still higher promises. He renewed assurances of assisting him in obtaining the papacy; and he put in present possession of the revenues belonging to the see of Badajoz and Valencina in Castile. The acquisitions of Wolsey were now come so exorbitant, that, joined to the pensions which he received after his return from the war, his revenues were computed nearly to equal those which belonged to the crown itself; and he spent them with a magnificence, or rather an ostentation, which gave great uneasiness to the people, and even lessened his master in the eyes of all foreign nations.

The violent personal emulation and political jealousy which had taken place between the emperor and the French king, and which were soon broke out in bussilities. While these ambitious and warlike princes were acting against each other in almost every part of Europe, they still made professions of the strongest desire of peace; and both of them agreed to be freed from the homage which his ancestors had always done for Flanders and Artois, and which he himself had, by the treaty of Noyon, engaged to renew. On France's rejecting these terms, the congress of Calais broke up, and Wolsey, soon after, took a journey to Bruges, where he met with the emperor.

He was received with the same state, magnificence, and respect, as if he had been the King of England himself; and he concluded, in his master's name, an offensive alliance with the Pope and the emperor against France. It was observed that England should next summer invade that kingdom, with forty thousand men; and he betrothed to Charles the princess Mary, the king's only child, who had now some prospect of inheriting the crown. The warning was given to the cardinal; he was associated in the interests, and might have proved fatal to the liberty and independence of the kingdom, was the result of the humours and prejudices of the king, and the private views and expectations of the cardinal.

The people saw, every day, new instances of the uncontrolled sway of this minister. The Duke of Buckingham, constable of England, the first nobleman, both for family and fortune, in the kingdom, had imprudently given disgust to the cardinal; and it was not long before he found reason to repent of his indiscretion.

The Duke of Buckingham was a man full of levity and rash projects; and being infatuated with his passion for judicial astrology, he entertained a commerce with one Hopkins, a Carthusian friar, who encouraged him in the notion of his mounting, one day, the throne of England. He was descended, by a female, from the Duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Edward III.; and though his claim to the crown was thereby very remote, he had been so engaged as to let fall some expressions, as if he thought himself best entitled, in case the king should die without issue, to possess the royal dignity. He had not even abstained from threats against the king's life, and had provided himself with arms, which he intended to employ in case a favourable opportunity should offer. He was brought to a trial; and the Duke of Norfolk, Earl of Arundel, and married Buckingham's daughter, was created Lord Steward, in order to preside at this solemn procedure. The jury consisted of a duke, a marquis, seven ears, and twelve barons; and they gave their verdict against Buckingham, which was soon after carried into execution. There is no reason to think the sentence unjust; but as Buckingham's crimes seemed to proceed more from indiscretion than deliberate malice, the people, who loved him, expected that the king, by carrying it into effect, would have made his disappointment to the amusement and revenge of the cardinal. The king's own jealousy, however, of all persons allied to the crown, was, notwithstanding his undoubted fault, his conviction, and his resolution, with the instance of his son, was alone sufficient to render him implacable against Buckingham. The office of constable, which this nobleman inherited from the Bohuns, Earls of Hereford, was forfeited, and was never after revived in England.

A.D. 1521.

During some years, many parts of Europe had been agitated with those religious controversies which produced the Reformation, one of the greatest events in history: but as it was not till this time that the King of England publicly took part in the quarrel, we had no occasion to give any account of its rise and progress. It will now be necessary to explain these theological disputes; or, what is more material, to trace from their origin those abuses which so generally diffused the opinion, that a reformation of the church, or ecclesiastical order, was become highly expedient, if not absolutely necessary. We shall be better enabled to comprehend the subject, if we take the matter a little higher, and reflect a moment on the reasons why there must be an ecclesiastical order and a public establishment of religion in every community. The present occasion will, I hope, excuse this short digression.

Most of the arts and professions in a state are of such a nature, that, while they promote the interests of the society, they are also useful or agreeable to some individuals; and in that case, the constant rule of the magistrate, except, perhaps, on the first introduction of any art, is to leave the profession to itself, and to restrain in no wise the operation of the same, provided it do not interfere with the public advantage. But the church, in its present state, is not so conducted, and the benefit of it. The ariawins, finding their profits to rise by the favour of their customers, increases, as much as possible, their skill and industry; and as matters are not disturbed by any injudicious tampering, the commodity is always sure to be at all times nearly proportioned to the demand.

But there are also some callings, which, though useful, and even necessary in a state, bring no particular advantage or pleasure to any individual; and the supreme power is obliged to alter its conduct with regard to the retainers of those professions. It must give them public encouragement, in order to their subsistence; and it must at the same time consider how this can be done without really be subject, either by annexing peculiar honours to the profession, by establishing a long subordination of ranks and a strict dependence, or by some other expedient. The persons employed in the finances, armies, fleets, and magistracy, are thereby made instruments of its power.

It may naturally be thought, at first sight, that the ecclesiastics belong to the first class, and that their encouragement, as well as that of lawyers and physicians, may safely be intrusted to the liberty of individuals, who are attached to their doctrines, and who find benefit or consolation from their spiritual ministry and assistance. Their industry and vigilance will, no doubt, be whetted by such an additional motive; and their skill in their profession, as well as their address in governing the minds of the people, must receive daily increase, from their increasing practice, study, and attention.

But if we consider the matter more closely, we shall find, that this interested diligence of the clergy is what every wise legislator will study to prevent; because, in every religion, except the true, it is highly pernicious, and it has even a natural tendency to pervert the true, by introducing coarse, shallow, fruitless, and foolish doctrines, to become the great and unavoidable error, and to mar the soul, in lieu of the truth, to which we are to aspire. men, who always adhere closely together, and who never want a plausible pretence for their encroachments and usurpations. The higher dignities of the church served, indeed, to the support of gentry and nobility; but by the establishment of the next, many of the lowest vales were taken from the useful arts, and maintained in those receptacles of sloth and ignorance. The supreme head of the church was a foreign potentate, guided by interests always different from those of the community, sometimes contrary to what was necessary to preserve the hierarchy, as the bishop of Rome was continually solicitous to preserve an union of faith, rites, and ceremonies, all liberty of thought ran a manifest risk of being extinguished; and violent persecutions, or what was worse, a subversion of the church, took place everywhere. To increase these evils, the church, though she possessed large revenues, was not contented with her acquisitions, but retained a power of practising farther on the ignorance of mankind. She even bestowed on each individual priest a power of enriching himself by the voluntary obligations of the faithful, and left him still an urgent motive for diligence and industry in his calling. And thus, that church, though an expensive and burdensome establishment, was liable to many of the inconveniences which belong to an order of priests trusting entirely to their own art and invention for obtaining a subsistence.

The advantages attending the Romish hierarchy were but little in proportion for its decay. The ecclesiastical privileges, during barbarous times, had served as a check on the despotism of kings. The union of all the western churches under the supreme pontiff, facilitated their mutual transactions, and tended to bind all the parts of Europe into a close connexion with each other. And the pomp and splendour of worship which belonged to so opulent an establishment, contributed in some respect to the encouragement of the fine arts, and began to diffuse a general elegance of taste, by uniting it with religion.

It will easily be conceived, that though the balance of evil prevailed in the Romish church, this was not the chief reason which produced the reformation. A concurrence of accidents must have contributed to forward that great revolution.

Leo X. by his generous and enterprising temper, had much exhausted his treasury, and was obliged to employ every invention, which might yield money, in order to support the Ordin of the port his projects, pleasures, and liberalities.

Reformation.

The scheme of selling indulgences was suggested to him, as an expedient which had often served in former times to draw money from the Christian world, and make devout people willing contributors to the grandeur and riches of the court of Rome. The church, it was supposed, possessed a great stock of merit, as being entitled to all the good works of all the saints, beyont and below the pale of time; and the decrees of the church were superior even to the merits of Christ himself, which were infinite and unbounded: and from this unexhausted treasury the Pope might retail particular portions, and by that means acquire money, to be employed in pious purposes, in resisting the inbels, or subduing schismatics. When the money came into his exchequer, the greater part of it was usually diverted to other purposes.

It is commonly believed that Leo, from the penetration of his genius, and his familiarity with ancient literature, was fully acquainted with the ridicule and falsity of the doctrines which, as supreme pontiff, he was obliged by his interest to promote: it is the less wonder, therefore, that he employed for this profit those pious frauds which his predecessors, the most ignorant and credulous, had always, under plausible pretences, made use of for their selfish purposes. He published the sale of a general indulgence; and as his expenses had not only exhausted his usual revenue, but even anticipated the money expected from this extraordinary expedient, the several branches of it were openly given away to particular persons, who were entitled to levy the imposition. The produce, particularly, of Saxony and the countries bordering on the Baltic, was assigned to the Magdeburg, and Lübeck, the natural son of Innocent VIII.; and she, in order to enhance her profit, had farmed out the revenue to one Arcembolb, a Genoese, once a merchant, now a bishop, who still retained and sold all the innumerable privileges of his former profession. The Austin friars had usually been employed in Saxony to preach the indulgences, and from this trust had derived both profit and consideration: but Arcembolb, fearing lest practice might have taught them means to secure their benefit, and especially to ensure success from the ordinary methods of collection, gave this occupation to the Dominicans. These monks, in order to prove themselves worthy of the distinction conferred on them, exaggerated the benefits of indulgences by the most unbounded panegyrics; and advanced doctrines on that head, which, though not more ridiculous than those already received, were not as yet entirely familiar to the ears of the people. To add to the scandal, the collectors of this revenue are said to have lived very licentious lives, and to have spent in taverns, gaming-houses, and places still more infamous, the money which devout persons had saved from their usual expenses, in order to purchase a palliative measure of indulgence.

All these circumstances might have given Martin Luther, offence, but would have been attended with no event of any importance, had there not arisen a man who was capable of rendering the Pope so much the more explicable. This was John Calvin, a young minister in the church of Geneva, and father, an Austin friar, professor in the university of Wittenberg, resenting the afront put upon his order, began to preach against these abuses in the sale of indulgences; and being naturally of a fiery temper, and provoked by opposition, he proceeded even to decry indulgences themselves; and was thence carried, by the heat of dispute, to question the authority of the Pope, from which his adversaries derived their chief arguments against him. Still, to be enlarged his reading in order to support his tenets, he discovered some new abuse or error in the church of Rome; and finding his opinions greedily hearkened to, he promulgated them by writing, discourse, sermon, conference; and daily increased the number of his disciples. All Saxony, all Germany, all Europe, were in a very little time filled with the voice of this daring innovator; and men, roused from that lethargy in which they had so long slept, began to fall in question of predestination, of the state of the dead, of the Jews, of the Devil, of the reprobate, of perdition; and, to come to the main point, of the doctrine of indulgences.

The Elector of Saxony, favourable to Luther’s doctrine, protected him from the violence of the papal jurisdiction; the republic of Zürich even reformed their church according to the new model: many of the princes of the empire, who were thoroughly converted by Calvinism, showed a favourable disposition towards it; and Luther, a man naturally inflexible, vehement, opponentistic, was become incapable, either from promises of advancement or terrors of severity, to relinquish a sect of which he was the founder, and which brought him a glory superior to all others, the glory of dictating the religious faith and principles of multitudes.

The rumour of these innovations soon reached England; and as there still subsisted in that kingdom great remains of the Lollards, whose principles resembled those of Luther, the new doctrines secretly gained many partisans among the laity of all ranks and denominations. But Henry had been educated in such a state of ignorance, that he had no knowledge of the church of Rome, and he bore a particular prejudice against Luther, who, in his writings, spoke with contempt of Thomas Aquinas, the king’s favourite author; he was opposed to himself, therefore, to the progress of the Lutheran doctrine, and more stanchly opposed it, by all the influence which his extensive and almost abso-
But placed all merit in a mysterious species of faith, in inward vision, rapture, and ecstasy. The new sectaries, seized with this spirit, were indefatigable in the propagation of their doctrines; and of the mathematical and punishments with which the Roman pontiff endeavoured to overwhelm them.

That the civil power, however, might afford them protection against their ecclesiastical adversaries, Luther himself advanced doctrines favourable in some respect to the temporal authority of sovereigns. They inveighed against the abuses of the court of Rome, with which men were at that time generally discontented; and they exhorted princes to renounce themselves in those powers of which the exorbitant spirit of the ecclesiastics, especially of the sovereign pontiff, had so long leveraged them. They condemned celibacy and monastic vows, and thereby opened the doors of the convents to those who were either tired of the obedience and chastity, or disgusted with the licence, in which they had hitherto lived. They blamed the excessive riches, the alienness, the libertinism of the clergy; and pointed out their treasures and revenues as lawful spoil to the first invader. And as the ecclesiastics had hitherto conducted a willing and a stupid audience, and were totally unacquainted with controversy, much more with every species of reasoning, they concluded that, in order to retard its progress, died in the flower of his age, a little after he received the king's book against Luther; and he was succeeded in the papal chair by Adrian, a Fleming, who had written many tracts in contemplation against the books of the Jean Calvin. This man endeavoured to gain on the reformers, by the integrity, candour, and simplicity of manners, which distinguished his character; but, so violent were their prejudices against the church, he rather hurt the cause by his impatient exercise of those virtues. He frankly confessed, that many abominable and detestable practices prevailed in the court of Rome; and by this sincere avowal he gave occasion of much triumph to the Lutherans. This pontiff, also, whose penetration was not equal to his good intentions, was seduced to concur in that league which Charles 5 and Henry had formed against France; and he thereby augmented the scandal occasioned by the practice of so many preceding Popes, who still made their spiritual arms subservient to political purposes.

The emperor, who knew that Wolsey had received a disappointment in his ambitious hopes, by the election of Adrian, and who dreaded the resentment of that haughty minister, was solicitous to repair the breach made in their friendship by this incident. He paid another visit to England; and, besides flattering the vanity of the king and the cardinal, he renewed to Wolsey all the promises which he had made him, of securing his pretensions to the papal throne. Wolsey, sensible that Adrian's great age and infirmities promised a speedy vacancy, dissembled his resentment, and was willing to hope for a more prosperous issue to the next election. The emperor renewed the treaty made at Bruges, to which some scruples were added; and he agreed to indemnify both the king and Wolsey, for the money which they were allowed by a humble submission. The more to ingratiate himself with Henry and the English nation, he gave to Surrey, Admiral of England, commission for being admiral of his dominions; and he himself was installed Knight of the Garter at London. After a stay of six weeks in England, and duration of four months in Flanders, the reformation of the clergy and of the church, of which admitted of no observances, rites, or ceremonies, but Francis's refusal to submit to his arbitration, and his sending Albany into Scotland. This last step had not been taken by the French king, till he was quite assured of Henry's desire, in that place, which was no more spared by the soldiers than the goods of the French. Surrey then left the charge of the fleet to the vice-admiral; and sailed to Calais, where he took the command of the English army, and left the Monseigneur to take the castle of Calais. This army, when joined by forces from the Low Countries, under the command of the Count de Buren, amounted in the whole to 18,000 men.

Invasion of France.

The French had made it a maxim in almost all their wars with the English since the reign of Charles V., never, without great necessity, to hazard a general engagement; and the Duke of Vendome, who commanded the French army, now embraced this wise policy. He supplied the towns most exposed, especially Boulogne, Montreuil, Tournai, Hesdin, with strong garrisons and plenty of provisions: he himself took post at Abbeville, with some Swiss and French infantry, and a body of the Count of Normandy encamped under Montreuil with six thousand men. These two bodies were so in a situation to join upon occasion; to throw supply into any town that was threatened; and to harass the English in every movement. Surrey was now provided with these forces, first divided his troops for the greater security of subsewing them; but finding that his quarters were every moment beaten up by the activity of the French generals, he drew together his forces, and had siege to Henry. But neither did he succeed in this enterprise. The garrison made vigorous sallies upon his army: the French forces assaulted him from without: great rains fell: fatigue and bad weather threw the soldiers into dysentery; and Surrey was obliged to raise the siege and put his troops into winter-quarters about the end of October. His rear-guard was attacked at Arras, and five or six hundred men were cut off; nor could all his efforts make him master of one place within the French frontiers. The allies were more successful in Italy. Lautrec, who commanded the French, lost a great battle at Biccocca, near Milan; and was obliged to retire with the remains of his army. This misfortune, which proceeded from Francis's negligence in not supposing Lautrec with money, was followed by the loss of Genoa. The castle of Cremona was the sole fortress in Italy which remained in the hands of the French.

For the purpose now in such a situation, and so connected by different alliances and interests, that it was almost impossible for war to be kindled in one part and not diffuse itself throughout the whole: but of all the leagues among kings, the least was that which had so long subsisted between France and Scotland; and the English, while at war with the former nation, could not hope to remain War with long unmolested on the northern frontier.

Scotland. No sooner had Albany arrived in Scotland, than he took measures for kindling a war with England; and he summoned the whole force of the kingdom to meet in the fields of Rosine. He then conducted the army southwards into Ayrshire; and prepared to pass the borders at Solway-Firth. But many of the nobility were disgusted with the regent's administration; and observing that his connexions with Scotland were feeble in comparison of those which he maintained with France, they murmured that, for the sake of foreign interests, their peace should so often be disturbed, and war, during their king's minority, be wantonly entered into with a neighbouring nation, so much superior in force and riches. downwards along the banks of the Tweed, keeping that river on his right; and fixed his camp opposite to Wark-castle, which Surrey had lately repaired. He sent over some troops to besiege it, and stormed some of the outworks: but the regent, hearing of the approach of an English army, and discouraged by the advanced season, thought proper to disband his army, and return for refuge in England. He went over to France, and never again returned to Scotland.
The Scottish nation, agitated by their domestic factions, were not during several years in a condition to give any more disturbance to England; and Henry had full leisure to carry on his projects.

The reason why the war against France proceeded so slowly on the part of England, was the want of money. All the treasures of Henry VII. were long ago dissipated; the king's habits of expense still remained, and his revenues were unequal even to the ordinary charge of government, much more to his military enterprises. He had last year caused a general survey to be made of the kingdom; the numbers of men, their years, profession, stock, revenue; and expressed great satisfaction on finding the nation so opulent. He then issued privy seals to the most wealthy, demanding loans of particular sums; the act of power was fatal. The levies stra-cial, had been formerly practised by kings of England; and the people were now familiarized to it. But Henry this year carried his authority much further. He published an edict for a general tax upon his subjects, which he still called a levy, and was imposed on the clergy, but mostly upon the commons, two shillings upon the livery. This pretended loan, as being more regular, was really more dangerou.s to the liberties of the people; and was a prede-cent for the king's imposing taxes without consent of par-

Henry VIII.

A parliament, together with a convocation; and found members of the one in a dispute to claim the infringement of their privileges. It was only doubted how far they would carry their liberality to the king. Wolsey, who had undertaken the management of the affair, began with the convocation, in hopes that their example would influence the parliament to grant a large supply. He demanded a moiety of the ecclesiastical revenues to be beived in five years, or two shillings in the pound during that time; and though he met with opposition, he recommended the traitorous members in such severe terms, that his request was at last complied with. The cardinal afterward, attended by several of the nobility and prelates, came to the House of Commons; and, in a long and elaborate speech, declared the necessity of an invasion from Scotland, the affrights received from France, the league in which the king was engaged with the Pope and the emperor; and he demanded a grant of 800,000 pounds, divided into four years, and represented a sum computed from the late survey or valuation, to be equal to four shillings in the pound of one year's revenue, or one shilling in the pound yearly, according to the division proposed. 4 So large a grant was unusual from the Commons; and though the cardinal's demand was seconded by Sir Thomas More, the Speaker, and several other members attached to the court, the House could not be prevailed with to comply. They only voted two shillings in the pound, upon an idea that the nation had enjoyed twenty pounds a year, and upwards; one shilling on all who possessed twenty pounds and forty shillings a year; and on the other subjects, above sixteen years of age, a great head. This was a sixpence upon each man; the former into four; and was, not therefore, at the earnest, above shrieve in the pound. The grant of the Commons was but the moiety supplied; and the carddinal, therefore, much mortified with the disappointment, came again to the House, and desired to reason with such as refused to comply with the king's request. He was told, that it was a rule of the House, never to reason but in their own body, and by themselves. He therefore re-ected the grant, and voted an imposition of three shillings in the pound on all possessed of fifty pounds a year and upwards. 5 The proceedings of this first form of the Commons, however, enlarged a little their former grant, and voted an imposition of fifteen shillings in the pound on all possessed of one hundred pounds a year and upwards. 6 The pro-

5 It is said that when Henry heard that the Commons made a great difference, he had his head in a scarf, and heard the speaker and the prime minister ask him what he would do, and he, with some difficulty, answered 'I shall not yield, and the head of ours shall be off.' Thisanswer, being reported to Henry, seemed to satisfy the king; the Commons then being met by invitation, he told them plainly, that it was better that some one should suffer, than that the House of Commons should have their heads cut off. We are told by Hali, fol. 30, that Cardinal Wolsey appeared to the House of Commons, in the same matter, and asked them if they had submitted to hear him speak in those words. 'Heaven will not suffer them to fall, but he will take the heads of the Commons, and lay them at the feet of the Commons.' The Commons were so well satisfied with this, that they-V. guilting himself in many military enterprises, he was adorned with every accomplishment which became a person of his high station. His virtues, embellished with the graces of youth, had made such impression on Louise of Savoy, Francis's mother, that, without regard to the inequality of their years, she made him proposals of marriage; and, meeting with a repulse, she formed schemes of undertaking to force his hand. But there was a woman, false, deceitful, vindictive, malicious; but unhappy for France, had, by her capacity, which was considerable, acquired an absolute ascendancy over her son. By her instigation, she obtained in the constable, of which it was difficult for a gallant spirit to endure; and, at last, he permitted Louise to prosecute a law-suit against him, by which, on the most frivolous pretences, he was deprived of his ample possessions; and inevitable ruin was brought upon him.

Bourbon, provoked at these indignities, and thinking that, if any injuries could justify a man in rebellion against his prince and country, he must stand acquitted, had entered into a secret correspondence with the emperor and the King of England.4 Francis, pertinacious in his purpose of recovering the Milanese, had intended to lead his army in person into Italy; and Bourbon, who feared sickness, in order to have the advantage of hastening that purpose as soon as the king should have passed the Alps, to raise an insurrection among his numerous vassals, by whom he was extremely beloved, and to introduce foreign enemies into the heart of the kingdom, had got the design of his design; but as he was not expeditious enough in securing so dangerous a foe, the constable made his escape; and, entering into the emperor's service, employed all the force of his enterprise spirit, and his great talents to that of the defence of his own country.

The King of England, desirous that Francis should undertake his Italian expedition, did not openly threaten Picardy this year with an invasion; and it was late before the king of England, who commanded the English forces, passed over to Calais. He was attended by the Lords Montacute, Herbert, Ferrars, Morney, Sandys, Berkeley, Powis, and many other noblemen of that and from France. The English army, reinforced by some troops drawn from the garison of Calais, amounted to about 12,000 men; and having joined an equal number of Flemings under the Count De Biron, they prepared for the invasion of France. The siege of Boulogne was first proposed; but that enterprise appearing difficult, it was thought more advisable to leave this town behind them. The frontier of Picardy was very ill provided with troops; and the only defence of that part of the kingdom was the activity of the French officers, who infested the allied army in their march, and threw garrisons, with great expedition, into every town which was threatened by them. After crossing the Somme, and reaching Flers, the English and Flemings presented themselves before Bray, a place of small force, which commanded a bridge over that river. Here they were resolved to pass, and, if possible, to take up winter-quarters in France; but Crequi threw himself into the town, and seemed resolute to defend it. The allies attacked him with vigour and success; and when he retreated over the bridge, they pursued him so hotly, that they allowed him not time to break it down, but passed it along with him, and totally routed his army. They next advanced to Montdidier, which they besieged, and took by capitulation. Meeting with no opposition, they proceeded to the river Oise, within eleven leagues of Paris, and threw that city into great consternation; till the Duke of Vendome hastened with some forces to its relief. The confederates, afraid of being surrounded, and of being reduced to extremities during so advanced a season, thought proper to retreat. Montdidier was abandoned: and the English and Flemings, without effecting any thing, retired into their respective countries.

France defended herself from the other invasions with equal vigour. But, on the 12th July, twelve thousand Languequens broke into Burgundy under the command of the Count of Furstenberg. The Count of Guise, who
They all concluded that he had intended to put himself in possession of that important duchy, and reduce Italy to subjection: Clement, in particular, actuated by this jealousy, and confirmed by the representations of the emperor, that he sent orders to his nuncio at London, to mediate a reconciliation between France and England. But affairs were not yet fully ripe for this change. Wolsey, disgusted with the emperor, but loth to consent to the view of the legates, determined that he himself should have the renown of bringing about that great alteration; and he engaged the king to reject the pope's mediation. A new treaty was even concluded between Henry and Charles for the invasion of France. Charles stipulated to supply the Duke of Bourbon with a powerful army, in order to conquer Provence and Dauphiny: Henry agreed to pay him a hundred thousand crowns for the first month; after which, he might choose, either to sell the intrenchments, or invade Picardy with a powerful army. Bourbon was to possess these provinces with the title of king; but to hold them in fee of Henry as King of France. The duchy of Burgundy was to be given to Charles: the rest of the kingdom to Henry.

This chimerical partition immediately failed of execution in the article which was most easily performed: Bourbon refused to furnish a duchy of that magnitude to his enterprise, however, against Provence still took place. A numerous army of Imperialists invaded that country, under his command and that of the Marquis Pescara. They laid siege to Marseilles, which, being weakly garrisoned, was immediately taken. The citizens defended themselves with such valour and obstinacy, that Bourbon and Pescara, who heard of the French king's approach with a numerous army, found themselves unequal to the necessity of raising the siege; and they led their forces, weakened, baffled, and dishonoured, into Italy.

Francis might now have enjoyed, in safety, the glory of repulsing all his enemies, in every attempt which they had hitherto made for winning his kingdom; but, as he received intelligence that the King of England, discouraged by his former fruitless enterprises, and disgusted with the emperor, was making no preparations for any attack on Picardy, he hastened under cover of the payment of his own army, and, notwithstanding the advanced season, he was immediately determined, contrary to the advice of his wiser counsellors, to lead his army into Italy. The king of France moved no sooner appeared in Piedmont, than he, Henry, threw the whole Milanese into consternation. The forces of the emperor and Sforza retired to Lodri; and had Francis been so fortunate as to pursue them with vigour, he would have obtained from this great undertaking a prospect of great success; but his ill-fated enterprise was dispersed: but his ill fate led him to besiege Pavia, a town of considerable strength, well garrisoned, and defended by Leyva, one of the bravest officers in the Spanish service. He received also a letter from his son, Henry, from the court of Pavia, for which Francis was of opinion to make an important place proved fruitless. He battered the walls, and made breaches; but, by the vigilance of Leyva, new intrenchments were instantly thrown up behind the breaches: he attempted to divert the course of the Ticino, which ran by the side of the city, and defended it; but an inundation of the river, destroyed, in one night, all the mounds which the soldiers, during a long time, and with infinite labour, had been erecting. Fatigue, and the cold and inroads of winter, had wasted the French army. The Imperial generals, meanwhile, were not inactive. Pescara and Lancrano, Viceroy of Naples, assembled forces from all quarters. Bourbon, having pawned his jewels, went into Germany, and with the money, aided by his personal interests, levied a body of twelve thousand Lanzenquets, with which he joined the Imperialists. This whole army advanced to raise the siege of Pavia, and the French king made the danger to the French become every day more imminent.

The state of Europe was such, during that age, that, partly from want of commerce and industry everywhere, except in Italy and the Low Countries, partly from the ravages, proceeded so far in opposition to the emperor, to make the danger to the French become every day more imminent.

The state of Europe was such, during that age, that, partly from want of commerce and industry everywhere, except in Italy and the Low Countries, partly from the ravages, proceeded so far in opposition to the emperor, that the emperor, had almost formed great monarchies, and their frugal maxims in granting
But as it is probable that Henry had never before carried his reflections so far, he was startled at this important event, and became sensible of his own danger, as well as that of Europe, from the loss of a proper counterpoise to the power of Charles. Instead of taking advantage, therefore, of the distressed condition of Francis, he was determined to lead him assistance to his present calamities and, as the greatest dangers of generosity, in raising a fallen enemy, coquered with his political interest, he hesitated the less in embracing these new measures. Some days before he had already taken place between Charles and Henry, and still more between Charles and Wolsey; and that powerful minister waited only for a favourable opportunity of revenging the disappointments which he had met with. The behaviour of Charles, immediately after the victory of Pavia, gave him occasion to revive the king's jealousy and suspicions. The emperor so ill supported the appearance of moderation, which he at first assumed, that he had already changed his usual style to Henry; and, instead of writing to him with his own hand, and subscribing himself your affectionate son and cousin; he dictated his letters to a secretary, and simply subscribed himself Charles. Wolsey also perceived a diminution in the caresses and presents which the emperor's letters to him were formerly loaded; and this last imprudence, proceeding from the intoxication of success, was probably more dangerous to Charles's interests than his arms.

Henry, though immediately determined to embrace new measures, was careful to save appearances in the change; and he caused rejoicings to be every where made on account of the victory of Pavia and the capture of Francis. He publicly dismissed a French envoy, whom he had formerly allowed, notwithstanding the war, to reside at London; but, upon the Regent of France's submissive application to him, he again opened a correspondence with her; and, besides assuring her of his friendship and protection, he exacted a promise that she never would consent to the dismembering of any province from the monarchy for her son's ransom. With the emperor, however, he put on the appearance of vigour and enterprise; and in order to have a pretence for breaking with him, he despatched Tonstal, Bishop of London, to Madrid, with proposals for a powerful invasion of France. He required that Charles should immediately enter Guinette at the head of a great army, in order to put him in possession of that province; and he demanded the payment of large sums of money which that prince had borrowed from him in his late journey to London. He knew that the emperor was in no condition of fulfilling either of these demands; and that he had as little inclination to make him master of such considerable territories upon the frontiers of Spain.

In the meantime, after his arrival in Madrid, informed his master that Charles, on his part, urged several complaints against England; and, in particular, was displeased with Henry, because last year he had neither continued his monthly payments to the Bourgeois, nor invaded Picardy, according to his stipulations. Tonstal added, that instead of expressing an intention to espouse Mary when she should be of age, the emperor had heartened to proposals for marrying his niece Isabella, Princess of Portugal, and that he had entered into a separate treaty with Francis, and seemed determined to repel all the advantages of the success with which fortune had crowned his arms.

Thus the king, influenced by all these motives, concluded at Moore his alliance with the Regent of France, and engaged to procure his son his liberty on reasonable conditions: the regent also, in another treaty, engaged the king from Henry's debts for one million eight hundred thousand crowns, to be discharged in half-yearly payments of fifty thousand crowns; after which, Henry was to receive, during his lifetime, a yearly pension of a hundred thousand. A large present of the hundred thousand crowns was also made to Wolsey for his good offices, but covered under the pretence of arrears due on the pension granted him for relinquishing the administration of Tournay.

Meanwhile Henry, foreseeing that this treaty with France might involve him in a war with the emperor, was also determined to fill his treasury by impositions upon his own subjects; and, as the parliament had discovered some reluctance in complying with his demands, he followed that custom of the French, of reviving some old pretences to make use of his prerogative alone for that purpose. He issued commissions to all the counties of England for levying four shillings in the pound. He also required Henry, three shillings and fourpence upon the latten; and so uncontrollable did he deem his authority, that he took no care to cover, as formerly, this arbitrary exaction, even under the slender pretence of a loan. But he soon found that he had presumed too far on the passive submission of his subjects. The people, displeased with an exaction beyond what was usually levied in those days, and further disgraced with the illegal method of imposition, began to murmur, complaints, opposition to the commissioners; and their refractory disposition threatened a general insurrection. Henry had the prudence to stop short in that dangerous path into which he had entered. He sent letters to all the counties, declaring that he meant to force by this arbitrary revenue he would take nothing from his subjects but by way of benevolence. He flattered himself that his condescension in employing that disguise would satisfy the people, and that no one would have the courage to render himself hostile to his authority, by refusing any payment required of him in this manner. But the spirit of opposition, once roused, could not so easily be quieted at pleasure. A lawyer, in the city, objecting the statute of Richard III., by which beggars were for good men and women, to be levied in any way, and the loaves were for ever abolished, it was replied by the court, that Richard being a usurper, and his parliament a factious assembly, its statutes could not bind a lawful and absolute sovereign; who, to satisfy his own private right, and needed not to court the favour of a licentious populace. The judges even went so far as to affirm positively, that the king might exact, by commission, any sum he pleased; and the privy council gave a ready assent to this decree, which annihilated the most valuable privilege of the people, and rendered all their other privileges precarious. Armed with such formidable authority, of royal prerogative and a pretence of law, Wolsey sent for the mayor of London, and desired to know what he was willing to give for the supply of the king's necessities. The mayor seemed desirous, before he should declare himself, to consult the common council: but the cardinal required an answer in a day, to the end that he might confer with himself about the benevolence, and be eluded by that means the danger of a formed opposition. Matters, however, went not on so smoothly in the country. An insurrection began to blossom forth, and several people were not headed by any considerable person, it was easy for the Duke of Suffolk, and the Earl of Surrey, now Duke of Norfolk, by employing persuasion and authority, to reduce the ringleaders to lay down their arms and surrender themselves prisoners. The king, finding it dangerous to punish criminals engaged in so popular a cause, was determined, notwithstanding his violent imperious temper, to grant them a general pardon; and he secretly imputed their guilt, not to their want of loyalty or affection, but to their poverty. The offenders were carried before the star-clambers, where, after a severe charge brought against them by the king's council, the cardinal said, "This is not a matter of law, but of grace." A miserable pardon, in consideration of their necessities, had granted them their gracious pardon, upon condition that they would find sureties for their future good behaviour. But they remained so long in the case, the mayor and sheriff, and the Duke of Norfolk, said, that they would be bound for them. Upon which they were dismissed?

These arbitrary impostitious being imposed, though on what basis, is unknown to us. In the reign of Henry VII., increased the general odium under which he laboured; and the clemency of the pardon being ascribed to the king, was considered as an atonement for his part for the illegality of the measure. But Wolsey, supported both by royal and papal authority, proceeded, without scruple, to violate all ecclesiastical privileges, which, during that age, were much more sacred than civil; and having once prevailed in that unusual attempt of suppressing some monasteries, he kept all the rest in awe, and exercised over them an arbitrary jurisdiction. By his commission as it were, he was the judge, the prosecutor, and defeated them and chastised their irregularities; and he employed his usual agent, Allen, in the exercise of this authority. The religious houses were obliged to compound for their guilt, real or pretended, by paying large sums to the cardinal or his deputy; and when their impression, and his hatred so far, thass, reached at last the king's ears, which were not commonly open to complaints against his favourite. Wolsey had built a splendid palace at Hampton-court, which he probably intended, as well as that of York-place in Westminster, for his own residence; but fearing the increase of envy on account of this magnificence, and desirous to appease the king, he made him a present of the building, and told him that, from all the chief palaces in Italy, upon this project, he was now brought to such a situation, that it was no longer safe for England to remain entirely neutral. The feigned moderation of the emperor was of short duration; and it was some time after the death of his conduct, his last and most eminent project, far from gratifying his ambition, were only regarded as the means of acquiring an empire more extensive. The terms which he demanded of his prisoner were such as must for ever blot the character of France, and destroyed the balance of Europe. These terms were proposed to Francis soon after the battle of Pavia, while he was detained in Pizzichitone; and as he had hitherto trusted somewhat to the emperor's generosity, the disappointment excited no remonstrance from him. The terms proposed to him could not, he thought, that he would rather live and die a prisoner, than agree to dismember his kingdom; and that, even were he so base as to submit to such conditions, his subjects would never permit him to carry their execution.

Francis was encouraged to persist in demanding more moderate terms, by the favourable accounts which he heard of Henry's disposition towards him, and of the alarm which had seized all the first agents of his country, upon hearing that Francis removed defeat and captivity. He was uneasy, how to Madrid, ever, to be so far distant from the emperor, with whom he must treat; and he expressed his desire (which, perhaps, was a real wish, since he thought that he had hoped that a personal interview would operate in his favour, and that Charles, if not influenced by his ministers, might be found possessed of the same frankness of disposition by which he himself was distinguished. He was soon convinced of his mistake. Partly from want of exercise, partly from reflections on his present melancholy situation, he fell into a languishing illness; which beguited apprehensions in Charles, lest the death of his captive should be revenged by him of all those advantages which he purported to extort from him. He then paid him a visit in the castle of Madrid; and as he approached the bed in which Francis lay, the sick monarch called to him, "You come, sir, to visit me, I suppose?" He answered, "No; I come to visit my brother, and my friend, whom shall soon obtain his liberty." He soothed his affections with many assurances of a like nature, which had so good an effect, that the Emperor, although he greatly disliked to grant the demand, yet employed himself in concerting with the ministers of the emperor the terms of his treaty.

At last the emperor, dreading a general commotion in the most anxious time of the treaty, in which Francis should take after the recovery of his liberty; and Clement, in particular, who suspected that this prince would never execute a treaty so hurtful to his interests, and that there was no trust to be put in his promises, he very frankly offered him a dispensation from all his oaths and engagements. Francis remained not in suspense, but entered immediately into the confederacy proposed to him. It was stipulated by that king, the Pope, the Venetians, the Swiss, the Florentines, and the Duke of Milan, among other articles, that they would oblige the emperor to deliver up the two young princes of France, on receiving a reasonable sum of money; and to restore Milan to Sforza, without further condition or encumbrance. The King of England was not present as a contracting party, but as protector of the holy league, so it was called: and if Naples should be conquered from the emperor, in prosecution of this confederacy, it was agreed that Henry should enjoy a principality in that kingdom, of the yearly revenue of 30,000 ducats; and that Cardinal Wolsey, in consideration of the services which he had rendered to Christendom, should also, in such an event, be put in possession of a revenue of 10,000 ducats.

France was desirous that the appearance of this great confederacy should engage the emperor to relax somewhat in the extreme rigour of the treaty of Madrid; and while he entertained these hopes, he was the more remiss in his warlike preparations; nor did he send in due time reinforce to his allies in Italy. The Duke of Bourbon had got possession of the whole Milanese, of which the emperor intended to grant him the investiture; and having levied a considerable army in Germany, he became formidable to all the Italian potentates; and not the less so, because Charles, destitute as usual of money, had not been able to remit any pay to the general of his army which was engaged in the service of the troops; and in order to prevent those mutinies which were ready to break out every moment, and which their affections alone for him had hitherto restrained, he led them to Rome, and promised to enrich them by the plunder of that opulent city. He was hitherto not killed, as he was planting a scaling-ladder against the walls; but his soldiers, rather enraged than discouraged by his death, mounted to the assault with the more rage and valor, and entered the city without resistance, as they called it, of the Sack of Rome.

In hand, exercised all those brutalities which may be expected from ferocity excited by resistance, and from insolence which takes place when that resistance is no more. This renowned city, exposed by her renown alone to so many calamities, never endured, in any age, even from the barbarians, by whom she was often subdued, such indignities as she was now compelled to suffer. The unenraged massacre and pillage, which continued for several days, were the last ills to which the unhappy Romans were exposed. Whatever was respectable in modesty, or sacred in religion, seemed but the more to make the insults of the soldiery. Virgins suffered violence in the very arms of the men of war, and were offered to those very altars to which they had fled for protection. Aged prelates, after enduring every indignity, and even every torture, were thrown into dungeons, and menaced with cruel death, in order to make them reveal their secret treasures, or purchase liberty by exorbitant ransoms. Clement himself, who had trusted for protection to the sacredness of his character, and neglected to make his escape in time, was taken captive; and found that his dignity, which procured him no regard from the Spanish soldiers, did but draw on him the insolent mockery of the German, who, being generally attached to the Lutheran principles, were pleased to gratify their animosity by the abasement of the sovereign pontiff.

When intelligence of this great event was conveyed to the emperor, that young prince, habituated to hypocrisy, expressed the most profound sorrow for the success of his arms; he put himself and all his court in mourning: he stopped the rejoicings for the birth of his son Philip: and knowing that every artifice, however gross, is able, when seconded by authority, to impose upon the people, he ordered the consuls, during several months, to be put up in the churches for the Pope's liberty; which, all men knew, a letter under his hand could in a moment have procured. The concern expressed by Henry and Francis for the captivity of the young princes was more sincere than might have been expected, if we consider the treaties made with the ambassadors of those princes, a few days before the sack of Rome, had concluded a treaty at Westminster, in which, besides renewing former alliances, they agreed to send ambassadors to Charles, requiring him to accept of two millions of crowns as the ransom of the French princes, and to repay the money borrowed from Henry; and in case of refusal, the ambassadors, attended by heralds, were ordered to declare war against him. This war it was agreed to prosecute in the Low Countries, with an army of thirty thousand men. The emperor, after considering his men at arms, decided to divide them into thirds to be supplied by Francis, the rest by Henry. And, in order to strengthen the alliance between the princes, it was stipulated that either Francis or his son, the Duke of Bourbon, as should afterwards agree, should espouse the Princess Mary, Henry's daughter. No sooner did the monarchs receive intelligence of Bourbon's enterprise, than they changed, by a new treaty, the scene of the projected war from the Netherlands to Italy; and, hearing of the Pope's captivity, they were further stimulated to undertake the war with vigour for restoring him to liberty. Wolsey himself crossed the sea, in order to have an interview with Francis, and to concert measures for that purpose; and he displayed all that grandeur and magnificence with which he was so much intoxicated. He was attended by a train of a thousand horse. The Cardinal of Ferrara, and the Cardinal of Bologna, met him at Boulogne; Francis himself, besides granting to that haughty prelate the power of giving, in every place where he came, liberty to all prisoners, made a journey as far as the suburbs of Lille, and presented him with a great sum of money, which he sent by the king of England, who was only three miles from the town, the more to honour his reception.

It was here stipulated, that the Duke of Orleans should espouse the Princess Mary; and as the emperor seemed to be taking some steps towards assembling a general league, it was agreed that Henry should meet him, and that of that opulent city. He was hitherto not killed, as he was planting a scaling-ladder against the walls; but his soldiers, rather enraged than discouraged by his death, mounted to the assault with the more rage and valor, and entered the city without resistance, as they called it, of the Sack of Rome.

vate conversation which had passed between them at Madrid before their separation, and offered to prove, by single combat, that he had acted dishonourably Francis retaliated the challenge by saying that he was the heir, and after demanding security of the field, he offered to maintain his cause by single combat. Many messages passed to and fro between them; but though both princes were undoubtedly brave, the intended duel never took place.

The queen was so unwise as to zealously disabuse which of the monarchs incurred the blame of this failure; but all men of moderation everywhere lamented the power of fortune, that the prince, the more caudal, generous, and sincere, should, by unhappy incidents, have been reduced to so cruel a situation, that nothing but his violation of treaty could preserve his people, and that he must ever after, without being able to make a proper reply, bear to be reproached with breach of promise by a rival, inferior to him both in honour and virtue.

But though this famous challenge between Charles and Francis had no immediate consequence with regard to these monarchs themselves, it produced a considerable alteration on the manners of the age. The practice of challenges and duels, which had been part of the ancient barbarous jurisprudence, which was still preserved on so solemn occasions, and which was sometimes crowned with victory—unjust in the extreme; and provoking in the most trivial incidents; and men, on any affront or injury, thought themselves entitled, or even required in honour, to take revenge on their enemies, by openly vindicating their right in such a manner; this abuse, though generous maxims, shed much of the best blood in Christendom during more than two centuries; and notwithstanding the severity of law and authority of reason, such as the prevailing force of custom, they are far from being as yet entirely exploded.

CHAP. XXX.

Scrapes concerning the king's marriage. The king enters into these scrapes. Anne Boleyn, Henry's cousin Maria. The pope's ambassador. The case referred to Rome. Wolsey's fall. A parliament. — The progress of the Reformation. — A parliament. — Henry's final breach with Rome. — A parliament. Notwithstanding the submissive deference paid to papal authority before the Reformation, the marriage of Henry with Catherine of Arragon, his brother's widow, had not passed without occasion for complaint. The prejudices of the people were in general bent against a conjugal union between such near relations; and the late king, though he had betrothed his son when that prince was but twelve years of age, gave evident proofs of his intention to take afterwards a disposition and form in annuling the contract. He ordered the young prince, as soon as he came of age, to enter a protestation against the marriage; and on his death-bed he charged him, as his last injunction, not to finish an alliance so unusual, and exposed to such insupportable objections. After the king's accession, some members of the privy council, particularly Warham, the primate, openly declared against the resolution of intestituting the marriage; and though Henry's youth and dissipation kept him during some time from entertaining any scruples with regard to the measure which he had embraced, there happened incidents sufficient to render the scruples formed on the subject generally entertained on that subject. The states of Castile had opposed the Emperor Charles's espousals with Mary, Henry's daughter; and, among other objections, had insisted on the illegitimate birth of the queen, and her father's having committed adultery afterwards opened with France, and mention was made of betrothing her to Francis or the Duke of Orleans, the king of Tarbe, the French ambassador, revived the same objection. But though these events naturally raised some doubts in Henry's mind, there occurred other causes, which tended much to increase his renorse, and render his conscience more scrupulous.

The queen was older than the king by no less than six years; and the decay of her beauty, together with particular infirmities and diseases, had contributed, notwithstanding her blameless character and great personal beauty, to make a person no more acceptable to him. Though she had borne him several children, they all died in early infancy except one daughter; and he was the more struck with this misfortune, because the curse of barrenness is the very theme contained in the Mosaic law against those who espouse their brother's widow. The succession too of the crown was a consideration that occurred to every one, whenever the lawfulness of Henry's marriage was called in question; and it was apprehended, that if doubts of Mary's legitimacy concurred with the weakness of her sex, the King of Scots, the next heir, would advance his pretensions, and might throw the kingdom into confusion. The evils, as yet recent, of civil wars and convulsions arose from a disputed title, made great impression on the minds of men, and rendered the people universally desirous of any event which might obviate so irreparable a calamity. And the king was thus induced, by his own inclinations, and by motives of public interest, to seek the dissolution of his insupportable, and, as was esteemed, unlawful, marriage with Catherine.

Henry afterwards, in a letter to the pope, affirmed that his scruples arose entirely from private reflection; and that, on consulting his confessor the bishop of Lincoln, he found the prelate possessed with the same doubts and difficulties. The king himself, being so great a casuist and diviner, next proceeded to examine the question more carefully by his own learning and study; and having had recourse to Thomas of Aquine, he observed that this celebrated doctor, whose authority was great in the church, and absolute with him, had treated of that very case, and expressly declared against the lawfulness of such marriages. The prohibitions, said Thomas, contained in Leviticus, and among the rest, that of marrying a brother's widow, are moral, eternal, and founded on a divine sanction; and though the pope may dispense with the rules of the church, the laws of God cannot be set aside by any authority less than that which enacted them. The archbishop of Canterbury was then applied to, and he was required to consult his brethren: all the prelates of England, except Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, unanimously declared, under their hand and seal, that they deemed the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn to be unlawful, and that his king's scruples partly with a view of promoting a total breach with the emperor, Catherine's nephew; partly desirous of connecting the king more closely with Francis, by marrying him to the Duchess of Alençon, sister to that monarch; and perhaps, too, somewhat disgusted with the queen herself, who had reproved him for certain freedoms unbecoming his character and station. But Henry was carried forward, though perhaps not at first excited, by a motive more forcible than even the suggestions of that powerful favourite. Anne Boleyn, who lately appeared at court, had been appointed maid of honour to the queen; and having had frequent opportunities of being seen by Henry, and of conversing with him, she had acquired an entire ascend over his affections. This young lady, whose grandeur and misfortunes have rendered her so celebrated, was daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, who had been employed by the king in several embassies, and who was allied to all the principal nobility in the kingdom. His wife, mother to Anne, was daughter of the Duke of Norfolk; his own mother was daughter of the Earl of Ormond. His eldest sister, Sir George Boleyn, who had been mayor of London, had espoused one of the daughters and co-heirs of Lord Hastings. Anne herself, though in very early youth, had been carried over to a Morison, p. 18.

Paris by the king's sister, when the princess espoused Lewis XII. of France; and upon the demise of that monarch, and the return of his dowager into England, this damsel, whose accomplishments, even in her tender years, were always much admired, was retained in the service of Claude, Queen of France, spouse to Francis; and after the death of that princess she passed into the hands of the Archduke of Austria.

The exact time when she returned to England is not certainly known; but it was after the king had entertained doubts with regard to the lawfulness of his marriage with Catherine; if the account is to be credited which he himself gave of that transaction. Henry's scruples had made him break off all conjugal commerce with the queen; but as he still supported an intercourse of civility and friendship with her, he had occasion, in the frequent visits which he paid her, to observe the beauty, the youth, the charms of Anne Boleyn. Finding the accom- plishments of her mind nowise inferior to her exterior graces, he even entertained the design of raising her to the throne; and was the more confirmed in this resolution, when he found that her virtue and modesty prevented all hopes of gratifying his passion in any other manner. As every motive, therefore, of inclination and policy seemed thus to concur in making the king desirous of a divorce from Catherine, and as his prospect of success was inviting, he resolved to make applications to Clement, and he sent Knight, his secretary, to Rome for that purpose.

When Henry applies to the Pope for a claim of the pontiff, he resolved not to find the application on any general doubts concerning the papal power to permit marriage in the nearer degrees of consanguinity; but only to insist on particular cases of nullity in the marriage between Julius II. and Catherine, which had been granted for the marriage of Henry and Catherine. It was a maxim in the court of Rome, that if the Pope be sur- prised into any concession, or grant any indulgence upon his account, the nullity of the bull may after wards be annulled; and this pretence had usually been employed wherever one Pope had recalled any deed executed by any of his predecessors. But Julius's bull, when examined, afforded no abundant matrix of this kind, and any tribunal, favourable, to Henry, needed not want a specious colour for gratifying him in his applications for a divorce. It was said in the preamble, that the bull had been granted upon his solicitation; and it was also known that at the time when, under twelve years of age, it was also affirmed, as another motive for the bull, that the marriage was requisite in order to preserve peace between the two crowns; though it is certain that there was not then any ground or appearance of a dispute between them. The fact of the fact then that Julius's bull seemed to afford Clement a sufficient reason or pretext for annulling it, and granting Henry a dispensation for a second marriage.

Though the pretext for this indulgence was, had been less plausible, the Pope was in such a situation that he had the strongest motives to embrace every opportunity of gratifying the English monarch. He was then a prisoner in the hands of the emperor, and had no hopes of recovering his liberty on any reasonable terms, except by the efforts of the league which Henry had formed with Francis and the Italian powers, in order to oppose the ambition of Charles. When the English secretary, therefore, solicited him in private, he received a very favourable answer; and a dispensation was forthwith promised to be granted to his master. Soon after, the march of a French army into Italy, under the command of Laurens, obliged the Imperialists to restore Clement to his liberty; and he retired to Orvieto, where the secre- tary, with Sir Gregory Cassali, the king's resident at Rome, renewed their applications to him. They still found him full of high professions of friendship, gratitude, and the attachment to the king; but not so prompt in granting his request as they expe ted. The emperor, who had got intelligence of Henry's application to Rome, had exacted a promise from the Pope, to take it before he communicated them to the Imperialists; and Clement, embarrased by this promise, and still more overawed by the emperor's forces in Italy, seemed willing to postpone those concessions desired of him by Henry.

Importuned, however, by the English ministers, he at last put into their hands a commissio to Wolsey, as legate, in conjunction with the Archbishop of Canterbury, or any other English prelate, to examine the validity of the king's marriage with Catherine. He also granted them a provisional dispensation for the king's marriage with any other person; and promised to issue a decretal bull, annulling the marriage with Catherine. But he repre- sented to them the dangerous consequences which must ensue if this dispensation should come to, the emperor's knowledge; and he conjured them not to publish those papers, or make any further use of them, till his affairs were in such a situation as to secure his liberty and independence. And his secret advice was, whenever they should find the proper time for opening the scene, that they should prevent all opposition, by proceeding immediately to a conclusion, by declaring the marriage with Catherine invalid, and by Henry's instantly espousing some other person. Nor would it be so difficult, he said, for himself to confirm these proceedings after they were passed, as previously to render them valid by his consent and in his favour.

When Henry received the commission and dispensation from his ambassadors, and was informed of the Pope's advice, he laid the whole before his ministers, and asked their opinion whether it was expedient to accept it. The English counsellors considered the danger of proceeding in the manner pointed out to them. Should the Pope refuse to ratify a deed, which he might justly call precipitate and irregular, and should be dissuade the advice which he had given, he might be inclined to believe that Henry would find his second marriage totally invalidated; the children, which it might bring him, declared illegitimate; and his marriage with Catherine more firmly riveted than ever. At the same time, it might be evident to him, that the even probability, of such an event, were much confirmed, when he reflected on the character and situation of the sovereign pontiff.

Clement was a prince of excellent judgment, whatever his timidity, to which he was extremely subject, allowed him to make full use of those talents and that penetration with which he was endowed. The captivity and other circumstances which he had undergone, by entering into a league against Charles, had so affected his imagination, that he never afterwards exerted himself with vigour in any public measure; especially if the interest or inclina- tions of that potentate stood in opposition to him. The Imperialists employed his precarious situation to the attack of Rome, which was still defenceless and exposed to the same calamities with which it had already been overwhelmed. And besides these dangers, Clement fancied himself exposed to peril, which threatened still more immediately his person and his dignity.

Charles, apprised of the timid disposition of the emperor of the holy father, threw out perpetual threats of menacing the forms of summoning a general council; which he repre- sented as necessary to reform the church, and correct those enormes abuses which the ambition and avarice of the court of Rome had introduced into every branch of ecclesiastical administration. The power of the sovereign pontiff himself, he said, required limitation; his conduct called aloud for amendment; and even his title to the throne which he filled, might justly be called in question. That Pope had always passed for the natural son of Julius of Medici, who was of the sovereign family of Florence; and though Leo X. his kinsman, had declared him legit- imate, upon a pretended promise of marriage between his father and another, few believed that declaration to be founded on any just reason or authority. The canon law, indeed, had been entirely silent with regard to the prom- ision of bastardy to the papal throne; but what was still more dangerous, it appeared that he had entertained a violent protest- ed session that this stain in the birth of any person was un-compatible with so holy an office. And in another point, the canon law was express and positive, that no man guilty of simony could attain that dignity. A severe bull of Julius II. had added new sanctions to this law, by declaring, that a tumultual election could not be rendered valid, even by a posterior consent of the cardinals. But, unfortunately, Clement had given to Cardinal Colonna a bull, containing promises of advancing that cardinal, in case he himself should attain the papal dignity by his con- currence; and so made an entire dependence on the emperor, threatened every moment to expose to public view. While Charles tempted the Pope with these menaces, he entertained many hopes which were no less prevalent over his affections. At the time when the emperor's forces sacked Rome, and reduced Clement to captivity, the Florentines, passionate for their ancient liberty, had taken advantage of the situation, and revolted against the family of Medicis, who had entirely abolished their authority in Florence, and re-established the democracy. The better to protect themselves in their freedom, they had entered into an alliance with France, and Venetia, against the emperor; and Clement found, that, by this interest, the hands of his confederates were tied from assisting him in the restoration of his family; the event which, of all others, he most desired to see. And, in short, as he knew, he was able to effect this purpose; and therefore, whatever professions he made of fidelity to his allies, he was always, on the least glimpse of hope, ready to embrace the proposal of a cordial reconciliation with that monarch. These views and interests of the Pope were well known in England; and as the opposition of the emperor to Henry's divorce was founded, both on account of the honour and interests of Catherine his aunt, and the obvious motive of distressing an enemy, it was esteemed dangerous to take any measure of consequence, in expectation of the subsequent concurrence of a man of Clement's character and persuasion, who was always so candid and open in his dispositions; and who was at present so little at his own disposal. The safest measure seemed to consist in privately engaging him so far, that he could not afterwards recede, and in making use of his present animosity and unea- certainty, to extort the most important concessions from him. For this purpose, Stephen Gardiner, the cardinal's secretary, and Edward Fox, the king's almoner, in February, were ordered to solicit a commission from the Pope, of such a nature as would oblige him to confirm the sentence of the commissioners, whatever it should be, and disable him on any account to recall the commission, or evade the cause to Rome. But the same reasons which made the acquirement of the king so desirable of obtaining this concession, consisted in the same influence and domination: as for the first point: he was still determined to keep the door open for an agreement with the emperor; and he made no scruple of sacrificing all other considerations to a point which he deemed the most essential, and important to his own security, and to the greatness of his family. He granted, therefore, a new commission, in which Cardinal Campeggio was joined to Wolsey, for the trial of the king's marriage; but he could not be prevailed on to insert the clause desired of him, and to send to Antonio Gardiner's hand a letter promising not to recall the present commission, this promise was found, on examination, to be couched in such ambiguous terms, as left him still the power, whenever he pleased, to make a new one. And Campeggio lay under some obligations to the king; but his dependence on the Pope was so much greater, that he conformed himself entirely to the views of the latter; and therefore, on a summons not long after, he delayed his departure under so many pretences, that it was October before he arrived in England. The first step which he took was to exhort the king to desist from the prosecution of his divorce; and finding that this counsel gave offence, he said, that his intention was also to exhort the queen to take the vows in a convenant, and that he thought it his duty previously to attempt an amicable composition of all differences. The more to pacify the king, he showed to him, as also to the cardinal, the decennial bull, annulling the former marriage with Catherine; but he did not expect that any of the king's coun- sel privy to the secret. In order to arrive in some degree for this obstinacy, he expressed to the king and the cardinal, the Pope's desire of subduing the rest of Europe to every reasonable demand; and in particular, he showed, that their request for suppressing some more monasteries, and converting them into cathedrals and episcopal sees, had obtained the consent of his holiness. These ambiguous circumstances in the behaviour of the Pope and the legate, kept the court of England in suspension, and determined the king to wait with patience the issue of such uncertain councils. Wolsey, meanwhile, seemed to promise him a more sure and expeditious way of extricating himself from his present difficulties. Clement was seized with a dangerous illness; and the intrigues for electing his successor began already to take place among the cardinals. Wolsey, in particular, supported by the interest of England and of France, entertained hopes of mounting the throne of St. Peter; and it appeared, that if a vacancy should then happen, there was a probability of his reaching that summit of his ambition. But the Pope recovered, though after several relapses; and he returned to the same train of false and decieving efforts, in which he kept the whole court of England. He still flattered Henry with professions of the most cordial attachment, and promised him a sudden and favourable issue to his process: he still continued his secret negociations with Charles, and persevered in the resolution of sacrificing all his promises, and all the interests of the Romish religion, to the elevation of his family. Campeggio, who was perfectly acquainted with his views and intentions, protected the decision by the most artful device. He continued full leisure to adjust all the terms of his treaty with the emperor. The emperor, acquainted with the king's extreme earnest- ness in this affair, was determined that he should obtain success by no other means than by an application to him, and by desiring his alliance with Francis, which had hitherto supported, against the superior force of Spain, the tottering state of the French monarchy. He willingly hearkened, therefore, to the applications of Catherine, his aunt; and promising her his utmost protection, exorted her never to yield to the malice and persecutions of her enemies. The queen herself was naturally of a firm and resolute temper, and was engaged not only to persevere in protesting against the injustice to which she thought herself exposed. The impetuousness of incest, which was thrown upon her marriage with Henry, struck her, and the high spirit of the English monarch, with his daughter, which seemed a necessary consequence, gave her the most just concern: the reluctance of yielding to a rival, who, she believed, had supplanted her in the king's affections, was a very natural motive. Actuated by all these considerations, she never ceased soliciting her ne- phew's assistance, and earnestly entreating an evocation of the cause to Rome, where alone she thought she could expect justice. And the emperor, in all his negociations with the Pope, made the recall of the commission high. Campeggio and Wolsey exercised in England a fundamental article. The two legates, meanwhile, opened their court at London, and cited the king and queen to appear before them. They both professed the king's marriage, and the court answered to his name when called: but the queen, instead of answering to her's, with that of the queen of France, the better to screen her, made a very pathetic harangue, which her virtue, her dignity, and her misfortunes, rendered the more affecting. She told him that she was a stranger in his dominions, without protection, without counsel, without assistance; exposed to all the injustice which her enemies were pleased to impose upon her: that she had quitted her native country without other resource than her connections with him and his family, and had expected that, instead of suffering, she should receive security and security in them of a safeguard against every misfortune; that she had been his wife during twenty years, and would here appeal to himself, whether her affectionate submission to his will had not merited better treatment, than to be thus, after such a long time, thrown from him with so much indignity: that she was conscious—he himself was assured—that her virgin honour was yet unstained, when he received her into his house and became her husband: that his brother, who had been carried to further than the ceremony of marriage: that their parents, the kings of England and Spain, were esteemed the wisest princes of their time, and had undoubtedly acted by the best advice: when they formed an agreement for that marriage, which was now represented as so criminal and unnatural: and that she acquiesced in their judgment, and would not submit her cause to be tried by a court, whose decision on her enemies was too visible, ever to allow her any hopes of obtaining from them an equitable or impartial decision. Having spoken these words, she rose, and making the king a low reverence, she departed from the court, and never would again appear in his sight.

After her departure, the king did her the justice to acknowledge, that she had ever been a dutiful and affectionate wife, and that the whole tenour of her behaviour had been conducted with great respect and humanity towards his family. He only insisted on his own scruples with regard to the lawfulness of their marriage; and he explained the origin, the progress, and the foundation of those doubts, by which he had been so long and so violently agitated. He acquiesced Cardinal Wolsey from having any hand in encouraging his scruples; and he craved a sentence of the court agreeable to the justice of his cause.

Citing the queen now, declared her thankful, notwithstanding her appeal to Rome; and then proceeded to the examination of the cause. The first point which came before them was the proof of Prince Arthur's consummation of his marriage with Catherine: and it must be confessed, that no stronger arguments could reasonably be expected of such a fact after so long an interval. The age of the prince, who had passed his fifteenth year, the great state of his health, the long time that he had cohabited with her consorts, many of his expressions to that very purpose; all these circumstances form a violent presumption in favour of the king's assertion. Henry himself, after his brother's death, was not allowed for some time, inasmuch as the death of Prince Arthur was the consequence of his life, which had not been foreseen. But Arthur had perhaps had knowledge of the princess: in the very treaty fixing Henry's marriage, the consummation of the former marriage with Prince Arthur is acknowledged on both sides. These particular were all laid before the court; accompanied with many reasons concerning the extent of the Pope's authority, and against his power of granting a dispensation to marry within the prohibited degrees. Campeggio heard these doctrines with great impatience; and, notwithstanding his resolution to protest the cause, he was often tempted to interrupt and silence the king's counsel, when they insisted on such disagreeable topics. On the 20th of July; and Campeggio chiefly took on him the part of conducting it. Wolsey, though the elder cardinal, permitted him to act as president of the court; because it was thought that a trial managed by an Italian cardinal would carry the appearance of partiality and impiety. He had no mind that his own minister and favourite had presided in it. His business now seemed to be drawing near to a period; and the king was every day in expectation of a sentence in his favour; when he was surprised, Campeggio, on a sudden, without any warning, and upon very frivolous pre-lace which he had built in London, and which though it really belonged to the said York, was seized by Henry, and became after the residence of the kings of England, by the will of Whitehall. All his furniture and plate were also seized: their riches and splendour betted rather a royal than a private family. The king of his own account, had a cupboard of plate of massy gold; there were found a thousand pieces of fine Holland belonging to him. The rest of his riches and furniture was in proportion; and this man-vivio, merely, from a small inducement to this violent persecution against him.

The cardinal was ordered to retire to Asher, a country seat which he possessed near Hampton Court. The world, that had paid him such a court before during his prosperity, now entirely deserted him on this fatal reverse of all his fortunes. He himself was much dejected with the change, and from the same turn of mind which had made him so vainly elated with his grandeur, he lost the style of adversity with double vigour. The smallest appearance of his return to favour, threw him into transports of joy unbecoming a man. The king had seemed willing, during some time, to change the laws which overbalanced him. He granted him his protection, and left him in possession of the seats of York and Winchester. He even sent him a gracious message accompanied with a ring, as a testimon[y of his affection. Wolsey, which immediately alarmed, and which the immediately alighted; and throwing himself on his knees in the mire, received, in that humble attitude, these marks of his majesty's gracious disposition towards him.

His enemies, who dreaded his return to court, never ceased plying the king with accounts of his several offences; and Anne Boleyn, in particular, contributed her endeavours, in conjunction with her uncle the Duke of Norfolk, to exclude him from all hopes of ever being reinstalled in his former authority. He dismissed, therefore, his numerous retinue; and as he was a kind and beneficent master, the separation passed without a pittance, and all his servants, with the king's heart, notwithstanding some gleams of kindness, seemed now totally hardened against his old favourite. He ordered him to be indicted in the Star-chamber, where a sentence was given against him. And content with this severity, he abandoned him to all the rigour of the parlement, which now, for a long interval, was again assembled.

November. The House of Lords voted a long time to consider the matter, and finally, after many days, gave sentence. They were sent down to the House of Commons, where Thomas Cromwell, formerly a servant of the cardinal's, and who had been raised by him from a very low station, defended his unfortunate patron with such spirit, generosity, and courage, as acquired him great honour, and laid the foundation of that favour which he afterwards enjoyed with the king.

Wolsey's enemies, finding that either his innocence or his ca[118]ution prevented them from having any just ground of accusing him, had recourse to a very extraordinary expedient. An indictment was laid against him, that, contrary to a statute of Richard II, commonly called the statute of provors, he had procured bulls from Rome, particularly one investing him with the legateate power, which, he had exercised with very extensive authority. He confessed the indictment, pleaded ignorance of the statute, and threw himself on the king's mercy. He was, perhaps, within reach of the law, but besides that this statute had fallen into disuse, nothing could be more rigorous and severe than the punishment, which, if he had committed the crime openly, during the course of so many years, practised with the consent and approbation of the king, and the acquiescence of the parliament and kingdom: not to mention what he always asserted, and what others have, by reason of his having obtained the royal licence in the most formal manner, which had not been apprehensive of the dangers attending any opposition in Henry's lawless will, he might have pleaded in his own defence before the Da Vittorino. Sentence, however, was pronounced against him, "That he was out of the king's protection; his lands and goods forfeited; and that his person might be committed to custody." But this prosecution of Wolsey was carried on further. Henry even granted him a pardon for all nences; restored him part of his plate and furniture; and still continued from time to time to drop expressions of favour and compassion towards him.

The complaints against the usurpations of Cromwell and the ecclesiastics had been very ancient in England, as well as in most other European kingdoms; and none were more popular in every where, it had paved the way for the Lutheran tenets, and reconciled the people in some measure to the frightful idea of heresy and innovation. The Commons, finding the occasion favorable, in fact, as he was disposed to overthrow the impositions of the clergy; one for the regulating of mortuaries; another against the exactions of the probates of wills; a third against non-residence and pluralities, and against churchmen being farmers of land. But what appeared chiefly dangerous to the ecclesiastics were the severe inquests thrown out almost without opposition in the House against the dissolution of the priors, their ambition, their avarice, and their endless encroachments on the lands of the church. King Henry, the Author of Gray's-Inn, which is of a singular nature, and contains such topics as we should little expect to meet with during that period. The member insinuates on the vast variety of theological opinions which prevailed in different nations and ages; the endless inextricable controversies maintained by the several sects; the impossibility that any man, much less the people, could ever know much less examine, the tenets and principles of every sect; the necessity of ignorance, and a suspense of judgment with regard to all those objects of dispute; and upon the whole he infers, that the only religious objections on matters of opinion, are that of one supposing any man the Author of nature; and the necessity of good morals, in order to obtain his favour and protection. Such sentiments would be deemed latitudinarian, even in our time; and would not be advanced without some precaution in a public assembly. But though the first breach of a religious controversy might encourage the sceptical turn in a few persons of a studious disposition; the zeal with which men soon after attached themselves to their several parties, served effectually to banish for a long time all such obnoxious liberties.

The bills for regulating the clergy met with some opposition in the House of Lords. Bishop Fisher, in particular, imputed to these projects the greatest probability of their being opposed, from want of faith; and to a formed design, derived from heretical and Lutheran principles, of robbing the church of her patrimony, and overturning the national religion.
The Duke of Norfolk reproved the prelate in severe and even somewhat indecent terms. He told him that the greatest clerks were not always the wisest men. But Fisher replied, that he did not remember any fools in his time who had proved great clerks, with one or two exceptions, at the Bishop of Rochester's speech stopped not there. The Commons, by the mouth of Sir Thomas Audley, their Speaker, made complaints to the king of the reflections thrown on them and the bishops obliged to put a more favourable construction on his words.¹

Henry was not displeased that the court of Rome and the clergy should be sensible that they were entirely dependent on him, and that his patronage, if he were willing to surmount their inclinations, was sufficiently dispose-to reduce the power and privileges of the ecclesiastics. The Commons gratified the king in another particular of moment: they granted him a discharge of all those debts, even against the crown, which he had contracted from creditors consisted of friends to the cardinal, who had been engaged by their patron to contribute to the supply of Henry's necessities; and the presentcourtiers were well aware of the opportunity of the munificence through the Several also approved of an expedition which they hoped would ever after discredit a method of supply so irregular and so unpatriotic.

Foreign affairs. The domestic transactions of England were at present so interesting to the king that they chiefly engaged his attention; and he regarded foreign affairs only in subordination to them. He had declared to the emperor, and to the mutual advantages reaped by the commerce between England and the Netherlands, had engaged him to stimulate a neutrality with those provinces; and except by money contributed to the cause of religion, he had in effect no bottling against any of the imperial dominions. A general peace was this summer established in Europe. Margaret of Austria and Louise of Savoy met at Cambrai, and settled the terms of pacification between the French king and the emperor, and had accepted of two millions of crowns in lieu of Burgundy; and he delivered up the two princes of France, whom he had retained as hostages. Henry was on this occasion so generous to his friend and ally, Francis, that he sent him an acquisition of new goods' crowns which the prince owed him. Francis's Italian confederates were not so well satisfied as the king with the peace of Cambrai: they were almost wholly abandonded to the fortunes of the emperor; his means of security left but his equity and moderation. Florence, after a brave resistance, was subdued by the imperial arms, and finally delivered over to the dominion of the emperor. The state of the empire was better treated; they were only obliged to relinquish some acquisitions which they had made on the coast of Naples. Even Francis Sforza obtained the investiture of Milan, and was pardoned for all past offences. The emperor in person passed into Italy with a magnificent train, and received the imperial crown from the hands of the Pope at Bologna. He was but twenty-nine years of age; and having already by his vigour and capacity, succeeded in every enterprise, and reduced to captivity the two greatest potentates in Europe, the one spiritual, the other temporal, he attracted the eyes of all men; and many prognostications were formed of his growing eminence.

But though Charles seemed to be the most prosperous on every side, and though the conquest of Mexico and Peru now began to prevent that scarcity of money under which he had hitherto laboured, he found himself threatened with difficulties from England. He and his desire of surrounding him was the chief cause of his granting such moderate conditions to the Italian powers. Sultan Solymau, the greatest and most accomplished prince that ever sat on the Ottoman throne, had almost entirely subdued Hungary, but besieged Vienna, and though repulsed, still menaced the hereditary dominions of the house of Austria

The universities were still more partial about the king's marriage. The university of Cambridge, was a man removed from any scholar who had been in his university for his learning, and was still more for the court and disinterestedness of his temper. He fell one evening by accident into company with Gardiner, now the court physician of the sovereign. Fox, the king's almoner; and as the business of the divorce became the subject of conversation, he observed that the readiest way, either to quiet Henry's conscience, or extort the Pope's consent, would be to consult all the universities; and with regard to this proposal, if they agreed to approve of the king's marriage with Catherine, his remorses would naturally cease; if they condemned it, the Pope would find it difficult to resist the solemnities of so great a monarch, according to the opinion of all the learned men in Christendom.* When the king was informed of the proposal, he was delighted with it; and swore, with more alacrity than delicacy, that Cranmer had got the right end to this ear; he sent for that divine; entered into conversation with him; conceived a high opinion of his virtue and understanding; engaged him to write in defence of the divorce; and immediately, in prosecution of the scheme proposed, employed his agents to collect the judgments of all the universities in Europe.

Had the question of Henry's marriage with Catherine been examined by the principles of sound philosophy, exempt from superstition, it seemed not likely to much difficulty. The natural reason why marriage in certain degrees is prohibited by the civil law, and by the law of nations, is derived from men's care to preserve purity of manners; while they reflect, that if a commerce of love were authorized between near relations, the frequent opportunities of intimate conversation, especially if commerce of love were exchanged, might lead to the corruption of morals.

But as the customs of countries vary considerably, and an intercourse more or less restrained between different families, or between the several members of the same family, we find that the moral precept, varying with its cause, is susceptible, without any inconvenience, of very different latitude in the several ages and nations of the world. The extreme delicacy of the Creeks permitted no communication between persons of different sexes, except where they lived under the same roof; and even the apartments of a stepmother and her daughters were almost as much shut up against visits from the husband's sons, as against those from any stranger. In France, in that nation it was lawful for a man to marry not only his niece, but his half-sister by the father: a liberty unknown to the Romans, and other nations, where a more open intercourse was permitted. But from this we cannot draw, as from the principle, it would appear, that the ordinary commerce of life among great princes is so obstructed by ceremony and numerous attendants, that no ill consequence would result from among them from marrying the mother's widow; especially if the dispensation of the supreme priest be previously required, in order to justify what may in common cases be condemned, and to hinder the precedent from becoming the rule of all others. The strong and direct motives of public interest and tranquillity may frequently require such alliances between the foreign families, there is the less reason for extending towards them the full rigour of the rule which has place among individuals.

But, in opposition to these reasons, and many more which might be collected, Henry had custom and precedent on his side; the principle by which men are almost wholly governed in their actions and opinions. The marriage was therefore, as an instance, usual, that no other instance of it could be found in any history or record of any Christian nation; and though the Popes were accustomed to dispense with more essential precepts of morality, and to license any irregularity, where the consent of all parties, such as those of uncle and niece, and the imaginations of men were not yet reconciled to this particular exercise of his authority. Several universities of Europe, therefore, without heeding it as well as without interest or reproof, gave verdict in the king's favour; not only of those of France, Paris, Orleans, Bourges, Toulouse, Angiers, which might be supposed to lie under the influence of their prince, ally to Henry; but also those of Italy, Venice, Ferrara, Padua; even Bologna itself, though under the immediate jurisdiction of Clement. Oxford alone, and Cambridge, made some difficulty; because these universities, alarmed at the progress of Lutheranism, and seeing the world in disorder, were not scrupled to give their sanction to measures whose consequences they feared would prove fatal to the ancient religion. Their opinion, however, conformable to that of the other universities of Europe, was not at last obtained; and the king, in order to give more weight to all these authorities, engaged his nobility to write a letter to the Pope, recommending his cause to the holy father, and threatening him with the most dangerous consequences in case of a denial of justice. The convocations too, both of Canterbury and York, pronounced the king's marriage invalid, irregular, and contrary to the law of God, with which no human power had authority to dispense. But Clement, lying still under the influence of the emperor, continued to summon the king to appear, either by himself or proxy, before his tribunal at Rome. If the king might have expected no fair trial there, refused to submit to such a condition, and would not even admit of any citation, which he regarded as a high insult, and a violation of his royal prerogative. The father of Anne, the devout Earl of Wiltshire, carried to the Pope the king's reasons for not appearing by proxy; and, as the first instance of disrespect from England, refused to kiss his holiness' foot, which he very gravely held out to him for that purpose.

The extremities to which Henry was pushed, both against the Pope and the ecclesiastical order, were naturally disgraceful to Cardinal Wolsey; and as Henry foresaw his exposition, it is the most probable reason that can be assigned for his renewing the prosecution against his ancient favourite. After Wolsey had remained some time at Asher, he was allowed to remove to Richmond, a palace which he had received as a present from Henry, in return for Hampton-Court, but the king was still retaining his vicinage to the king, procured an order for him to remove to his see of York. The cardinal knew it was vain to resist: he took up his residence at Cawood, in Yorkshire, where he rendered himself extremely popular in the neighbourhood by his affability and hospitality; but he was not allowed to remain long unmolested in this retreat. The Earl of Northumberland received orders, without regard to Wolsey's ecclesiastical character, to arrest him for high treason, and to conduct him to London, in order to his trial. The cardinal, partly from the fatigue of his journey, partly from the agitation of his anxious mind, was seized with a disorder which tormented him even to death. No one could now arrest him, with some difficulty, to reach Leicester-Abbey. When the abbot and the monks advanced to receive him with much respect and reverence, he told them, that he was come to lay his bones among them; and he immediately took to his bed, whence he never rose more. A little before he expired, he addressed himself in the following words to Sir William Kingston, constable of the Tower, who had him in custody: "I pray you have me here, as a means of my death; and bereave me on my behalf so to call to his remembrance all matters that have passed between us from the beginning, especially with regard to his business with the queen; and then will he know in his conscience whether I have offended him.

He is a prince of a most royal carriage, and hath a princely heart; and rather than he will miss or want any part of his will, he will endanger the one-half of his kingdom.

I do assure you, that I have often kneaded before him, sometimes three hours together, to persuade him from his will and appetite; but could not prevail: had I but served God as diligently as I have served the king, he would not have given me over in my grey hairs. But this is the just reward that I must receive for my indulgent pains and study, not regarding my service to God, but only to my prince. Therefore, let me advise you, if you be of the privy-council, as by your wisdom you are fit, take care what you put into the king's head: for you can never put it out again."
a variety as the fortune to which he was exposed. The abstraction and violence of the king's temper may alleviate much of the blame which some of his favourite's measures have undergone; and when we consider, that the subsequent part of Henry's reign was much more criminal than that which had been directed by Wolsey's counsels, we shall be inclined to suspect those historians of partiality, who have endeavoured to load the memory of this minister with reprefence; and he told the attorney-general that he would have retributed to him a ready and Henry a suitable return for all his favours. The Cardinal of Ambrosio, whose memory is respected in France, always made this apology for his own conduct, which was, in some respect, similar to Wolsey's; and we have reason to think that Henry was well acquainted with the views by which his minister was influenced, and took a pride in promoting them. He much regretted his death, when informed of it; and always spoke favourably of his memory:
a proof that humour more than reason, or any discovery of treachery, had occasioned the last persecutions against him.

A parliament, here gave strong grounds of his extensive authority, as well as of his intention to turn it to the depression of the clergy. As an ancient statute, now almost obscure, has been employed and run upon for the exercise of the legitime power criminal, notwithstanding the king's permission; the same law was now turned against the ecclesiastics. It was pretended, that every one who refused to give the taxation which H. e. the whole church, had violated the statute of provisors, and the attorney-general accordingly brought an indictment against them. The conversation knew that it would be in vain to oppose itself to the king's arbitrary will, k. i., to plead that their ruin would have been the certain consequence of not submitting to Wolsey's commission, which was procured by Henry's consent, and supported by his authority. They chose, therefore, to throw themselves on the mercy of their sovereign; and they agreed to pay 118,840 pounds for a pardon. A conference was likewise extorted from them, that the king was the protector and the supreme head of the church and clergy of England; through some of them had the dexterity to get a clause inserted which invalidated the whole submission, and which ran in these terms, "in so far as is permitted by the lent of Christ."

The Seccouors, finding that a pardon was granted the clergy, began to be apprehensive for themselves, lest other they should afterwards be brought into trouble on account of their submission to the legitime court, or a supply, in like manner, be extorted from them in return for their pardon. They therefore petitioned the king to grant a remission to all such persons; but they met with a repulse.
He told them, that if he ever chose to offer their offence it would be from his own goodness, not from their replication, lest he should seem to be compelled to it. Some time after, when they despaired of obtaining this concession, he was pleased to issue a pardon to the laity; and the Commons expressed great gratitude for that act of clemency.

By this strict execution of the statute of provisors, a great part of the profit, and still more of the power, of the court of Rome, was cut off;
and the connections between the Pope and the English clergy were, in some measure, dissolved. The next session found both king and parliament in the same dispositions.

found to amount to considerable sums. Since the second of Henry VII. no less than one hundred and sixty thousand pounds had been transmitted to Rome on account of this claim; which the parliament, therefore, reduced, in five per cent. on all the ecclesiastical benefices. The better to keep the Pope in awe, the king was intrusted with a power of regulating these payments, and of confirming or infringing this act at his pleasure: and it was voted,

that any censures which should be passed by the court of Rome, should be submitted to the court of

If in foreseen political disputes, he sometimes employed his influence over the king for his private purposes rather than his master's service, which he boasted he had solely at heart; we must not forget to remember that he had in view the papal throne; a dignity which he desired, if it would have induced him to profess to mobile for a return for all his favours. The Cardinal

By this strict execution of the statute of
more of the power, of the court of Rome, was cut off;
and the connections between the Pope and the English clergy were, in some measure, dissolved. The next session
found both king and parliament in the same dispositions.

15th Jan. An act was passed against levying the an-cemy, but his first plan being a year's rent of all the bishoprics that fell vacant: a tax which was im-progress of the course by the court of Rome for granting Reformation bulls to the new prelates, and which was found to amount to considerable sums. Since the second of Henry VII. no less than one hundred and sixty thousand pounds had been transmitted to Rome on account of this claim; which the parliament, therefore, reduced, in

five per cent. on all the ecclesiastical benefices. The better to keep the Pope in awe, the king was intrusted with
a power of regulating these payments, and of confirming or infringing this act at his pleasure: and it was voted,
that any censures which should be passed by the court of Rome, should be submitted to the court of

the king for his private purposes rather than his master's service, which he boasted he had solely at heart; we must not forget to remember that he had in view the papal throne; a dignity which he desired, if it would have induced him to profess to mobile for a return for all his favours. The Cardinal of Ambrosio, whose memory is respected in France, always
made this apology for his own conduct, which was, in some respect, similar to Wolsey's; and we have reason
to think that Henry was well acquainted with the views by which his minister was influenced, and took a pride in promoting them. He much regretted his death, when informed of it; and always spoke favourably of his memory:
a proof that humour more than reason, or any discovery
of treachery, had occasioned the last persecutions against
him.
ed symptoms of sorrow on laying down the grandeur and magnificence of the throne to which he had been accustomed; he drew a subject of mirth from their distresses; and made them ashamed of losing even a moment's cheerfulness on account of such trivial misfortunes. The king, who had entertained the most extravagant hopes of the court, found himself wrenched from some difficulty; and he delivered the great seal soon after to Sir Thomas Audley.

During these transactions in England, and these invasions of public and ecclesiastical authority, the court of Rome was not without solicitude; and she entertained just apprehensions of losing entirely her authority in England; the kingdom, which of all others, had long been the most devoted to the holy see and which had yielded to it the most ample revenue. While the Imperial cardinals pushed Clement to proceed to extremities against the king, his more moderate and impartial counsellors represented to him the indigity of his proceedings; that a great monarch, who had signalized himself both by his pen and the sword, in the cause of the Pope, should be denied a favour which he demanded on such just grounds, and which had scarcely ever been refused to any person of his rank and station. Notwithstanding these remonstrances, the queen's appeal was received at Rome; the king was cited to appear; and several consistoryes were held to examine the validity of their marriage. Henry was not the man to be deterred from his virtuous purpose by the lessons of history, and he went to this court before this: he only despatched Sir Edward Karne, and Dr. Bonner, in quality of excusatory, so they were called, to carry his apology for not paying that deference to the Court of Rome which his pursuit of his own kingdom, he said, must be sacrificed, if he allowed appeals from his own kingdom; and as the question regarded conscience, no power or interest, no proxy could supply his place, or consent that he himself should stand alone to confer. In order to support himself in this measure, and add greater security to his intended defection from Rome, he procured an interview with Francis at Boulogne and Calais, where he renewed his promises of a public alliance with that monarch, and concerted all measures for their mutual defence. He even employed arguments, by which he believed he had persuaded Francis to imitate his example, and withdraw his obedience to the Bishop of Rome, and administering ecclesiastical affairs, without having further recourse to that see. And being now fully determined in his own mind, as well as resolute to stand by his purpose, he was induced to celebrate his marriage with Anne Boleyn, whom he had previously created Marchioness of Pembroke. Rouland Lee, soon after raised to the bishopric of Coventry, officiated at the ceremony; the King, in the presence of his court, his principal minister, the new queen, her father, mother, and brother, together with Dr. Cranmer, were present at the ceremony. Anne became pregnant soon after her marriage; and this event both gave great satisfaction to the king, and was regarded by the people as a strong proof of the queen's former modesty and virtue.

A parliament of the nation, proceeded still in those gradual and steady steps by which they loosened their connexions with the sea of Rome, and pressed the usurpations of the Roman pontiff. An act was made against all appeals to Rome, and suspended the power of divorces, wills, and other suits cognizable in ecclesiastical courts; appeals esteemed dishonourable to the kingdom, by subjecting it to a foreign jurisdiction; and found to be very vexatious and inconvenient to the people, which necessarily attended them. The more to show his disregard to the Pope, Henry, finding the new queen's pregnancy to advance, publicly owned his marriage, and in order to remove all doubts with regard to its lawfulness, he prepared measures for declaring, by a formal sentence, the invalidity of his marriage with Catherine: a sentence which ought naturally to have proceeded from himself. The king, even amidst his scruples and remorse, on account of his first marriage, had always treated Catherine with respect and distinction; and he endeavoured, by every soil and persuasion, and by every means, to engage her to depart from her appeal to Rome, and her opposition to his divorce. Finding her obstinate in maintaining the justice of her cause, he had totally forborne all visits and intercourse with her; and had only received one of his palaces in which she should please to reside. She had fixed her abode for some time at Amphilth, near Dunstable; and it was in this latter town that Cranmer, now created Archbishop of Canterbury, on the death of Warnham, was appointed to open his court for examining the validity of her marriage.

The near neighbourhood of the place was chosen, in order to deprive her of all plea of ignorance; and as she made no answer to the citation, either by herself or proxy, she was declared contumacious; and the primate proceeded to the examination of the cause. The evidences of Arthur's consummation of his marriage were anew produced; the opinions of the既 been subtle and judicious judgments pronounced two years before by the convocations both of Canterbury and York; and after these preliminary steps, Cranmer proceeded to a sentence, and annulled the king's marriage with Catherine, and pronounced it invalid. By a subsequent sentence he ratified the marriage with Anne Boleyn, who soon after was publicly crowned queen, with all the pomp and dignity suited to that event; she could complete the king's satisfaction on the conclusion of this intricate and weighty business, when she was safely delivered of a daughter, who received the name of Elizabeth, and who afterwards swayed the sceptre with such renown and felicity. Henry was so much delighted with the birth of this child, that soon after he conferred on her the title of Princess of Wales; a step somewhat irregular, as she could only be presumptive, not apparent heir of the crown.

But he had, during his former marriage, thought proper to honour his daughter Mary with that title; and he was determined to bestow on the offspring of his present marriage the same mark of distinction, as well as to exclude the elder princess from all hope of her succession. He regarded for the new queen seemed rather to increase than diminish by his marriage; and all men expected to see the entire ascendant of one who had mounted a throne, from which her birth did not support her; and the other, who, by a proper mixture of severity and indulgence, had long managed so intractable a spirit as that of Henry. In order to efface as much as possible all marks of his first marriage, Lord Mountjoy was sent to the unfortunate and divorced queen, to inform her that she was henceforth to be treated only as Princess-dowager of Wales; and all means were employed to make her acquiesce in that determination. But she continued obstinate in maintaining the validity of her marriage; and she would admit no person to her presence who did not approach her with the accustomed ceremonial. Henry, forgetting his wonted generosity towards her, employed menaces against such of her servants as complied with her. He employed menaces against the person of Cranmer, but was never able to make her relinquish her title and pretensions.

When intelligence was conveyed to Rome of the transactions, so injurious to the authority of the holy see, the conclave was in a rage, and all the cardinals of the imperial faction urged the Pope to proceed to a definitive sentence, and to dart his spiritual thunders against Henry. But Clement proceeded no further than to declare the nullity of Cranmer's sentence, as well as that of Henry's second marriage; threatening him with excommunication, if, before the first of November ensuing, he did not replace every thing in the condition in which it formerly stood. An event had happened, from which the spectator might be led to think that Henry's confidence in the solution of his difficulties, and which hindered him from carrying matters to extremity against the king.

The Pope had claims upon the duchy of Ferrara, for the revenues of Reggio and Modena; and, having submitted his pretensions to the arbitration of the emperor, he was surprised to find a sentence pronounced against him. Enraged at this disappointment, he heartily resented Clement's conclusion on the difference, and which hindered him from carrying matters to extremity against the king.

The king's message was replied to in the same spirit. No new subjects were brought forward. But the king's plea was fortifying; and, by a precipitate sentence, the marriage of Henry and Catherine was pronounced valid, and Henry declared to be excommunicated if he refused to adhere to it. Twelve cardinals, it is said, had been brought from his usual prudence, found, that though he heartily repented of this hasty measure, it would be difficult for him to retract it, or replace affairs on the same footing as before.

It is not probable that the Pope, had he conducted himself with even so great moderation and temper, could have, during the lifetime of Henry, to have regained much authority or influence in England. The importance of a divorce both impious and obstinate; and having proceeded so far in throwing off the papal yoke, he never could again be brought tamely to bend his neck to it. Even at the time when he was negotiating a recon-appointed to descend to the issue of this marriage, and failing them to the king's heirs for ever. An oath likewise was enjoined to be taken in favour of this order of succession, under the penalty of imprisonment during the king's pleasure, and forfeiture of goods and chattels. And all slander against the king, queen, or their issue, was subjected to the penalty of misprison of treason. After these compliances, the parliament was prorogued; and those acts, so contemptuous to many persons, as to the crown to all their persons and authority, were passed at the very time that Clement pronounced his lasty sentence against the king. Henry's resentment against Queen Catherine, on account of her obstinacy, was the reason of his desiring his daughter from his first hopes of succeeding to the crown; contrary to his first intentions when he began the process of divorce, and of dispensaion for a second marriage.

The king found his rebellious subjects as compliant as the laity. The convocation ordered that the act against appeals to Rome, together with the king's appeal from the Pope to a general council, should be annexed to the doors of all the churches in the kingdom; and they voted that the Bishop of Rome had, by the law of God, no more jurisdiction in England than any other foreign bishop; and that the authority which he and his predecessors had there exercised, was as an exercise of governmental sub-ance of English princes. Four persons alone opposed this vote in the lower House, and one doubted. It passed unanimously in the upper. The bishops went so far in their compliance, that they took out new commissions from the revolution; but the actual authority was expressly affirmed to be derived ultimately from the civil magistrate, and to be entirely dependent on his good pleasure.

The question respecting the succession was generally taken throughout the kingdom. Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, and Sir Thomas More, were the only persons of note that entertained scruples with regard to its legality. Fisher was impeached by the House of Commons on the score of his credulity, rather than any bad intentions, seeming to have betrayed him. But More was the person of greatest reputation in the kingdom for virtue and integrity; and as it was believed that his authority would have influence on the sentiments of others, great pains were taken to convince him of the lawfulness of the oath. He declared that he had no scruple with regard to the succession, and thought that the parliament had full power to settle it: but the Commons, who were so greatly attached to his allegiance to the heir appointed; but he refused the oath prescribed by law; because the preamble of that oath asserted the legality of the king's marriage with Anne, and he replied, that in the case of Catherine of Aragon, the marriage was unlawful and invalid. Cranmer, the primate, and Cromwell, now secretary of state, who highly loved and esteemed More, entreated him to layaside his scruples and their friendly importunity seemed to weigh more with him than the penalties awaiting his refusal.6 He persisted, however, in a mild though firm manner, to maintain his resolution; and the king, irritated against him as well as Fisher, ordered both to be indicted upon the statute, and committed prisoners to the Tower.

The parliament being again assembled, conferred on the king the title of the only supreme head of the churches of England; and as they had already invested him with all the real powers appurent to it. In this memorable act, the parliament granted him power, or rather acknowledged his inherent power,
"to vist, and repress, redress, reform, order, correct, restrain, or amend all errors, heresies, abuses, offenses, contempts, and enormities, which fell under any spiritual authority, or jurisdiction." They also declared it treason to attempt, imagine, or speak evil against the king, queen, or his heirs, or to endeavour depriving them of their digni-ties or titles. They gave him a right to all the annates and tithes of benefices, which had formerly been paid to the court of Rome. They granted him a subsidy and a treasure. They attained More and Fisher for misprision of treasure. And they completed the union of England and Wales, by giving to that principality all the benefit of the English laws.

Thus the authority of the Popes, like all exorbitant power, was ruined by the excess of its acquisitions, and by stretching its pretensions beyond what it was possible for any human principles or prepossessions to sustain. Indul-ences had in former ages tended extremely to enrich the holy see; but being openly abused, they served to excite the first prepossessions against the papal power. The prerogatives of granting dispensations had also contributed much to attach all the sovereign princes and great families in Europe to the papal authority; but meeting with an unlooked concurrence of circumstances, was now the cause why these were separated hereditary king and the Roman pontiff, in nourishing its excessive growth;
and, except when blinded by his own ignorance or bigotry, would be sure to retain it within tolerable limits, and prevent its abuses. And, on the whole, there followed many strong consequences, and if it be not assumed, it ought to be feared rather than denied, and the prerogatives had perhaps never foreseen or intended by the persons who had the chief hand in conducting it.

While Henry proceeded with so much order and temperance in carrying on the national religion, and while his authority seemed entirely secure in England, he was held in some inquietude by the state of affairs in Ireland and in Scotland.

The Earl of Kildare was deputy of Ireland, under the Duke of Richmond, the king's natural son, who bore the title of lieutenant; and as Kildare was accused of some violences against the family of Ossory, his hereditary enemies, he was summoned to answer for his conduct. He left his authority in the hands of his son, who, hearing that his father was thrown into prison, and was in danger of his life, immediately took up arms, and joining himself with O'Neal, O'Carril, and other Irish nobility, committed himself to the hands of the English commander, who imposed on him the ignominious and laid siege to that city. Kildare meanwhile died in prison, and his son, persevering in his revolt, made applications to the emperor, who promised him assistance.
The king was on the point of suppressing the conspiracy, which so harassed the rebels, that this young nobleman, finding the emperor backward in fulfilling his promises, was reduced to the necessity of surrendering himself prisoner to Lord Leonard Gray, the new deputy, brother to the Marquis of Dorset. He was carried over to England, with his five uncles; and after trial and conviction they were all brought to public justice; though two of the uncles, in order to save their family, had pretended to join the king's party.

The Earl of Angus had acquired the entire ascendant in Scotland; and having gotten possession of the king's per-early youth, he was able, by aid of that advantage, and by playing the master of his own fate, to retain the reins of government. The queen-dowager, however, his consort, bred him great disturbance. For having separated herself from him, on account of some jealousies and disgusts, and having procured a divorce, she had married another man of quality, of the name of Stuart; and she joined all the discontented nobility who opposed Angus's authority. James himself was dissatisfied with the state where he was opinionated; and by secret correspondence he incited first Walter Scot, then the Earl of Lennox, to attempt by force of arms the freeing him from the hands of Angus. Both enterprises failed of success; but James, impatient of restraint, found means at last of escaping to Stirling, where his mother then resided;

and having summoned all the nobility to attend him, he overthrew the authority of the Douglasses, and obliged Angus and his brother to fly into England, where they were protected by Henry. The King of Scotland, being now arrived at years of majority, took the government into his own hands; and employed himself with great spirit and valour in repressing those feuds, ravages, and disorders, with which they were threatened; the course of public justice, served to support the martial spirit of the Scots, and contributed by that means to maintain national independence. He was desirous of renewing the ancient league with the French nation; and, by taking close union with England, and on that account somewhat cold in hearkening to his proposals, he received the more favourably the advances of the emperor, who hoped, by means of such an ally, to breed disturbance to England. He offered the Scotch King the choice of three remembrances, his own near relations, and all of the name of Mary; his sister, the Dowager of Hungary, his niece, a daughter of Portugal, or his cousin, the daughter of Henry, whom he pretended to desire of unknown to her father. James was more inclined to the latter proposal, had it not upon reflection been found impracticable; and his natural propensity to France at last prevailed over all other considerations. The alliance with France necessarily engaged James to maintain peace with England. But though invited by his uncle, Henry, to confer with him at NewCastle, and concert common measures for repressing the progress of the Protestants in his kingdom, and taking off the yoke of Rome, he could not be prevailed on, by entering England, to put himself in the king's power. In order to have a pretext for refusing the conference, he applied to the Pope, and obtained a brief, forbidding him to engage in any personal negociation with an enemy of the holy see. From these measures Henry easily concluded, that he could be very little depend on the friendship of his nephew. But those events took not place till some time after our present period.

The ancient and almost uninterrupted opposition of interests between the laity and clergy in England, and between the English people; and the court of Rome, and the court of King. But when the reformers proceeded thence to dispute concerning the nature of the sacraments, the operations of grace, the terms of immediate and eternal. Deity, men were thrown into amazement, and were during some time at a loss how to choose their party. The profound ignorance in which both the clergy and laity formerly lived, and their freedom from theological altercations, had produced a simplicity of understanding which they now had lost; and the multitude were neither attached to them by topicks of reasoning, nor by those prejudices and antipathies against opponents, which have ever a more natural and powerful influence over them. As soon, therefore, as a new opinion was advanced, supported by such an authority as to call up their attention, they felt their capacity totally unfitted for such discussion; and they perpetually fluctuated between the contending parties. Hence the quick and violent movements by which the people were agitated, even in the most opposite directions; hence the spirit of insurrection, the notion of safety in the most sacred principles; and hence the rapid progress during some time, and the sudden as well as entire check soon after, of the new doctrines. When men were once settled in a habitude of diservings, and they conscienciously in an habitual detestation of those who were denounced heretics, they adhered with more obstinacy to the principles of their education; and the limits of the two religions to the contrary were fixed and unchangeable. Nothing more forwarded the first progress of the reformers, than the offer which they made, of submitting all religious doctrines to private judgment, and the summons given every one to examine the principles formerly imposed upon him. Though the multitude were totally unqualified for this undertaking, they yet were highly pleased with it. They fancied that they were exercising their judgment, while they opposed to the prejudices of the ancient Romish doctrine, over the objects of the new kind. The novelty itself of the doctrines; the pleasure of an imaginary triumph in dispute; the fervent zeal of the reformers preachers; their patience and even acablity in suffering the yoke of their supplanters, and the restraints of the old religion; an indignation against the tyranny and interested spirit of the ecclesiastics; these motives were prevalent with the people, and by such considerations as had so generally induced, during that age, to throw off the religion of their ancestors were conspired to.

But in proportion as the practice of submitting religion to private judgment was acceptable to the people, it appeared in some respects dangerous to the rights of sovereigns, and the tendency to destroy that imperious edification on which the authority of the civil magistrate is chiefly founded. The very precedent, of shaking so ancient and deep-founded an establishment as that of the Romish hierarchy, might, in time, be employed, prey to the innovations. The republican spirit which naturally took place among the reformers increased this jealousy. The furious insurrections of the populace, excited by Munzer, and other anarchists in Germany furnished a preparation for decaying the Reformation. Nor ought we to conclude, because protesters in our time prove as dutiful subjects as those of any other communion, that therefore such appearances and ideas are to be founded copper together without the least liability. Though the liberty of private judgment be tendered to the disciples of the Reformation, it is not in reality accepted of; and men are generally contented to acquiesce implicitly in those establishments, however new, into which the civil authority has extended the power of religion. No prince in Europe was possessed of such absolute authority as Henry, not even the Pope himself, in his own capital, whose united the civil and ecclesiastical powers; and there was small likelihood that any doctrine which lay under the imputation of encouraging sedition could ever pretend to his favour and countenance. But besides this political jealousy, there was another reason, which inspired this imperious monarch with an aversion to the reformers. He had early declared his sentiments against Luther; and having entered the lists in those scholastic quarrels, he had received for his courage and the grounds of applause for his performance. Elated by his imaginary success, and blinded by a natural arrogance and obstinacy of temper, he had entertained the most lofty opinion of his own erudition; and he received with impatience, mixed with contempt, the contradiction to his opinions from Luther also. He had been so imprudent as to treat in a very incoherent manner his royal antagonist; and though he afterwards made the most humble submissions to Henry, and apologized... for the vehemence of his former expressions, he never could efface the hatred which the king had conceived against him and his doctrines. The idea of heresy still appeared detestable as well as formidable to that prince; and when the scruples and the jealousies of his own mind had corrected one considerable part of his early prejudices, he had made it a point of honour never to relinquish the remainder. Separate as he stood from the catholic church, and on the unfaithful road to the head of it, he still valued himself on maintaining the catholic doctrine, and on guarding, by fire and sword, the imagined purity of his speculative principles.

Henry's ministers and courtiers were of as moody a character as his conduct, and seemed to waver, during his whole reign, between the ancient and the new religion. The queen, engaged by interest as well as inclination in the cause of the reformers: Cromwell, who was created secretary of state, and who was daily advancing in the king's confidence, had embraced the same views; and as he was a man of prudence and abilities, he was able very effectively, though in a covert manner, to promote the late innovations. Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, had secretly adopted the protestant tenets; and he had gained Henry's friendship by his candour and sincerity; virtues which he possessed in the highest degree, as a man of a character not loaded with faction and oppressed by tyranny, could easily prevail. On the other hand, the Duke of Norfolk adhered to the ancient faith; and by his high rank, as well as by his talents and abilities, he was enabled to speak publicly in Canterbury, with the king's council: Gardiner, lately created Bishop of Winchester, had enlisted himself in the same party; and the suppleness of his character, and dexterity of his conduct, had recommended him extremely, useful to the cause. All these ministers, while they stood in the most irreconcilable opposition of principles to each other, were obliged to disguise their particular opinions, and to pretend an entire conformity of doctrine and practice between them. Cromwell and Cranmer still carried the appearance of a conformity to the ancient speculative tenets; but they artfully made use of Henry's resentment to widen the breach with their master, and to entice him to punish those who in his presence had presumed to reject his theological principles. Both sides hoped, by their unlimited compliance, to bring him over to their party. The king, meanwhile, who held the balance between the factions, was enabled, by the courtship paid him both by protestants and catholics, to maintain his administration, as well as his authority, by the mere pretence of impartiality. He, though in all his measures he was really driven by his unguarded humour, he casually steered a course which led more certainly to arbitrary power, than any in which the most profound politics could have traced out to him. Artifice, refinement, and hypocrisy, in his situation, would have put both parties on their guard against him, and would have taught them reserve in complying with a monarch whom they could never hope thoroughly to have gained; but while the frankness, sincerity, and openness of Henry's temper were generally known, as well as the dominion of his furious passions, each side dreaded to lose him by the smallest opposition, and fluttered that blindness with his will would throw him cordially and fully into their interests.

The ambiguity of the king's conduct, though it kept the courtiers in awe, served in the main to encourage the protestant doctrine among his subjects, and promoted that spirit of innovation with which the age was generally seized, and which nothing but an entire uniformity, as well as a steady severity in the administration, could be able to repress. They, in that language, are called against the inconvenience of the see of Rome. Had the men employed themselves in writing English books against the corruptions of the church of Rome; against images, reliques, pilgrimages; and they excited the curiosity of men with such novelties, as the most impatient and heat-headed among them have been willing to believe and accept, in terms of acceptance with the Supreme Being. In conformity to the Lutherans, and other protestants, they asserted that salvation was obtained by faith alone; and that the most religious acts were those which were especially supposed by them to be the most acceptable to God, by which terms they understood as well the moral duties as the ceremonial and monastic observances. The defenders of the ancient religion, on the other hand, maintained the sufficiency of good works; but though they could not do it out of this appellation the social virtues, it was still the superstitions gainful to the church which they chiefly extolled and recommended. The books, composed by these fugitives, having stolen over to England, began to make converts everywhere; but it was a translation of the Scriptures by Tindal that was esteemed the most dangerous to the established faith. The first edition of this work, composed with little accuracy, was found liable to considerable objections; and Tindal, who was poor, and could not afford to lose a great part of the impression, was long- ing for an opportunity of correcting his errors, of which he had been made sensible. Tosnyal, then Bishop of London, was a man of a discretion and a Sover, desirous to discourage, in the gentlest manner, these innovations, gave private orders for buying up all the copies that could be found at Antwerp, and he burned them immediately. By this manner of conduct, the king, with Tindal money, enabled him to print a new and correct edition of his work, and gave great scandal to the people in thus committing to the flames the word of God.

The disciples of this innovation met with little resistance during the ministry of Wolsey, who, though himself a clergyman, bore too small a regard to the ecclesiastical order to serve as an instrument of their tyranny: it was this information which, on an occasion of an affirmative article, the king's conscience, he had encouraged the growth of heresy, and that he had protected and acquitted some notorious offenders. Sir Thomas More, who succeeded Wolsey as chancellor, as at once an object of respect, and that our compassion, and an instance of the usual progress of men's sentiments during that age. This man, whose elegant genius and familiar acquaintance with the noble spirit of antiquity had given him very enlarged sentiments, and who, in his early years, advanced principles which even at present would be deemed somewhat too free, had, in the course of events, been so irritated by polemics, and thrown into such a superstitious attachment to the ancient faith, that few of his observations could be of any service to the church, and never have seen the roccoc or violence in their prosecution of heresy. Though adorned with the gentler manners, as well as the purest integrity, he carried to the utmost height his aversion to heterodoxy; and James Bainbridge, a man of particular, a gentleman of the Temple, experienced from him the greatest severity. Bainbridge, accused of favouring the new opinions, was carried to More's house; and having refused to discover his accomplices, the chancellor ordered him to be whipped in his presence, and afterwards sent him to the Tower, where he himself saw him put to the torture. The unhappy gentleman, overcome by all these severities, abjured his opinions; but feeling afterwards the deepest compunction for his apostasy, he openly returned to his former tenets, and even courted the crown of martyrdom. He was condemned as an obstinate and relapsed heretic, and was burned in Smithfield.

Many were brought into the bishops' courts for offences which appear trivial, but which were regarded as symbols of the party: some for teaching their children the Lord's prayer in English; others for reading the Old Testament in that language, and preaching in the Temple. To harbour the persecuted preachers, to neglect the facts of the church, to declaim against the vices of the clergy, were capital offences. One, Thomas Bilney, a priest, who had embraced the new doctrine, had been treated with abjuration; but was so haunted by remorse, that his friends dreaded some fatal effects of his despair. At last his mind seemed to be more relieved; but this appearing calm proceeded only from the resolution, which he had taken, of expiating his past offence by an open confession of the truth, and by dying a martyr to it. He went through Norfolk, teaching the people to beware of idolatry, and doctrine, which he defended, in this pilgrimage, to the cowl of St. Francis, to the prayers of the saints, or to images. He was soon seized, tried in the bishop's court, and condemned as a relapsed heretic; and the writ was sent to him to burn him. When he was brought to the state of mind he discovered such patience, fortitude, and devotion, that the spectators were much affected with the horrors of his punishment; and some mendicant friars who were present, fearing what that would do to his soul, and make them lose those alms which they received from the charity of the people, desired him publicly to acquit them of having any hand in his death. He willingly complied; and by this meekness gained the more on the minds of the devout spectators, who, in the most formidable of his enemies, he knew, were the zealous adherents to the ancient religion, chiefly the monks, who, having their immediate dependence on the Roman pontiff, apprehended their own ruin, they being by his condemnation, the ruin of his authority in England. Peyto, a friar, preaching before the king, had the assurance to tell him, "That many lying prophets had deceived him; but he, as a true Micah, warned him, that the dogs would lick his blood, as they had done Ahab's." The king took no notice of the insult, but allowed the preacher to depart in peace. Next Sunday he employed Dr. Corren to preach before him; who justified the king's proceedings, and gave Peyto the admonitions of a rebel, a sinner, a dog, and a traitor. On another day, another friar of the same house, interrupted the preacher, and told him that he was one of the lying prophets, who sought to establish by sedition the succession of the crown; but the king would not suffer him to make bis wishes known. Henry silenced the petulant friar; but showed no other mark of resentment than ordering Peyto and him to be summoned before the council, and to be rebuked for their offence. These accounts of his obstinacy and arrogance: when the Earl of Essex, a privy councillor, told them, that they deserved for their offence to be thrown into the Thames; Elton replied, that the road to heaven lay as near by water as by land.

But several monks were detected in a conspiracy, which, as it might have proved more dangerous to the king, was on its discovery attended with more fatal consequences to themselves. Elizabeth Barton, of Aldington, Kent, in Kent, commonly called the holy Maid of Kent, had been subject to hysterical fits, which threw her body into unusual convulsions; and having produced an entire disappearance of her bodily form, which made her appear changeable, she was suspected of supernatural power. And Richard Masters, of Martham, was a fellow, founded on them a project, from which he hoped to acquire both profit and consideration. He went to Warham, the Archdeacon of Canterbury, then alive; and having given an account of Elizabeth's revelations, he so far wrought on that prudent but superstitious prelate, as to receive orders from him to watch her in her trances, and carefully to note down all her future sayings. The regard paid her by a person of so high a rank soon removed her still more from the object of attention to the neighbourhood; and it was easy for Masters to persuade them, as well as the monks, that her ravings were inspirations of the Holy Ghost. Knowing, as is usual, soon after succeeding in their delusion to extend it beyond their own circle, and in fear of the knowledge to the neighbours, as well as being worn out in extraordinary tomes, such speeches as were dictated to her by her spiritual director. Masters associated with him Dr. Bocking, a canon of Canterbury, and the design was to raise the credit of an image of the Virgin, which stood in a chapel belonging to Masters, and to draw to it such pilgrimages as usually frequented the more famous images and relics. In prosecution of this design, Elizabeth was led to co-relations, which directed her to have recourse to that image for a cure; and being brought before it, in the presence of a great multitude, she fell anew into convulsions; and after disturbing her limbs and countenance during a consultation, of six days and nights; and the image was procured by the intercession of the Virgin. This miracle was soon bruited abroad; and the two priests, finding the imposture to succeed beyond their own expectations, began to extend its views to the most important enterprizes. They taught their penitent to claim against the new doctrines, which she denounced heresy; against innovations in ecclesiastical government; and against the use of meat and wine. She went so far as to assert, that if he prosecuted that design, and married another, he should not be king a month longer, and should not an hour longer enjoy the favour of the church; but should die the death of a villain. Many monks throughout England, either from folly or roguery, in order to quench a polt of the sheep, entered into the delusion; and one Deering, a friar, was so entirely under the impression of the Virgin, that he composed a book, of which the princess was persuaded to present to the pope; and the Pope's ambassadors gave encouragement to the popular credulity; and even Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, though a man of sense and learning, was so entirely cast into the error, as to be carried to the party which he had espoused. The king at last began to think the matter worthy of his attention; and having ordered Elizabeth and her accomplices to be arrested, he was persuaded that Peyto had extorted the money freely, without being put to the torture, made confession of their guilt. The parliament, in the session held the beginning of this year, passed an act of attainder against some of the chief, with this new instance; and ordered Elizabeth herself, Masters, Bocking, Deering, Rich, Hoby, Gold, suffered for their crime. The Bishop of Rochester, Abd, Addison, Lawrence, and others were condemned for misapprehension of treason; because they had not discovered some criminal speeches which they heard from Elizabeth; and they were thrown into prison. The better to undeceive the multitude, the forgery of many of the prophetess's miracles was detected; and even the scandalous prostitution of her manners was laid open to the public. Those passions, which so naturally insinuate themselves amid the warm intimacies maintained by the delicate disposition, and under circumstances which, when related to Elizabeth and her confederates, and it was found, that he, a door to her dormitory, which was said to have been marvellously opened in order to give her access to the chapel, for the sake of frequent converse with heaven, had been contrived by the king, who designed to have thus substituted another imposture. The detection of this imposture, attended with so many odious circumstances, both hurt the credit of the ecclesiastics, particularly the monks, and insinuated the king to take vengeance on them. He suppressed three monasteries of the Observantine friars; and finding that little clamour was excited by this act of power, he was the more encouraged to lay his rapacious hands on the remainder. Meanwhile, he exercised punishment on individuals who were obnoxious to him. The parliament had made it treason to endeavour depriving the king of his dignity or titles: they had lately added to his other titles that of supreme head of the church: it was inferred, that to deny his supremacy was treason; and this was sufficiently allowed to be the case by the making of a new species of guilt. It was certainly a high instance of tyranny to punish the mere delivery of a political opinion, especially one that nowise affected the king's temporal right. Yet a capital sentence was pronounced against a capital offense; and the parliament, in passing this law, had overlooked all the principles by which a civilized, much more a free people, should be governed: but the violence of changing so suddenly the whole system of government, and making it treason to deny what, during many ages, it had been heresy to assert, is an event which may appear somewhat extraordinary. Even the stern unremitting mind of Henry was at first shocked with these insanguinary measures; and he went so far as to change his gird and dress; pretending sorrow for the necessity by which he was pushed to such extremities. Still impelled, however, by his violent passion of striking a terror into the whole nation, he proceeded, by making examples of Fisher and More, to consummate his lawless tyranny.

John Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, was a man eminent, learned, devout, and most liberal to his clergy; and for his high favours he was long enjoyed with the king. When he was thrown into prison on account of his refusing the oath which regarded the succession, and his opposition to the king's dispensation in favour of Kathryn Claren's, his high degree of聖可 examples, he had not only been deprived of all his revenues, but stripped of his very clothes, and without consideration of his extreme age, he was allowed nothing but a small allowance of bread to sustain him. He was deprived of his benefice, and in this condition he lay in prison above a twelvemonth; when the Pope, willing to recompense the sufferings of so faithful an adherent, created him a cardinal; though Fisher was so indifferent about that dignity, that even if the purple were lying at his feet, he declared that he would not stoop to take it. This promotion of a man, merely for his opposition to royal authority, enlarged the indignation of the king; and he resolved to make an example of Fisher and More, to prevent the effects of his resentment. Fisher was indicted for denying the king's supremacy, was tried, condemned, and beheaded.

More was brought to the bar of the English court to answer for the impeachment, on account of his great authority both abroad and at home, and his high reputation for learning and virtue, was anxiously desired by the king. That prince also bore a very high opinion of the character and principles of More, as his imperturbable mind, the sport of passions, was susceptible of towards a man, who, in any particular, opposed his violent inclinations. But More could never be prevailed on to acknowledge any opinion so contrary to his principles as that of the king's supremacy; and though Henry exacted that compliance from the whole nation, there was as yet no law obliging any one to take an oath to that purpose. Rich, the solicitor-general, was sent to confer with More, then a prisoner, who kept a cautious silence with regard to the supremacy: he was only inveigled to say, that any question with regard to the law which established that prerogative, was a second-rate law: if a person answer one way, it will confound his soul; if another, it will destroy his body. No more was wanted to found an indictment of high treason against the prisoner. His silence excited the jealousy of More, as he supposed the king's anxiety to the terrors of death. Not only his constancy, but even his cheerfulness, nay, his usual facetiousness, never for-ook him; and he made a sacrifice of his life to his integrity, with the same indifference that he maintained in any ordinary occurrence. When he was mounting the scaffold, he said to one Friend, helping him when I come down again, let me shift for myself. The executioner asked him forgiveness: he granted the request, but told him, "You will never get credit by beheading me, my neck is so short." Then laying his head on the block, he bade the executioner strike for the head, which he did. "For," said he, "it is never committed treason. Nothing was wanting to the glory of this end, except a better cause, more free from weakness and superstition. But as the measure of this principle was not only full of no apprehension to his enemies, but, on the contrary, were misguided, his constancy and integrity are not the less objects of our admiration. He was beheaded in the fifty-third year of his age.

When the execution of Fisher and More was reported at Rome, especially that of the former, who was invested with the dignity of cardinal, every one discovered the most violent rage against the king; and numerous libels were published by the wits and censors of Italy, comparing him to Caligula, Nero, Domitian, and all the most unremitting tyrants of antiquity. Clement VII. had died about six months after he pronounced sentence against More, and Paul III. of the name of Farnese succeeded to the papal throne. This pontiff, who, while cardinal, had always favoured Henry's cause, had hoped that, personal animosities being buried with his predecessor, it might not be impossible to form an agreement with England, and in that way to reconcile himself with the accommodating matters, that in a negotiation which he entered into with Francis a little before this time, he required that that monarch should conciliate a friendship between him and the court of Rome, and that Henry was accustomed to prescribe, not to receive terms; and even while he was negotiating for peace, his usual violence often carried him to commit offences which rendered the most effectual reparation impossible. On his death, however regarded by Paul as so capital an injury, that he immediately passed censures against the king, citing him and all his adherents to appear in Rome within ninety days, in order to answer for their crimes: if they failed, he excommunicated them; deprived the king of his crown; laid the kingdom under an interdict; declared his issue by Anne Boleyn null and void; dissolved all leagues which any catholic princes had made with him; gave his kingdom to any invader; commanded the nobility to take arms against him; freed his subjects from all oaths of allegiance; cut off their commerce with foreign states; and finally declared it lawful for any one to make war on the subjects of their persons, and to convert their effects to his own use. But though these censures were passed, they were not at that time openly denounced: the Pope delayed their publication till he should find an agreement with England entirely desperate; and till the emperor, who was at that time hard pressed by the Turks and the protestant princes in Germany, should be in a condition to carry the sentence into execution.

The king knew that he might expect any injury which it should be in Charles's power to inflict; and he therefore made it the chief object of his policy to incapacitate that monarch from wreaking his resentment upon him. He renewed his friendship with France, and opened negotiations for marrying his infant daughter, Elizabeth, with the Duke of Angoulême, third son of Francis. These two monarchs also made advances to the princes of the protestant league in Germany, ever jealous of the emperor's ambition: and Henry, besides remitting them some money, sent for, Bishop of Hereford, as Francis did Bellay, Lord of Prades; one to expound for the emperor during the first fervours of the Reformation, an agreement in theological tenets was held, as well as a union of interests, to be essential to a good correspondence among states; and though both Francis and Henry flattered the German princes with the eminence which they would obtain, when the empire of Augsburg, it was looked upon as a bad symptom of their sincerity, that they exercised such extreme rigour against all preachers of the Reformation in their respective dominions. Henry carried the feint so far, that, while he thought himself the first theologian in the world, he yet invited over Melancthon, Bucer, Sturmus, Druc, and other German divines, that they might confer with him, and instruct him in the foundation of their tenets. These theologians were now of great importance in the world; and we must suppose Henry could not despise them: as Henry had no hopes of agreement with such zealous disputants, and knew that in Germany the followers of Luther would not associate with the disciples of Zuinglius, because, though they agreed in everything else, they differed in some minute particulars with regard to the eucharist, he was the more indifferent on account of this refusal. He could also foresee, that even while the league of Sinculacile did not act in concert with him, they would always be carried by their interests to oppose the emperor; and the hatred between Francis and that monarch was so ineradicable, that he deemed himself sure of a sincere ally in one or other of these potentates.

A.D. 1560. An incident happened in England which promised a more amicable conclusion of those disputes, and seemed even to open the way for a reconciliation between Henry and Charles. The young Catharine was taken ill, an illness which at last brought her to her Death of Queen Catharine, at the age of forty-three, on the 6th of January. She was beloved by all who knew her, from the appellation of her most dear lord, king, and husband. She told him, that as the hour of her death was now approaching, she had held of this last opportunity to insculpate on him the importance of his religious duty, and the comparative unimportance of all human grandeur and enjoyment; that though his fondness towards these perishable advantages had thrown her into many calamities, as well as created to him many a trouble, she yet forgave him all peril and injury, and hoped that his pardon would be ratified in heaven and that she had no other request to make, than to recommend to him her daughter, the sole pledge of their love, and to direct his policy for her maids and servants. She concluded with these words, I make this vow, that my dear deserv you above all things.

The emperor thought, that as the demise of his aunt had removed all foundation of personal animosity between him and Francis, there might not be the least difficulty to detain him from the alliance of France, and to renew his own confederacy with England, from which he had formerly reaped so much advantage. He sent Henry proposals for a return to ancient amity, upon those conditions that he should be reconciled to the see of Rome, that he should assist him in his war with the Turk, and that he should take part with him against Francis, who now threatened the safety of Milan. The king replied, that he was willing to be on good terms with the emperor, provided the prince would acknowledge that the former breach of friendship came entirely from himself: as to the conditions proposed, the proceedings against the Bishop of Rome were so just, and so fully ratified by the parliament of England, that they could not now be revoked; when Christian princes should have settled peace among themselves, he would not fail to exert that vigour which became him, against the enemies of the faith; and after uniting with him, when the emperor was once fully restored, he should then be in a situation, as a common friend both to him and Francis, either to mediate an agreement between them, or to assist the one with the other.

What rendered Henry more indifferent to the advances made by the emperor was, both the experience of the usual duplicity and insincerity of that monarch, and the intelligence which he received of the present transactions in Europe. Francis Sforza, Duke of Milan, had died without issue; and the emperor maintained that the duchy, being a fief of the empire, was devolved to him, as head of the Germanic body; not to give unbraze, however, to the states of Italy, he professed his intention of bestowing all that principedom on the Italian, where they were treated with most respect, had ever reached equal applause and admission with those wretched composers of metaphysical polities. The German princes to whom he had promised a fief, could not appear divines; and as Henry had no hopes of agreement with such zealous disputants, and knew that in Germany the followers of Luther would not associate with the disciples of Zuinglius, because, though they agreed in everything else, they differed in some minute particulars with regard to the eucharist, he was the more indifferent on account of this refusal. the crown was in a wretched condition during that age; the personal respect inspired by Henry was considerable, and even the terrors with which he overawed every one, were not attended with any considerable degree of hatred. His frankness, his sincerity, his magnificence, his generosity, were virtues which counted for little; all violence, cruelty, and impene-tropy. And the important rank which his vigour, more than his address, acquired him in all foreign negotiations, flattered the vanity of Englishmen, and made them the more willingly endure those domestic hardships to which they were exposed. The king, conscious of his advantages, was now proceeding to the most dangerous exercise of his authority; and after paying the way for that measure by several preparatory expedients, he was at last determined to suppress the monasteries, and to put himself in possession of their ample revenues.

The great increase of monasteries, if matters be considered merely in a political light, will appear the radical inconvenience of the catholic religion; and every other advantage attending that communion, seems to have an inseparable connexion with these religious institutions.

Papal usurpations, the tyranny of the inquisition, the multiple ecclesiastical holidays; all these, letters on liberty and industry, were ultimately derived from the authority and inanition of monks, whose habits, being established everywhere, proved so many seminaries of superstition and of folly. This order of men was externally enraged against Henry, and regarded the abolition of the papal authority in England as the removal of the sole protection which they enjoyed against the rapacity of the crown and of the courtiers. They were now sure of the crown's invalidation, as supported by the strong bulwarks of the monastic.

Home was rejected; the progress of the Reformation abroad, which had every where been attended with the abolition of the monastic orders, gave them reason to apprehend like consequences in their own country; and though the king still maintained the doctrine of purgatory, to which most of the convents owed their origin and support, it was foreseen, that in the progress of the contest, he would every day be led to more violent and oppressive measures, and be drawn nearer the terror of the reformers, with whom his political interests naturally induced him to unite. Moved by these considerations, the friars employed all their influce to inflame the people against the king's government; and Henry, finding their safety irreconcilable with his own, was determined to seize the present opportunity, and utterly destroy his declared enemies.

Cromwell, secretary of state, had been appointedvicar-generally of the church; consequently, by which the king's supremacy, or the absolute uncontrollable power assumed over the church, was delegated to him. He employed Loyalty, London, Prife, Gage, Petre, Bellesse, and others, as his aids; and, by degrees, he increased more and more their power. The king's authority was rendered more rigorous, and his interference more pressing in the matters of the friars. During times of faction, especially of the religious kind, no equity is to be expected from adversaries; and as it was known that the king's intention in this vistation was to find a pretence for abolishing monasteries, we may naturally conclude, that the reports of the commisssioners are very little to be relied on. Friars were couraged to bring in informations against their brethren; and the slightest evidence was credited: and even the calum-mies spread abroad by the friends of the Reformation, were regarded as grounds of proof. Monstrous disorders are therefore said to have been spread in many of the religious houses: whole convents of women abandoned the monastic ness: signs of abortions procured, of infants murdered, of unnatural lusts between persons of the same sex. It is indeed probable, that the blind submission of the people, during those ages, would render the friars and nuns more unguarded and more dissolute than they are in any Roman catholic country at present: but still the reproaches which it is safest to credit, are such as point at vices natually acquired to such absurd and mischievous conclusions, and with the monastic life. The cruel and invertebrate factions and quarrels, therefore, which the commissioners mentioned, are very credible among men, who, being confined within the same walls, never can forget their mutual animosities, and who, being cut off from all the most drearifying connexions of nature, are commonly cursed with hearts more selfish, and tempers more unrelenting than fall to the share of other men. The pious frauds practised to increase the devotion and liberality of the people, may be regarded as certain, in an order founded on illusion, lies, and superstition. The supine idleness also, and its attendant, profound ignorance, with which the convents were reproached, admit of no question; and though monks were the true preservers, as well as inventors, of the dreaming and captivating philosophy of the schools, no many or elegant knowledge could be expected among men who lives, condemned to a tedious uniformity, and deprived of all emulation, afforded nothing to raise the mind or cultiuate the genius.

Some few monasteries, terrifed with this rigorous inquicision, carried on by Cromwell and his commissioners, surrendered their revenues into the king's hands; and the monks received small pensions as the reward of their ob-sequeuences. Orders were given to dismiss such and friars as were below four-and-twenty, whose vows were, on that account, supposed not to be binding. The doors of the convents were opened, even to such as were believed to be of full age, and those who were not clined to take the oath of allegiance, preferred by the king. And they were still induced by every argument to the king's purpose, he had recourse to his usual instrumnet of power, the parliament; and in order to prepare mon for the innovations projected, the report of the visitors was published, and a general horror was environed to be excited in the nation against institutions, which, to their ancestors, had been the objects of the most profound veneration.
The king, when determined utterly to 4th Feb.
abandon the monastic orders, resolved to proceed gradually in this great work; and he gave directions to the parliament to go no further at present, than to suppress the less valuable monasteries, and to provide for four or five hundred pounds a-year. Some of these were found to be the most corrupted, as lying less under the restraint of shame, and being exposed to less scrutiny; and it was decided safest to begin with them, and thereby prepare the way for the greater innovations projected. By this act, three hundred and seventy-six monasteries were suppressed, and their revenues,amounting to thirty-two thousand pounds a-year, were granted to the deaneries, vicarages, chattels, and plate, computed at a hundred thousand pounds more.
It does not appear that any opposition was made to this important law: so absolute was Henry's authority: a court, called the council of the kingdom, by which the augmentation of the king's revenue, was erected for the management of these funds.
The people naturally concluded, from this circumstance, that Henry intended to proceed in despoiling the church of her patrimony.

The act formerly passed, empowering the king to name three hundred commissioners for framing a body of cannonlaw, was renewed; but the project was never carried into execution. Henry thought that the present perplexity of that law increased his authority, and kept the clergy in still greater dependence.

Further progress was made in completing the union of Wales with England: the separate jurisdiction of several great lords or marchers, as they were called, which obstructed the course of justice in Wales, and encouraged robbery and pillaging, were abolished; and the authority of the king's courts was extended every where. Some jurisdictions of a like nature in England, were also abolished this session.

The Commons, sensible that they had gained nothing by opposing the king's will when he formerly endeavoured alone to dispose of his landed possessions, and all the people recovered his liberty went contented to frame a law, such as he dictated to them. It 18th April. Dissolved the parliament, a part of which was memorable not only for the great and important innovations which it introduced, but also for the long time it had saten, and the frequent prorogations which it had undergone. Henry had found it so obsequious to his will, that he did not think it worth while to hazard a new election: and he continued the same parliament above six years: a practice at that time unusual in England.

The convocation, which sat during this session, was engaged in a very important work, the elaborating of the new translation which was projected of the Scriptures. The translation given by Tyndal, though corrected by himself in a new edition, was still complained of by the clergy as inaccurate and unfaithful; and it was now proposed to them, that they should themselves publish a translation, which would not be liable to those objections.

The friends of the Reformation asserted, that nothing could be more absurd than to conceal, in an unknown tongue, the word of God itself, and thus to counteract the will of Heaven, which, for the purpose of universal salvation, had saluted that salutary doctrine to all nations: that if that practice were not very absurd, the artifice at least was very gross, and proved a consciousness that the glosses and traditions of the clergy stood in direct opposition to the original text inscribed by Supreme Intelligence: that it was now necessary for the people, so long abused by interested pretensions, to see with their own eyes, and to examine whether the claims of the ecclesiastics were founded on the matters which was acknowledged to be derived from heaven; and that as a spirit of research and curiosity was happily revived, and men were now urged to make a choice among the contending doctrines of different sects, religious materials for decision, and above all, the Holy Scriptures, should be set before them; and the revealed will of God, which the change of language had somewhat obscured, be again, by their means, cast to mankind.

The favours of the ancient religion maintained, on the other hand, that the pretence of making the people see with their own eyes, was a mere cheat, and was itself a very gross artifice, by which the new preachers hoped to obtain the guidance of them, and seduce them from those pastors, whom the laws, whom ancient establishments, whom heaven itself, had appointed for their spiritual direction; that the people, by their ignorance, their superstition, and their necessary avocations, were ill fitted to choose their own principles; and it was a mockery to set materials before them, of which they could not possibly make any proper use: that even in the affairs of common life, regulated by heaven's immutable laws, it was utterly uncertain, whether conducted under the compass of human reason, the laws had, in a great measure, deprived them of the right of private judgment, and had, for their own and the public interest, regulated their conduct and behaviour; that theological questions were placed far beyond the sphere of vulgar comprehension; and ecclesiastics themselves, though assisted by all the advantages of education, erudition, and an assiduous study of the science, could not be fully instructed in all the difficulties of it; that sacred writing itself was involved in so much obscurity, gave rise to so many difficulties, contain- ed so many appearing contradictions, that it was the most dangerous weapon that could be intrusted into the hands of the ignorant and giddy multitude; that the poetical style in which a great part of it was composed, at the same time that it occasioned uncertainty in the sense, by its multiplied tropes and figures, was sufficient to kindle the zeal of fanaticism, and thereby throw civil society into the most furious convulsions: that n thousand sects must arise, which would pretend, each of them, to derive its tenets from the Scripture; and would be able, by specious arguments, or even without specious arguments, to seduce silly women and ignorant mechanics into a belief of the most monstrous principles: and that, if ever this disorder, dangerous in itself, and pestiferous in its consequences, should not be at last checked, it must be from the tacit acquiescence of the people in some new authority; and it was evidently better, without further contest or inquiry, to adhere piously to ancient, and therefore the most secure, establishments.

These later arguments, being more agreeable to ecclesiastical governments, would probably have prevailed in the convocation, had it not been for the authority of Cranmer, Latimer, and some other bishops, who were supposed to speak the king's sense of the matter. A vote was passed for publishing a new translation of the Scriptures; and in three years' time the work was finished and printed at Paris. This was deemed a great point gained by the reformers, and a considerable advancement of their cause. Further progress was soon expected, after such important successes.

But while the retainers to the new religion were exulting in their prosperity, they met with a mortification, which seemed to blast all their hopes. Their patroness, Anne Bolyn, possessed no longer the king's favour; and soon after lost her life by the virtue of that famous Intelligence: she was persuaded in love to this lady during six years that his prosecution of the divorce lasted; and the obstacles he met at the gratification of his passion, the more determined zeal did he show to persevere, and the hands acknowledged, which had submitted, and still increased, under difficulties, had not long attained secure possession of its object, when it languished from safety; and the king's heart was appeased by the death of his Consort, whose enemies soon perceived the fatal change; and they were forward to widen the breach, when they found that they incurred no danger by interfering in those delicate concerns. She had been delivered of a dead son; and Henry's extreme fondness for male issue being thus, for the present, disappointed, his temper, equally violent and superstitious, was disposed to make the innocent mother answerable for the misfortune. But the chief means which Anne's enemies employed to disgrace her, was to persuade the king to divorce her.

Anne, though she appears to have been entirely innocent, and even virtuous, in her conduct, had a certain guile, if not levity, of character, which threw her off her guard, and which was not so easily concealed as she supposed. Her education in France rendered her the more prone to those false points; and it was with difficulty she confirmed herself to that strict ceremonial practised in the court of England. More than haughtily, she was pleased to see the influence of her beauty on all around her, and she indulged herself in an easy familiarity with persons who were formerly her equals, and who might then have pretended to her friendship and good graces. Henry's dignity was offended with these popular manners; and though the lover had been entirely blind, the husband possessed but too quick discernment and penetration; instruments that interposed a malignant interpretation on the harmless liberties of the queen.

Viscountess of Rochford, in particular, who was married to the queen's brother, but who lived on bad terms with her sister-in-law, insinuated the most cruel suspensions in the king's mind; and as she was a woman of prodigious character, she paid no regard either to truth or humanity in those calumnies which she suggested. She pretended that her own husband was engaged in a criminal correspondence with his sister; and not content with this imputation, she poisoned every action of the queen's, and represented each instance of favour which she conferred on any one as a token of affection. Henry Norris, groom of the stole, Weston and Berenson, gentlemen of the king's chamber, together with Mark Smeaton, groom of the chamber, were observed to possess much of the queen's friendship; and they served her with a zeal and attachment which, though chiefly derived from gratitude, might not improbably be seasoned with some mixture of tenderness for so smaile a princess. The king's jealousy laid hold both on them and her; but, being rather in that no particular object on which it could fasten, it vented itself equally on every one that came within the verge of its fury. Had Henry's jealousy been derived from love, though it might immediately be excited by the most trifling and unimportant object, it would have been subject to many remorses and contrarieties; and might at last have served only to augment that affection on which it was founded. But it was more austere and fixed in its course. His love was transferred to another object. Jane, daughter of Sir John Seymour, and maid of honour to the queen, a young lady of singular beauty and merit, had obtained an entire ascendant over him; and he was determined to sacrifice everything to the gratification of this new appetite. Unlike to most monarchs, who judge lightly of the crime of gallantry, and who deem the young dandies of their court rather honoured than disgraced by their passion, he seldom thought of the consequences of his conduct still until it became so intense in its effect. And in order to touch this end, he underwent many difficulties, and comitted greater crimes, than those which he sought to avoid by forgoing that legal connexion. And having taken his design, he was not a little pleased with the success of his negociation. His mistress to his bed and throne, he more willingly hearkened to every suggestion which threw any imputation of guilt on the unfortunate Anne Boleyn.

1st May. In a letter written to the Queen at her castle of Greenwich, the queen happened to drop her handkerchief; an accident probably casual, but interpreted by him as an instance of gallantry to some of her paramours. 3 He immediately retired from the place; sent orders to confine her to her chamber; arrested Norris, Breton, Weston, and Smeton, together with her brother, Rocheford; and threw them into prison. The next day, she was called to the audience; and in this situation, he thought that he meant only to try her; but finding him in earnest, she reflected on his obstinate unrelenting spirit, and she prepared herself for that melancholy doom which was awaiting her. Next day was sent to the Tower; and on her way thither she was informed of her supposed offences, of which she had hitherto been ignorant; she made earnest protestations of her innocence; and when she entered the prison she fell on her knees, and prayed God to avenge her. The whole charge was immediately examined; and the first thing that he meant to try her: but finding him in earnest, she reflected on his obstinate unrelenting spirit, and she prepared herself for that melancholy doom which was awaiting her. Next day was sent to the Tower; and on her way thither she was informed of her supposed offences, of which she had hitherto been ignorant; she made earnest protestations of her innocence; and when she entered the prison she fell on her knees, and prayed God to avenge her. The whole charge was immediately examined; and the first thing that he meant to try her was the crime imputed to her. Her surprise and confusion threw her into hysterical disorders; and in that situation she thought that the best proof of her innocence, was to make an entire confession of the crime of which she had been accused; and upon the strength of which simplicity had equally betrayed her to commit and avow. She owned that she had once rallied Norris on his delaying his marriage, and had told him that he probably expected her when she should be a widow: she had reproved Weston, she said, for his affection to a kinwoman of hers, and his indifference towards his wife: to the slander of the issue begotten between the king and her. This strained interpretation her guilt was brought under the statute of the 25th of this reign, in which it was declared criminal to throw any slander upon the king, queen, or their issue. Such palpable absurdities were, at that time, admitted; and they were regarded by the Peers of England as a sufficient reason for sacrificing an innocent woman to the cruelty of their judge. Though she was assisted by counsel, she defended herself with presence of mind; and the spectators could not forbear pronouncing her entirely innocent. Judgment, however, was given by the court, both as to the question of right and wrong. Rochford; she and her verdict contained, that she should be burned or beheaded at the king's pleasure. When this dreadful sentence was pronounced she was not terrified, but biting up her hands to heaven, said, "O Father! O Creator I here, who are the way, the truth, and the life, thou knowest that I have not deserved this fate." And then turning to the judges, made the most pathetic declarations of her innocence.

Henry, not satisfied with this cruel vengeance, was resolved entirely to annul his marriage with Anne Boleyn, and to declare her issue illegitimate: he recalled to his memory, that a little after her appearance in the English court, some attachment had been acknowledged between her and the Earl of Northumberland, then Lord Percy; and he now questioned that nobleman with regard to these engagements. Northumberland took an oath before the two princes, that not the least rumour or suspicion of marriage had ever passed between them: he received the sacrament upon it, before the Duke of Norfolk and others of the privy-council; and this solemn act he accompanied with the oath of truth. The question, however, was, whether he was shaken by menaces of executing the sentence against her in its greatest rigour, and was prevailed on to confess in court some lawful impediment to her marriage. The affair was, therefore, submitted, as judge, thought himself obliged, by this confessions, to pronounce the marriage null and invalid. Henry, in the transports of his fury, did not perceive that his proceedings were totally inconsistent, and that if her marriage were, from the beginning, invalid, she could not possibly be guilty of adultery. The queen now prepared for suffering the death to which she was sentenced. She sent her last message to the king, and acknowledged the obligations which she owed him in his uniformly continuing his endeavours for her advancement: from a private gentlewoman, she said, he had first made her a marchioness; and as he could raise her no higher in this world, he was sending her to be a saint in heaven. She then renewed the protestations of her innocence, and recommended her daughter to his care. Henry, having heard of the death of the Tower, who approached, and asked her, she made the like declarations; and continued to behave herself with her usual modesty, and even with cheerfulness. "The executioner," she said to the lieutenant, "is, I hear, very expert; and my neck is very slender:" upon which she grasped it in her hand, and smiled. When brought, however, to the scaffold, she softened her tone a little with regard to her protestations of innocence. She probably reflected that the obstinacy of Queen Catherine, and her opposition to the king's will, had much alienated him from the lady Mary: her own maternal concern, therefore, for Edward, increased, in these last moments, over that indignation which the unjust sentence which she suffered, naturally excited in her. She said that she was come to die, as she was sentenced by the law: she would accuse none, nor say any thing of the ground upon which she suffered. She prayed heartily for the king; called him a most merciful and gentle prince; and acknowledged that he had always been to her a good and gracious sovereign; and if any one should think proper to canvass her cause, she desired him to judge the better. She was beheaded by the executioner of Calais, who was sent for as more expert than any in England. Her body was negligently thrown into a common chest of elm-tree, made to hold arrows, and was buried in the Tower.

The innocence of this unfortunate queen cannot reasonably be called in question. Henry himself, in the violence of his rage, knew not whom to accuse as her lover; and though he imputed guilt to her brother, and four of her persons were taken to be accessory to her cause, the whole tenor of her conduct forbids us to ascribe to her an abandoned character, such as is implied in the king's accusation: had she been so lost to all prudence as to attempt to betray herself or her family to detection, and afforded her enemies some evidence against her. But the king made the most effectual apology for her, by marrying Jane Seymour the very day after her execution. His impatience to gratify this new passion and the sin he committed, made a sacrifice; and this cruel heart was not softened a moment by the bloody catastrophe of a person who had so long been the object of his most tender affections.

The lady Mary thought the death of her step-mother a proper opportunity for reconciling herself to the king, who, besides other causes of disgust, had been offended with her on account of the part which she had taken in her brother's divorce: she, however, after the death of Ann and Henry exacted from her some further proofs of submission and obedience: he required this young princess, then about twenty years of age, to adopt his theological sentiments, and to receive the absolution of her sins from the Pope; and to own her mother's marriage to be unlawful and incestuous. These points were of hard digestion with the princess; but after some delays, and even refusals, she at last submitted. The queen, however, was, according to her father's, continuing her assent to the articles required of her: upon which she was received into favour. But notwithstanding the return of the king's affection to the issue of his marriage, he did not favor it with the same tenderness towards the lady Elizabeth; and the marriage was still in suspense with a singular sweetness of disposition, discovered strong proofs of attachment towards her.

The trial and conviction of Queen Anne, and the bringing to England, made a sacrifice; and this per- necessary for the king to summon a new parliament: and he, here, in his speech, made a merit to his people, that, notwithstanding the misfortunes attending his two former marriages, he had been induced, for their good, to venture on a third. The speaker received this profession with suitable gratitude; and he took thence occasion to praise the king for his wonderful gifts of grace and nature: he compared his goodness with the strength and fortitude, to Samson; and for beauty and comeliness, to Absalom. The king very humbly replied, by the mouth of the chancellor, that he discovered these two graces in his two princesses, and that the jewels by which the descendants, they were the gift of Almighty God only. Henry found that the parliament was no less submissive in deeds than complaisant in their expressions, and that they would go the same lengths as the former in gratifying even his most lawless passions. His divorce from Anne Boleyn was ratified; that queen and all her accom- plishments were attainted; the issue of both his former marriages were declared illegitimate, and it was even made treason to assert the legitimacy of either of them; to throw any slander upon the present king, queen, or their issue, was subjected to the same penalty; the crown was settled on the king's issue by Jane Seymour, or any subse- quent wife; and in case he should die without children, he was empowered, by his will, or letters patent, to dispose of the crown: an enormous authority, especially when intrenched to a prince so violent and capricious in his humour, and so unskillful in the discipline of his court. A new law was made, upon oath to any article of this act of settlement, was declared to be guilty of treason; and by this clause, a species of political inquiry was established in the kingdom, as well as the severity of treason multiplied to an unreasonable degree. The king was also empowered to confer on any one, by his will or letters patent, any estates, honours, liberties, or franchises; words which might have been extended to the dismembering of the kingdom, by the erection of principalities and independent jurisdictions. It was also, by another act, made treason to make laws or decrees, or other ordinances, which might be unpleasing to the king, whom they acknowledge their supreme head, and whose commands they were resolved to obey; renouncing the Pope's usurped authority, with all his laws and inventions, now to be abolished, and acknowledging Almighty God and his laws, and unto the king and the laws made within this kingdom."

The convocation came at last, after some debate, to decide articles, which it was desired should take the form and condition of the assembly, or to give it a kind as the assembly itself, or rather as the king's system of theology, by which they were resolved entirely to square their principles. They determined the standard of faith to consist in the Scriptures and the three creeds, the Apostolic, Nicene, and Athanasian; and this article was a signal victory to the reformers: auricular confession and penance were admitted, a doctrine agreeable to the Catholics: no mention was made of marriage, extreme unction, confirmation, or holy orders, as sacraments; and in this omission the influence of the protestants appeared: the real presence was asserted, conformably to the ancient document: the terms of acceptance were established to be the merits of Christ, and good pleasure of God, suitably to the new principles.

So far the two sects seem to have made a fair partition, by alternately sharing the several clauses. In framing the subsequent acts, the subsequent changes of heart and the corresponding views, were quite apparent in its ingredient. The catholics prevailed in asserting, that the use of images was warranted by Scripture; the protestants, in warning the people against idolatry, and the abuse of those sensible representations. That the faith was adopted in maintaining the expediency of praying to saints; the late innovations, in rejecting the peculiar patronage of saints to any trade, profession, or course of action. The union of the two sects, in fact of his church, in the distinct auditing of the holy of holies, and the ceremonies practised on Ash-Wednesday, Palm-Sunday, Good-Friday, and other festivals, were still maintained; but the new refinements, which made light of these institutions, were also adopted, by the convoca-tion's denying that they had any immediate power of remitting sin, and by its asserting, that their sole merit consisted in prompting pious and devout dispositions in the mind.

But the article with regard to purgatory, contains the most curious jargon, absurdity, and hesitation, arising from the mixture of opposite tenets. It was to this purpose: "Since according to due order of charity, and the will of God, it is meet we should discharge a very good and charitable deed to pray for souls departed; and since such a practice has been maintained in the church from the beginning; all bishops and teachers should instruct the people to be greased for the continuance of the same. But since the place where departed souls are retained, before they reach paradise, as well as the nature of their pains, is left uncertain by Scripture; all such questions are to be submitted to God, to whose mercy it is meet and convenient to commit the deceased, trusting that he accepteth our prayers for them."

These articles, when framed by the convocation, and corrected by the king, were subscribed by every member of that assembly; while, perhaps, either there, or throughout the whole kingdom, could one man be found, except Henry himself, who had adopted precisely these very same doctrines and reformations. For, though the contradiction in the tenets above mentioned, it had happened in England, as in all countries where factions divisions have place; a certain creed was embracing by each party; and however they were to be found, with these consisted only of speculative or whimsical people of whom two persons could scarcely be brought to an agreement in the same dogmas. The protestants, all of them, carried their opposition to Home further than those articles: none of the catholics went so far: and the king by being able to retain the nation in such a delicate medium, displayed the utmost power of an imperious despotism of which any history furnishes an example. To change the religion of a country, even when seconded by a party, to one which no party other than that of the nation can attempt, and often proves the most destructive to royal authority. But Henry was able to set the political machine in that furious movement, and yet regulate and even stop its career: he could say to it, Thus far shall thou go, and no farther. The vote of the people, the parliament and convocation subservient, not only to his interests and passions, but even to his greatest caprices; nor to his most refined and most scholastic subtleties.

One of these two contrary attributes served, no doubt, to increase the king's power over the people, and raised him to an authority more absolute than any prince in a simple monarchy, even by means of military force, is ever able to attain. But there are certain bounds, beyond which the most slavish submission cannot be extended. All the late innovations, particularly the dissolution of the smaller monasteries, and the imminent danger to which the rest were exposed, had bred discontent among the people, and had disposed them to revolt. The capricious monks, wandering about the country, excited both the pity and compassion of men; and as the ancient religion took hold of the populace by powerful motives, suited to vulgar and childish tastes, he was able, now that he had brought into apparent hazard, to raise the strongest zeal in its favour.

Discontent

Discontent had even reached some of the nobility and gentry, whose ancestors had been among the most zealous who placed a vanity in those institutions, as well as reaped some benefit from them, by the provisions which they afforded them for their younger children. The more superstitious were interested for the souls of their forefathers which, they believed, must now lie during many ages in the torments of purgatory, for want of masses to relieve them. It seemed unjust to abolish pious institutions, for the faults, real or pretended, of individuals. Even the most moderate and reasonable deemed it somewhat injudicious, that men who had been invited into a course of life, by all the laws, human and divine, which prevailed in their country, should be turned out of their possessions, and so little care be taken of their future subsistence. And when it was observed, that the rapacity and bribery of the commissioners and others employed in visiting the monasteries, intercepted much of the profits resulting from these confiscations, it tended much to increase the general discontent.

But the people did not break into open sedition till the complaints of the secular clergy concurred with those of the regular. As Cromwell's person was little acceptable to the disaffected, the nobility, whose property was so new, so absolute, so unlimited, inspired them with disgust and terror. He published, in the king's name, without the consent either of parliament or convocation, an ordinance by which he retrenched many of the ancient holidays; prohibited several superstitions gainful to the clergy, such as pilgrimages, images, relics; and even ordered the incumbents in the parishes to set apart a considerable portion of their revenue for repairs, and for the support of exhibitors and the poor of their parish. The secular priests, finding themselves thus reduced to a previous servitude, instilled into the people those discontent which they had long harboured in their own bosoms.

The insurrection in Lincolnshire was headed by Dr. Macklin, prior of Harlins, who was disguised like a mean mechanic, and who bore the name of Captain Cobbe. This tumultuary army amounted to 20,000 men; but notwithstanding their number they showed little disposition of proceeding to extremities against the king, and seemed still overawed by his authority. They acknowledged him to be supreme head of the church of England; but they complained of suppressing the monasteries, of evil counsellors, of persons meanly born raised to dignity, of the danger to which the jewels and plate of their parochial churches were exposed: and there were several prelates whom they represented as the chief of all the realm concerning the redress of these grievances. But Henry was little disposed to enthrone apprehensions of danger, especially from a low multitude, whom he despised. He sent forces against the rebels, under the command of Sir Ralph Evins, and put the whole in check.

Dr. Rackham, vol. i. p. 523.

The Duke of Norfolk was appointed general of the king's forces against the northern rebels; and as the Court party at court which supported the existing religion, he was also suspected of bearing some favour to the cause which he was sent to oppose. His prudent conduct, becoming a complete as he fell so to work within the same wood, that, in process of time, there was neither grass nor small tree to be found in the clearing. He was not unlike a bear, which in a wood which contains a number of small trees, you do not make him a hurdle, whereas, in his own forest, your little touching his mean to the great trees that he wanted a handle to work withal, and that he was constrained to sit all day, as he made it request to them that they would be pleased to grant him one of their small trees, which he made a handle, and by this means he graduated him one of their smaller trees to make him a hurdle. But now, however, seems to acquit him of this imputation. He encamped near Doncaster, together with the Earl of Shrewsbury; and as his army was small, scarcely exceeding five thousand men, he made choice of a post where he had a river in front, the ford of which he purposed to defend against the rebels. They had intended to attack him in the rear; and it may perhaps be doubted whether there did such violent rains as rendered the river utterly impassable; and Norfolk wisely laid hold of the opportunity to enter into treaty with them. In order to open the door for negotiation, he sent the Duke and the Bishop of Lincoln, with the Lord Privy Seal, to make an address to them; and, being received with great ceremony; he himself sitting in a chair at the side, with the Archbishop of York on one hand, and Lord Darcy on the other. It was agreed that two gentlemen should be dispatched to the king with proposals from the rebels; and Henry purposely delayed giving an answer, and allured them with hopes of entire satisfaction, in expectation that necessity would soon oblige them to disperse themselves. Being told that his artifice had in a great measure succeeded, he required them instantly to lay down their arms, and submit to mercy; promising a pardon to all, except six whom he named, and four whom he reserved to himself the power of naming. But though the greater part of the rebels had gone home for want of subsistence, they had entered into the most solemn engagements to return to their standards, in case the king’s answer should not prove satisfactory. Norfolk, however, consented to a treaty, on the condition that the rebels should not be quartered, except on the Duke of York, and that they should be relieved from all their punishments, and that the leaders should be not only pardoned, but also proceeded against. He had overruled the wishes of the southern parliamentarians, who, not doubting but that the king would yield, were resolved to have their affairs brought to a speedy and successful conclusion. He had been a constant advocate of the throne, and had taken the lead in the work of it; and most of them were condemned and executed. Lord Hussey was found guilty as an accomplice in the insurrection of Lincolnshire, and was executed at Lincoln. Lord Darcy, though he pleaded compulsion, and had in his justification to a long life spent in the service of the crown, was beheaded on Tower-Hill. Before his execution, he accused Norfolk of having secretly encouraged the rebels; but Henry, either sensible of the demands of his services, and convinced of his fidelity, or afraid to offend one of such extensive power and great capacity, rejected the information. Being now satiated with punishing the rebels, he published anew a general pardon, to which he was but superficially adhered, and he erected by patent a court of justice at York, for decrying law-suits in the northern counties: a demand which had been made by the rebels.

Soon after this prosperous success, an event happened, which confused the same councils. The birth of a son, whom was baptized by the name of Edward. Yet was not his happiness without alloy: the queen died two days after. But a son had so long been desired, that Henry was now become so necessary, in order to prevent disputes with regard to the succession, after the acts declaring the two princesses illegitimate, that the king’s affliction was doubled. He was now crowded in his house, and he expressed great satisfaction on the occasion. The prince, not six days old, was created Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, and Earl of Chester. Sir Edward Seymour, the queen’s brother, formerly made Lord Beauchamp, was raised to the dignity of Earl of Hertford. Sir William Pizz-Williams, his admiral, was created Earl of Southampton; Sir William Paultet, Lord St. John; Sir John Russel, Lord Russel.

The suppression of the rebellion, and the birth of a son, as they confirmed Henry’s authority at home, increased his consideration among foreign princes, and made his alliance be courted by all parties. He maintained, however, a neutrality in the wars, which were carried on by his subjects, and he desired to avoid all such disputes as would embroil himself with other powers. He was not at all disposed to enter into any of these disputes, and was interested in the tranquility of Europe. He renewed his offers of cementing a union with the German protestants; and for that purpose he sent Christopher Mount to a congress which they held at Brunswick; but that minister made no great progress in his negotiation. The princes wished to know what were the articles in their confession which Henry disliked; and they sent new ambassadors to him, who had orders both to negotiate and to dispute. They endeavoured to convince the king that he was guilty of a mistake in adhering to the church, and that he was bound to change his religion. They told him that he had no friends among the private masses, and in requiring the celibacy of the clergy. Henry would by no means acknowledge any error in these particulars; and was displeased that they should pretend to prescribe religion to so great a theologian. He found arguments and syllogisms enough to defend his cause; and he dismissed the ambassadors without coming to any conclusion. Jealous also lest his own subjects should become converted to the religion of their masters, he used great precaution in publishing that translation of the Scripture which was finished this year. He would only allow a copy of it to be deposited in some parish churches, where it was fixed by a chain; and he took care ---

331 HENRY VIII.

Oct. 30. An event happened, which confounded the same councils. The birth of a son, whom was baptized by the name of Edward. Yet was not his happiness without alloy: the queen died two days after. Jealous also lest his own subjects should become converted to the religion of their masters, he used great precaution in publishing that translation of the Scripture which was finished this year. He would only allow a copy of it to be deposited in some parish churches, where it was fixed by a chain; and he took care --- to inform the people by proclamation, 'That this indulgence was not the effect of his duty, but of his goodness and his liberality to them; who therefore should use it moderately, for the increase of virtue, not of strife: and he ordered that no man should read the Bible aloud, so as to disturb the priest while he be singing, or to expound doubtful places without advice from the learned.' In this measure, as in the rest, he still halted half way between the Catholics and the protestants.

There was only one particular in which Henry was decisive; because he was afraid partly of his avers, or, more properly speaking, his rapacity, the consequence of his profusion, and the threatened destruction of the monasteries; the present opportunity seemed favourable for that great enterprise, while the suppression of the late rebellion fortified and increased the royal authority; and as some of the abbots were suspected of having encouraged the insurrection, and of corresponding with the rebels, the king's resentment was further incited by that motive. A new visitation was appointed of all the monasteries in England; and a pretence only being wanted for their suppression, it was easy for a prince, possessed of such unlimited, still increasing power, and seconding the present humour of a great part of the nation, to find or feign one. The abbots and monks knew the danger to which they were exposed; and having learned, by the example of the lesser nobility, that nothing could withstand the king's will, they were most of them induced, in expectation of better treatment, to make a voluntary resignation of their houses. Where promises failed them, whether of amends, or even of immunity, they were employed; and as several of the abbots, since the breach with Rome, had been named by the court with a view to this event, the king's intentions were the more easily effected. Some also, having secretly embraced the doctrine of the Reformation, had no wish to be farther from office, pomp, and power; and on the whole, the design was conducted with such success, that in less than two years the king had got possession of all the monastic revenues.

In several places, particularly in the county of Oxford, great interest was made to preserve some convents of women, who, as they lived in the most irreproachable manner, justly merited, it was thought, that their houses should be exempted from the general destruction. There appeared also great difference between the case of nuns and that of friars; and the one institution might be laudable, while the other was exposed to much blame. The maids of honour, if endowed with industry, might both be service to the public; and none of them could want employment suited to his station and capacity. But a woman of family, who failed of a settlement in the marriage state, an accident to which such persons as these were exposed, whatever was the station, had really no rank which she properly filled; and a convent was a retreat both honourable and agreeable, from the inutility, and often want, which attended her situation. But the king was determined to abolish monasteries of every denomination; and probably thought that these ancient establishments would be the sooner forgotten, if no remains of them of any kind were allowed to subsist in the kingdom.

The better to reconcile the people to this great innovation, stories were propagated of the detestable lives of the friars in many of the convents; and great care was taken to defame those whom the court had determined to ruin. There was another superstition, which had so long been the object of the people's veneration, were exposed to their ridicule; and the religious spirit, now less bent on exterior observances and sensible objects, was encouraged in this new direction. It is needless to be prolix in an enumeration of particulars; inconstant historians mention on this occasion, with great triumph, the sacred repositories of convents: the parings of St. Edmund's toe; some of the coals that rosted St. Lawrence; the grail of the Virgin, shown in eleemosynary; the statue of St. Francis and his relics; some of the heads of St. Ursula; the felt of St. Thomas of Lancaster, an infallible cure for the head-ache; part of St. Thomas of Canterbury's shirt, much revered by his adherents: some relics, an excellent preventive against rain; others, a remedy to weeds in corn. But such fooleries, as they are to be found in all ages and nations, and even took place during the most refined periods of antiquity, form no particular or violent repugnance to the catholic religion.

There was neither discovered, or said to be discovered, in the monasteries, some impostures of a more artificial nature. At Hales, in the county of Gloucester, there had been shown, during several ages, the blood of Christ brought from Jerusalem; and it is easy to imagine the veneration with which such a relic was regarded. A miraculous circumstance also attended this miraculous relic; the sacred blood was not visible to any one in mortal danger; when set before them it had performed good works sufficient for his absolution, it would not desist to discover itself to him. At the dissolution of the monastery the whole contrivance was detected. Two of the monks, who were let into the secret, had taken the blood of a duck, which they renewed every week; they put it into a phial, one side of which consisted of thin and transparent crystal, the other of thick and opaque. When any rich pilgrim arrived, they were sure to show him the damage of the phial, fill it at Boxley, in Kent, and bore the appellation of the "Redd of Grace." The lips, and eyes, and head of the image moved on the approach of its votaries. Hilsley, Bishop of Rochester, broke the phial, and exposed the violence; they were employed to burn Friar Forest, who was punished for denying the supremacy, and for some pretended heresies. A finger of St. Andrew, covered with a thin plate of silver, had been pawned by a convent for a debt of forty pounds; but as the king's commissioners refused to pay the debt, people made themselves merry with the poor creditor on account of the pledge.

But of all the instruments of ancient superstition, no one was so sagaciously destroyed as the shrine of Thomas a Becket, commonly called St. Thomas of Canterbury. This saint owed his excommunication to the real cause which he had made for clerical privileges; and on that account also the monks had extremely encouraged the devotion of pilgrimages towards his tomb; and numberless were the miracles which they pretended his relics wrought in favour of his devout votaries. They raised his body here and there more holy than his tomb was performed, which was called the day of his translation, was a general holiday: every fifth year there was celebrated a jubilee to his honour, which lasted fifteen days: plenary indulgences were then granted to all that visited his tomb; and a hundred thousand pilgrims have been registered at a time in Canterbury. The devotion towards him had quite effaced, in that place, the adoration of the Deity; may, even that of the Virgin. At God's altar, for instance, there were offered, in one year, three pounds two shillings and sixpence; at the Virgin's, sixty-three pounds five shillings and sixpence; at St. Thomas's, eight hundred and thirty-two pounds twelve shillings and three pence. It is thus easy to understand, that when it was said there was not a penny offered at God's altar; the Virgin's gained only four pounds one shilling and eight-pence; but St. Thomas had got, for his share, nine hundred and fifty-four and sixpence. Louis VII. of France had made a pilgrimage to this miraculous tomb, and bestowed on the shrine a jewel, esteemed the richest in Christendom. It is evident how obnoxious to Henry a saint of this character must appear, and how contrived it was to project it; to Louis VII. of France the court of Rome. He not only pillaged the rich shrine dedicated to St. Thomas: he made the saint himself be cited to appear in court, and be tried and condemned as a rector, and to be stricken out of the calendar; the office for his festival to be expanded from all breviaries; his bones to be burned, and the ashes to be thrown in the air.

On the whole, the king at different times suppressed six hundred and forty-four monasteries, of which twenty-eight had abbeys that enjoyed a seat to parliament. Ninety colleges were demolished in several counties; two thousand three hundred and seventy-four chanceries and free charters of the abbeys were seized. The revenue of these establishments amounted to one hundred and sixty-one thousand one hundred pounds. It is worthy of observation, that all the lands and possessions and revenue of England had, a little before this period, been ranging from a few hundred to a thousand pounds. The revenues of these monasteries, even comprehending the lesser monasteries, did not exceed the twentieth part of the national income; a sum vastly inferior to what is commonly apprehended. The lands belonging to the convents were usually let at a low rent; and the farmers, who regarded themselves as a species of proprietors, took always care to renew their leases before they expired.

Great monasteries were every where excited on account of these violations; and men much questioned whether priests or monks, who were only trustees or tenants for life, could, by any deed, however voluntary, transfer to the king the estates they enjoyed. Thus, as he had declared in his encyclical directed to the people to such mighty innovations, they were told that the king would never thereafter have occasion to levy taxes, but would be able, from the abbey lands alone, to bear, during war as well as peace, the whole charges of government.

With such an attraction, the monks were everywhere in great demand. Henry took an effectual method of interesting the nobility and gentry in the success of his measures: he either made a gift of the revenues of convents to his favorite, or, if they were sold, he brought with the sales, by art, for a high price, what he had exchanged for other lands on very disadvantageous terms. He was so profuse in these liberalities, that he is said to have given a woman the whole revenue of a conven ture, as a sign of favor, which happened to gratify her palate. He also settled pensions on the abbots and priors, proportioned to their former revenues or to their merits; and gave each monk a yearly pension of eight marks: he erected new bishoprics, Westminster, Oxford, Peterborough, Bristol, Chester, and Gloucester, of which five subsist at this day: and by all these means of expense and dissipation the profits which the king reaped by the seizure of church lands fell much short of what was expected. It is not without some years before it happened, the monks had taken care to secrete most of their stock, furniture, and plate; so that the spoils of the great monasteries bore not, in these respects, the same effect there, as at home.

Beside the lands possessed by the monasteries, the regular clergy enjoyed a considerable part of the benefices of England, and of the tithes annexed to them; and these were especially at this time transferred to the crown, and by that means passed into the hands of laymen: an abuse which many zealous churchmen regarded as the most criminal seizure. The monks were formerly much at their ease in England, and enjoyed revenues which exceeded the regular and stated expense of the house. We read of the abbey of Cirencester, in Sussex, which possessed 744 pounds a year, though it contained only fourteen monks: that of Furnese, in the county of Lincoln, was valued at 960 pounds a year, and contained but thirty.

In order to dissipate their revenues, and support popularity, the monks lived in a hospitable manner; and besides the poor maintained from their ollars, there were many decayed gentlemen, who passed their lives in traveling from convent to convent, and were entirely subsisted at the table of the friars. By this hospitality, as much as by their own inactivity, did the convents prove to the world the degree of the extravagance of the rich and the mean poverty of the poor; and in the too sudden an innovation, bound the new proprietors of abbey lands to support the ancient hospitality. But this engagement was fulfilled to very few places, and for a very short time.

It is easy to imagine the indignation with which the intelligence of all these acts of violence was received at Rome, and how much the ecclesiastics of that court, who had so long kept the world in subjection by high-sounding epithets, and by holy excrecacies, would now vent in their rage against the character and conduct of Henry. The Pope was at last incited to publish the bull which had been passed against that monarch; and in a public manner he delivered over his soul to the devil, and his dominions to the first invader. Libels were dispersed, in which he was anew compared to the most furious persecutors in antiquity; and the preference was now given to their side; for he had declared that Henry carried both with disregard of his own sacred person, and that he himself would have died for the sake of his interest. He was opposed in a learned and sublime address to the whole world of saints and angels. Above all, he was often reproached with his resemblance to the Emperor Julian, whom it was said he feared the superiors of the church, and loved the popes themselves respected; was at open hostility with heaven; and had engaged in professed enmity with the whole host of saints and angels. Above all, he was often reproached with his resemblance to the Emperor Julian, whom it was said he feared the superiors of the church, and loved the popes themselves respected; was at open hostility with heaven; and had engaged in professed enmity with the whole host of saints and angels.

Reginald de la Pole, or Reginald Pole, Cardinal Pole, was descended from the royal family, being fourth son of the Countess of Salisbury, daughter of the Duke of Clarence, and cousin of the queen. He was the offspring of that fine genius and generous disposition by which, during his whole life, he was so much distinguished; and Henry, having conceived great friendship for him, intended to raise him to the highest ecclesiastical dignities; and, as a pledge of future favours, he conferred on him the deanery of Exeter, the better to support him in his education. Pole was carrying on his studies in the University of Paris at the time when the king solicited the suffrages of that learned body in favour of his divorce; but the demand was not accepted by the English agent, he declined taking any part in the affair. Henry bore this neglect with more temper than was natural to him; and he appeared so unwilling on the subject, to remove that person whose virtues and talents he hoped would prove useful, as well as ornamental, to his court and kingdom. He allowed him still to possess his deanship, and gave him permission to finish his studies at Padua: he even paid him some court, in order to bring him into his measures; and wrote to him while in that university, desiring him to give his opinion freely with regard to the late measures taken in England for abolishing the papal authority. Pole had now contracted an intimate friendship with all persons eminent for dignity or merit in Italy, Sadolet, Bembo, and other revivers of true taste and learning; and he was moved by these connections, as if the reign of Henry the Eighth, on the king's behalf, the members of both Houses were informed in parliament, that on king or kingdom was sole, but where the king had three abilities: '1. To live of his own, and able to be befriended by his subjects. 2. To be a benefactor of the poor and of his benevolence, otherwise they would not wish him to be a benefactor of the poor and of his benevolence, otherwise they would not wish his acts to be declared. 3. To reward well those at all times.' The munificence of Henry VIII. was thus described. Now the point was, that if the parliament would give unto him all the abbots, priors, friaries, monasteries, and other monasteries, that for ever in time to come, he would have all the said acts should not be converted into private uses; but first, that his acts, as for the greater part, to the service of God, and the kingdom strengthened by a continual maintenance of forty thousand well-armed soldiers, the king's act, was not to be continued in the benefit and ease of the subject, whatever afterwards, (as was projected), in any time to come; and every time the king or his commissioners, in any other common affairs, fourthly, lest the honour of the realm should receive any diminution. To these, as well as to the other objections, he answered, that being twenty-nine lords of parliament of the abbots and priors, that held the land of the king per se, and that every time the king or any of his ministers, should not be a Arbitrary power, there would result a number of nobles, which we could not. The said monasteries were given to the Crown, and they were not to be used any further. The same pronoun was therefor made for the said present or any part thereof.'

The rough hand of Henry seemed well adapted for rending asunder those bands by which the ancient superstition had fastened itself on the kingdom; and though, after remerging the Pope’s supremacy, and suppressing monasteries, most of the political ends of reformation were already attained, few of the people expected that he would stop at those innovations. The spirit of superstition, it was thought, would carry him to the utmost extremities against the church of Rome, and lead him to declare war against the whole doctrine and worship, as well as discipline, of that mighty hierarchy. Henry was appealed from to a general council; but now, when a general council was summoned to meet at Mantua, he previously renounced all submiswell as by religious zeal, to forget in some respect the duty which he owed to Henry, his benefactor and his sovereign. He replied, by writing a treatise of the Unity of the Church, in which he inveighed against the king’s supremacy, his divorce, his second marriage; and he even exhorted the emperor to revenge on him the injury done to the imperial family, and to the catholic cause. Henry, though he was not himself a pope, and, therefore, could not be moved by any resentment, dissembled his resentment; and he sent a message to Pole, desiring him to return to England, in order to explain certain passages in his book, which he found somewhat obscure and difficult. Pole was on his guard against this insidious invitation; and was determined to remain in Italy, where he was universally beloved.

The Pope and emperor thought themselves obliged to provide for a man of Pole’s eminence and dignity, who, in support of his cause, had sacrificed all his personal fortune to his own country. He was created a cardinal; and though he took not higher orders than those of a deacon, he was sent legate into Flanders about the year 1536. He had on a former occasion, choosing that employment, been to foment the tumultuous disposition of the English catholics; and he therefore remonstrated in so vigorous a manner with the Queen of Hungary, Regent of the Low Countries, that she dismissed the legate without allowing him to exercise his functions. The enmity which he bore to Pole was now as open as it was violent; and the cardinal on his part kept no further measures in his intrigue against Henry. He is even suspected of having inspired to the crown, by means of a marriage with the Lady Mary; and the king was every day more alarmed by informations which he received of the correspondence maintained in England by that fugitive. Courtney, Marquis of Exeter, had entered into a conspiracy with him; Sir Edward Neville, brother to the Lord Abergavenny; Sir Nicholas Carew, master of horse, and knight of the garter; Henry de la Pole, Lord Montacres; William de la Pole, brother to the cardinal. These persons were indicted, tried, and convicted, before Lord Audley, who presided in the trial as high steward; they were all executed, except Sir Geofrrey de la Pole, who was pensioned; and he owed this grace to his having first carried to the king secret intelligence of the conspiracy. We know little concerning the justice or iniquity of the sentence pronounced against these men. It was, however, that the condemnation of a man who was at that time persecuted by the court, forms no presumption of his guilt; though, as no historian of credit mentions, in the present case, any complaint occasioned by these trials, we may presume that sufficient evidence was produced against the Marquis of Exeter and his associates.1

Some few days before this execution, four Dutch Anabaptists, three men and a woman, had faggots tied to their backs at Paul's Cross, and were burned in that manner. And a man and woman of the same sect and country were burned in Smithfield.

It was the unhappy fate of the English A. D. 1559. during this age, that, when they laboured under any great or short satisfaction of expecting redress from parliament: on the contrary, they had reason to dread each meeting of that assembly, and were then sure of having tyranny converted into law, and aggravated, perhaps, with some circumstance, which the arbitrary privity of ministers had judged to detract, or did not think proper of themselves to carry into execution. This aspect servility never appeared a parliament.

The Bishop of Chichester opened the conference, by saying, that Lambert, being charged with heretical pravity, had appealed from his bishop to the king; as if he expected more favour from this application, and as the king could ever be induced to protect a heretic: that though his majesty had thrown off the usurpation of the see of Rome; had disincorporated some idle monks, who lived like drones in a bee-hive; had abolished the intolerable worship of images; had published the Bible in English, for the instruction of all his subjects; and had made some lesser alterations, which every one must approve of; yet he determined, that the punishment of the violators of this last act of his sacred faith the law should enforce, with the utmost severity all departure from it: and that he had taken the present opportunity, before so learned and grave an audience, of convolting Lambert of his errors; but if he still continued obstinate in them, he must expect the most confounded punishment.

After this preamble, which was not very encouraging, the king asked Lambert, with a stern countenance, what his opinion was of Christ's corporal presence in the sacrament of the altar; and when Lambert began his reply with some compliment to his majesty, he rejected the praise with disdain and indignation. He afterwards pressed the same objection with the utmost vehemence, as if he had never owned, implored, and endured, to be desired to choose a committee from among themselves, who might draw up certain articles of faith, and communicate them afterwards to the parliament. The Lords named the Vica-general, Cranwell, now, as the chamber, the bishops of Canterbury, York, and Ely. The House might have seen what a hopeful task they had undertaken; for this small committee itself was agitated with such diversity of opinion, that it could come to no conclusion. The Duke of Norfolk then moved in the House, that, since there were no hopes of having a report from the committee, the articles of faith, intended to be established, should be reduced to six; and a new committee be appointed, to draw an act with regard to them. As this peer was understood to speak the sense of the king, his motion was immediately complied with; and after a short provocation, the bill of the six Articles, or the bloody bill, as the protestants justly termed it, was introduced, and having passed the two Houses, received the royal assent.

In this law the doctrine of the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was strictly enjoined, and the bishop's certificate for the consecration of ministers, required to be given in writing, in the presence of the king and the bishop of London. The bishops were ordered to see that the clergy recanted their views and belief in the efficacy of the mass, and to receive the oath of supremacy.

Lambert, whose vanity had probably incited him the more to persevere on account of the greatness of this public appearance, was not daunted by the terrors of the punishment to which he was condemned. His executioners took care to make the sufferings of a man who had personally opposed them as the more irritable; he was burned at a slow fire; his legs and thighs were consumed to the stumps; and when there appeared no end of his tortures, some of the guards, more merciful than the rest, lifted him out of his scorching seat; where he was immediately consumed. While they were employed in this friendly office, he cried aloud several times, None but Christ, none but Christ; and these words were in his mouth when he expired.

2 Collen, in his Ecclesiastical History, vol. i. p. 150, has preserved an account of the same execution, in his 'History of New South Wales, the king's ambassador in Germany.' The 'King's Majesty,' says this author, 'never shewed himself in this court except in his own person;' and, in the year 1774, King George III. ordered the text of this execution to be inserted in the university book of the day, and enquired how his majesty was pleased to have it. The king then said, 'I am not sure, but I think, that is the true text.'

It was a wonder to see how presently, with how considerable gravity and solemnity, did take on his well-known authority and imputed name to every one, to every Christian, and supreme head of the Church of England. complain, that the irons and burns, though dismissed their convent, should be uncivilly restrained to the practice of celibacy; but as the protestants were chiefly exposed to the severity of the statute, the numbers of adherents, according to the usual maxims of party, was regarded by the adherents to the anciant religion as their own prosperity and triumph. Cranmer had the courage to oppose this new power; and though he desired lief to absent himself, he could not be prevailed on to give this proof of compliance. 1 Henry was accustomed to Cranmer's freedom and sincerity; and being convinced of the moral and religious nature of his sentiments, gave him an unusual indulgence in this particular, and never allowed even a whisper against him. That prelate, however, was now obliged, in obedience to the statute, to dismiss his wife, the niece of Osiaeder, a famous divine of Nuremberg; and Henry, satisfied with this proof of submission, showed him his former countenance and favour. Latimer and Shaxton threw up theirs bishoppical, on account of the law, and were committed to prison.

Proclamations made equal to laws.

The parliament, having thus resigned all their religious liberties, proceeded to an entire surrender of their civil; and, without scruple or deliberation, they made by one act a total subversion of the English constitution. They gave to the king's proclamation the same force as to a statute enacted by parliament; and to render the matter worse, if possible, they framed this law as if it were only declaratory, and were only to explain, the nature and extent of royal authority. The preamble contains, that the king had formerly set forth several proclamations, which flawsd persons had wilfully contemned, not considering what a king by his royal prerogative may do; that this knowledge might urge offenders not only to disobey the laws of Almighty God, but also to disfigure the king's most royal majesty, who may full ill bear it; that sudden emergencies often occur, which require speedy resolution, and cannot await the slow assembling and deliberations of parliament; and that though the king was empowered by his authority derived from God, to consult the public good on these occasions, yet the opposition of refractory subjects might push him to extremity and violence; for these reasons the parliament, that they might remove all occasion of doubt, ascertained by a statute this prerogative of the crown, and enabled His Majesty, with the advice of his council, to set forth proclamations enjoining obedience under whatever pains and penalties he should think proper: and these proclamations were to have the force of perpetual laws.

What proves either a stupid or a wilful blindness in the English parliament, even after this statute, to maintain some limitations in the government; and they enacted, that no proclamation should deprive any person of his lawful possessions, liberties, inheritances, privileges, and franchises; nor yet inflict any common law or laudablecustom of the realm. They did not consider, that no penalty could be inflicted upon the disobeying of proclamations, without invading some liberty or property of the subject; and that the power of enacting new laws, joined to the dispensing power then exercised by the crown, amounted to a full legislative authority. It is true, the kings of England had always been accustomed, from their own authority, to issue proclamations, and to exact obedience to them; and this prerogative was, no doubt, a strong symptom of absolute government; but still there was a difference between a power which was exercised on a particular emergency, and which must be justified by the present expediency or necessity; and an authority conferred by a positive statute, which could no longer admit of control or limitation. Could any act be more opposite to the spirit of liberty that should be the conduct of the same parliament. They passed an act of attainer, not only against the Marquis of Exeter, the Lords Montacute, Darcy, Hinsey, and others, who had been legally tried and condemned; but also against some persons of the highest quality, who had never been accused, or examined, or convicted. The violent hatred which Henry bore to Cardinal Pole, had extended itself to all his friends and relations; and the number of adherents of Salisbury, had on that account become extremely obnoxious to him. She was also accused of having employed her authority with her tenants, to hinder them from reading the statute of attainder; and though she desired liberty to absent herself, she could not be prevailed on to give this proof of compliance. 1 Henry was accustomed to Cranmer's freedom and sincerity; and being convinced of the moral and religious nature of his sentiments, gave him an unusual indulgence in this particular, and never allowed even a whisper against him. To this session the rank of all the great officers of state was fixed: Cromwell, as viceroy, had the precedence assigned him above all of them. It was thought singular, that he should have the place next the royal family; and that a man possessed of no manner of literature should be set at the head of the church.

As soon as the act of the Six Articles had passed, the Catholics were extremely vigilant in informing against offenders; and no less than five hundred persons were in a little time thrown into prison. But Cromwell, who had not had interest to prevent that act, was able, for the present, however, to manage it. Secured by the advice of Suffolk, and Chancellor Audley, as well as by Cranmer, he demonstrated against the cruelty of punishing so many delinquents; and he obtained permission to set them at liberty. The uncertainty of the king's humour gave each party an opportunity of triumphing in its turn. No sooner had Henry passed this law, which seemed to inflict so deep a wound on the reformers, than he granted a general permission for every one to have the new translation of the Bible in his family: a concession regarded by that party as an important victory.

Henry's projects. But as Henry was observed to be much of a reformer, that he might please his conscience, he renewed his kindliness to them, the final prevalence of either party seemed much to depend on the choice of the future queen. Immediately after the death of Jane Seymour, the most beloved of the king's wives, he had thought of a new marriage. He first cast his eye towards the Duchess-dowager of Milan, niece to the emperor; and he made proposals for that alliance. But meeting with difficulties, he was carried by his friendship for Francis rather to think of a French princess. He demanded the marriage of Madeleine, daughter of Longueville, daughter of the Duke of Guise, a prince of the house of Lorraine; but Francis told him, that the lady was already betrothed to the King of Scotland. The king, however, continued to feel some heart extremely on the match: the information which he had received of the duchess's accomplishments and beauty, had possessed him in her favour; and having privately seen her, he determined Meautys to examine her person, and get certain intelligence of her conduct, the accounts which that agent brought him, served further to inflame his desires. He learned that she was big made; and he thought her on that account the more proper for him, who was now become somewhat corpulent. The pleasure, too, of mortifying his nephew, whom he did not love, was a further incitement to his prosecuting of this match; and he insisted that Francis should give him the preference to the King of Scots. But Francis, who was secure enough of the marriage in England, was of much greater importance to his interests, would not affront his friend and ally; and to prevent further solicitation, he immediately sent that princess to Scotland. Not to shock, however, Henry's humour, Francis made him an offer of Mary of Bourbon, daughter of the Duke of Vendome; but as the king was informed that James had formerly rejected this princess, he would not hear any further of such a proposal. The French monarch then offered him the choice of the two younger sisters of the Queen of Scots; and he assured him that they were nowise inferior in merit or size to their elder sister, and that of those he saw superior in beauty. The king was as scrupulous with regard to the person of his wives, as if his heart had been really susceptible of a delicate passion: and he was unwilling to trust any relations, or persons that his mistress even superior in beauty. He was proposed to Francis, that they should have a conference at Calais on pretence of business; and that this monarch should bring along with him the two Princesses of Guise, together with the finest ladies of quality in France, that he might have some choice among them. But the gallant spirit of Francis was shocked with the proposal: he was impressed with too much regard, he said, for the fair sex, to carry ladies of the first quality like geldings to a market, there to be chosen or rejected by the aversion to her, to complete the marriage; and he told Cromwell, that since matters had gone so far, he must put his neck into the yoke. Cromwell, who knew how much his own interests were concerned in this affair, was very anxious to learn from the king next morning after the marriage, whether he now liked his spouse any better. The king told him that he hated her worse than ever; and that her person was more disgusting on a near approach; he was resolved never to meddle with her again, thought he was in the true manner of a point, about which he entertained an extreme delicacy.

He continued, however, to be civil to Anne; he even seemed to repose his usual confidence in Cromwell; but though he exerted himself to be prevailed on himself, a discontent lay lurking in his breast, and was ready to burst out on the first opportunity.

A session of parliament was held; and a parliamentary act, none of the abbots were now allowed a place to the House of Peers. The king, by the mouth of the chancellor, complained to the parliament of the great diversity of religions which still prevailed among his subjects: a grievance, he affirmed, which ought the less to be endured, because the Scriptures were now published in English, and ought universally to be the standard of belief to all mankind. But he had appointed, he said, some bishops and divines to draw up a list of tenets, to which the people might be instructed; and he also added, that the Chrisian doctrine, the Christ, the doctrine of Christ, and the truth, should have the victory. The king seems to have expected more effect in ascertainning truth, from this new book of his doctors, than he ever obtained; and the publication of the Scriptures in Cromwell, as vicar-general, made also, in the king's name, a speech to the upper House; and the peers, in return, bestowed great flattery on him, and in particular said, that he was worthy, by his desert, to be vicar-general of the universe. That minister seemed to be no less in his master's good graces: he received, soon after the sitting of the parliament, the title of Earl of Essex, and was installed knighthood.

There remained only one religious order in England; the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem, or the Knights of Malta, as they are commonly called. This order, partly ecclesiastical, partly military, had, by their valor, done great service to Christendom; and had very much retarded at Jerusalem, Rhodes, and Malta, the rapid progress of the barbary. During the general surrender of the religious houses in England, they had exerted their spirit, and had obstinately refused to yield up their revenues to the king; and Henry, who would endure no society that professed obedience to the Pope, was obliged to have recourse to parliament for the dissolution of this order. The negotiations, and former modulation of that order, were contemptible to all the acquisitions which the king had already made. But he had very ill husbanded the great revenue acquired by the plunder of the church: his profuse generosity dissipated faster than his capacity could supply; and the parliament was surprised this session to find a demand made upon them of four, four-tenths, and a subsidy of one shilling in the pound during two years: so all the public expectations answered, that the crown never more to require any supply from the people. The Commons, though lavish of their liberty, and of the blood of their fellow-subjects, were extremely frugal of their money; and it was not without difficulty so small a grant could be obtained by this absolute and dreaded monarch. The cavation gave the king four shillings in the pound, to be levied in two years. The pretext for these grants was the great expense which Henry had undergone in the building of the royal forts along the sea-coast, and in equipping a navy. As he had at present no ally on the continent in whom he reposed much confidence, he reeled only on his domestic strength, and was no longer, on account, obliged to be more expensive in his preparations against the danger of an invasion.

The king's favour to Cromwell, and his acquaintance in the marriage with Anne of Cleves, were both of them deceitful appearances; his aversion to the queen secretly increased every day; and having at last broken all restraint, it prompted him at once to seek the dissolution of a marriage so odious to him, and to involve his minister to ruin, who had been the innocent author of it. Fall of Cromwell.

The fall of Cromwell was hastened by other well supported suspicions. Cromwell was being much lower extraction, had not only mounted above them by his staitio of vicar-general, but had engrossed many of the other considerable offices of the crown: besides enjoying that commission which gave him a high and almost absolute authority over all the chancery, he was privy seal, chamberlain, and master of the wards: he had also obtained the order of the garter, a dignity which had ever been conferred only on men of illustrious families, and which seemed to be profaned by being conferred on a man so odious to the commons. The people were averse to him, as the supposed author of the violence on the monasteries: establishments which were still revered and beloved by the commons.

The commons regarded him as the concealed enemy of their religion: the protestants, observing his exterior concurrence with all the persecutions exercised against them, were inclined to bear him as little favour; and reproached him with the timidity, if not treachery, of his conduct. And the king, who found that great clamours had, on all hands, arisen against the administration, was not displeased to throw on Cromwell the load of public hatred; and he hoped, by making so easy a sacrifice, he might be the adored of his people.

But there was another cause which suddenly set all these motives in action, and brought about an unexpected revolution in the ministry. The king had fixed his affections on Catherine of Cleves, the Duchess of Norfolk, and being determined to gratify this new passion, he could find no expedient, but by procuring a divorce from his present consort, to raise Catherine to his bed and throne. The duke, who had long been engaged in amity with Cromwell, made the same use of her assinations to ruin this minister, that he had formerly done of Anne Boleyn's against Wolsey: and when all engines were prepared, he obtained a commissary from the king to appear at the council table, on an accusation of high treason, and to commit him to the Tower. Immediately after, a bill of attainder was framed against him; and the House of Peers thought proper, without trial, examination, or evidence, to condemn to death a man, whom a few days before, they had declared worthy to be vicar-general of the universe. The House of Commons passed the bill, though out without some opposition. Cromwell was accused of hersy and treason, and to be burned; but the proposers of the bill, he was very, very improbable. The only circumstance of his conduct by which he seems to have merited this fate, was his being the instrument of the reformations, and the destruction of the monasteries. Written at the Tower with the heavy heart and trembling hand of his highness' most miserable prisoner, and poor slave, Thomas Cromwell. And a little below, without date, the name of Most Lamentable: Thomas Cromwell, of the university in conducting into ignominious halls in the preceding session, against the County of Salisbury and others.

Cromwell endeavoured to soften the king by the most humble supplications; but all too late, he had put the practice of that prince to ruin his ministers and favourites by halves; and though the unhappy prisoner once wrote to him in so moving a strain as even to draw tears from his eyes, he hardened himself against all movements of pity, and refused his pardon. The conclusion of Cromwell's letter ran in these words: "I, a most woful prisoner, am ready to submit to death when it shall please God and your majesty; and yet the flesh feels it too severe to be called mercy and pardon of mine offences. Written at the Tower with the heavy heart and trembling hand of your highness' most miserable prisoner, and poor slave, Thomas Cromwell. And a little below, without date, the name of Most Lamentable: Thomas Cromwell, of the university in conducting into ignominious halls in the preceding session, against the County of Salisbury and others. When brought to the place of execution, he professed all earnest protestations of his innocence, and all complaints against the sentence pronounced upon him. He knew that Henry had expressed a determination of his opponents to his will, and that his death alone would not terminate that monarch's vengeance. He was a man of prudence, industry, and abilities; worthy of a better master and of a better fate. Though raised to the summit of power from a low origin, he betrayed no ience or contempt towards his inferiors; and was careful to remember all the obligations which, during his more humble fortune, he had owed to any one. He had served as a private sentinel in the Italian wars; when he received some good offices from a Lucchese merchant, who had conducted him to Siena, he was not surprised, as well as the senate, by which he had rendered him. Cromwell, in his grandeur, happened, at London, to cast his eye on his benefactor, now reduced to poverty by misfortunes. He immediately sent for him, reminded him of their ancient friendship, and by his grateful assistance reinstated him in his former prosperity and opulence.7

The measures for divorcing Henry from Anne of Cleves, were taken time with the bill of attainder against Cromwell. The House of Peers, in conjunction with the Commons, applied to the king by petition, desiring that he would allow his marriage to be examined; and orders were immediately given to lay the matter before the convocation. Anne had formerly been contracted by her father to the Duke of Lorraine; but she, as well as the duke, were at that time under age, and the contract had been afterwards publicly consented to by both parties. The king, however, pleaded this precontract as a ground of divorce; and he added two reasons more, which may seem a little extraordinary; that when he espoused Anne he had not supposed her to have been a child, and that he had not thought proper to consummate the marriage. The conversation was satisfied with these reasons, and solemnly annulled the marriage between the king and queen; the presentation of the bill was proceeded with; 8 and the sentence was soon after notified to the princess.

Anne was blest with a happy insensibility of temper, even in the points which the most nearly affect her sex; and the king's aversion towards her, as well as his prosecution of her, were rather as a piece of passion. She willingly hearkened to terms of accommodation with him; and when he offered to adopt her as his sister, to give her place next the queen and his own daughter, and to make a settlement of three thousand pounds a year upon her; she accepted of the conditions, and gave her consent to the divorce.5 She even wrote to her brother, (for her father was now dead,) that she had been very well used in England, and desired him to live on good terms with the king. The only instance of pride which she betrayed was, that she refused to return to her own country after the affair which she had received; and she said, "It is not good, my lord, to treat friends falsely."

Notwithstanding Anne's moderation, this incident produced a great coldness between the king and the German princes; but as the situation of Europe was now much altered, Henry was the more indifferent about their resentment. He disdained to make a scene, and, with Francis, and Charles he had subsisted during a very short time: the dissimilarity of their characters soon renewed, with greater violence than ever, their former jealousy and hatred. While Charles remained at Paris, Francis had been imprudently engaged, by his open temper, and by that satisfaction which a noble mind naturally feels in performing generous actions, to make in confidence some dangerous discoveries to that interested monarch; and having now lost all suspicion of his rival, he hoped that the emperor and he, supporting each other, might neglect every other alliance. He not only communicated to his king the state of affairs with other rival princes of Solyman and the Venetians; he also laid open the solicitations which he had received from the court of England, to enter into a confederacy against him. Charles had no sooner reached his own dominions, than he showed himself unworthy of the friendly reception which he had met with. He absolutely refused to fulfill his promise, and put the Duke of Orleans in possession of the Milanese: he informed Solyman and the senate of Venice of the treatment which his subjects had received from their ally; and he took care that Henry should not be ignorant how readily Francis had abandoned his ancient friend, to whom he owed such important obligations, and had sacrificed him to a new confederate. He even poisoned and misrepresented many things, which the unsuspecting heart of the French monarch had disclosed to him. Had Henry possessed true judgment and generosity, this incident alone had been sufficient to guide him in the choice of his ally. But his domineering pride carried him immediately to renounce the friendship of Francis, whom he had so unexpectedly given the preference to the emperor; and as Charles invited him to a renewal of ancient amity, he willingly accepted of the offer; and thinking himself secure in this alliance, he neglected the friendship both of France and of the German princes.

The new turn which Henry had taken with regard to foreign affairs was extremely agreeable to his catholic subjects; and as it had perhaps contributed, among other reasons, to the ruin of Cromwell, it made them entertain hopes of a final prevalence over their antagonists. The marriage of the king with Catherine Howard, which followed soon after his divorce from Anne of Cleves, was also regarded as a favorable incident to their party; and the subsequent events corresponded to their expectations. The king's councils being now directed by Norfolk, and Gardiner, a furor against the old and new protestants; and the law of the Six Articles was executed with rigour. Dr. Barnes, who had been the cause of Lambert's execution, felt in the turn the severity of the punis ment which he had incurred. He, who before dared not say he was, without trial, condemned to the flames, together with Jerome and Gerard. He discussed theological questions even at the stake; and as the dispute between him and the sheriff turned upon the invocations of saints, he said, that he could not renounce them, and if the sheriff could pray for us; but if they could, he hoped, in half an hour, to be praying for the sheriff and all the spectators. He next entrusted the sheriff to carry to the king his dying request, which he fondly imagined would have authority with that monarch who had sent him to the stake. The purport of his request was, that Henry besides repressing superstitious ceremonies, should be extremely vigilant in preventing fornication and clandestine marriages.

While Henry was exciting his violence against the protestants, he spared not the catholics who denied his supremacy; and a foreigner at that time in England had the audacity to say, that those who were burned, and those who were for him were hanged.5 The king even displayed in an ostentatious manner this tyrannical impartiality, which reduced both parties to submission, and-infused terror into every breast. Barnes, Gerard, and Jerome, his unfortunate victims died within three years; and along with them there was placed on each hurdle a catholic, who was also executed for his religion. These catholics were Abel, Petherstone, and Powell, who declared that the most grousous part of their punishment was the being coupled to such heretical mucrants as suffered with them.5

Though the spirit of the English seemed to be totally sunk under the despotism of Henry, there appeared some symptoms of discontent: an insubordinate rebellion broke out in Yorkshire, headed by Sir John Nevil; but was soon suppressed, and Nevil, after being tortured, was threatened with the confiscation of all he possessed. It was supposed to have been instigated by the intrigues of Cardinal Pole; and the king was instantaneously determined to make the Countess of Salisbury, who already lay under sentence of death, suffer for her son's offences. He ordered her to be carried to execution, and this venerable matron maintained still, in these distressful circumstances, the spirit of that long race of monarchs from whom she was descended.6 She refused to lay her head on the block, or to accept the executioner's signal that his character never to look farther than the present object, without regarding the inconsistency of his conduct. The parliament made it a point of honour to destroy the reputation of Henry's marriage; and it was transmitted in the history of Princm, and had been made of both in the case of Anne Boleyn and Catherine Howard. It had been the同类 in the case of Anne Boleyn, and was a sign of restoring the Princess Elizabeth to her right of legitimacy, and it... where she had received no trial. She told the executioner, that if he would have her head, he must win it the best way he could; and thus, shaking her venerable gray locks, she ran out the scaffold; and the executioner, to save himself the attorney's fees, procured the heads of many traitors and robbers by hanging or strangu-lation at her neck before he was able to give the fatal stroke. Thus perished the last of the line of Plantagenet, which, with great glory, but still greater crimes and mis-fortunes, had governed the English for the space of three hundred years. Lord Leonard Grey, a man who had formerly rendered service to the crown, was also beheaded for treason, soon after the Countess of Salisbury. We know not what crimes they had committed, nor the grounds of their persecution.

The insurrection in the North engaged Henry to make a progress thither, in order to quiet the minds of his people, to reconcile them to his government, and to abolish the ancient superstitions, to which these parts were much addicted. He had also another motive for this journey: he purposed to have a conference at York with his nephew the King of Scotland, and, if possible, to cement a close and indissoluble union with that kingdom.

The same spirit of religious innovation, which had seized other parts of Europe, had made its way into Scotland, and had begun, before this period, to excite the same jealousy, fears, and persecutio ns. Among the AES of 1642, in a young man of a noble family, having been created abbot of Ferne, was sent abroad for his education; but had fallen into company with some reformers, and he returned into his own country very ill disposed towards church affairs, which his birth and his merit entitled him to attain the highest dignities. The fervour of youth, and his zeal for novelty, made it impossible for him to conceal his sentiments; and Campbell, prior of the Dominicans, who, under colour of friendship and a sympathy in opinion, had insinuated himself into his confidence, accused him before Benton, Archbishop of St. Andrews. Hamilton was sent to St. Andrews, in order to meet some of the clergy, a dispute concerning the controverted points: and after much reasoning with regard to justification, free will, original sin, and other topics of that nature, the conference ended with their condemning Hamilton to be burned for his errors. The young man, who had been dear to the insinuations of ambition, was less likely to be shaken with the fears of death; while he proposed to himself both the glory of bearing testimony to the truth, and the immediate reward attending his martyrdom. The people, who compassed his youth, his virtue, and his noble birth, were much moved at the constancy of his end; and an accident which soon followed, confirmed them in their favourable sentiments towards him. He had cited Campbell, who still insulted him at the stake, to answer before the judgment-seat of Christ; and as that persecutor, either astonished with the manner in which he overcame his enemies, or, perhaps, not seized casually with a distemper, soon after lost his senses, and fell into a fever, of which he died; the people regarded Hamilton as a prophet as well as a martyr.

Among the disciples converted by Hamilton, was one Nair Forrest, who became a zealous preacher; and who, though he did not openly discover his sentiments, was suspected in lean towards the new opinions. His diocese, the Bishop of Dunkeld, enjoined him, when he met with a good epistle or good gospel, which favoured the liberties of holy church, to preach on it, and let the rest alone. Forrest replied, that he had read both Old and New Testament events and had not found an ill epistle or ill gospel in any part of them. The extreme attachment of the Scriptures was regarded in those days as a sure characteristic of heresy; and Forrest was soon after brought to trial, and condemned to the flames. While the priests were deliberating on the manner of his execution, a bystander advised them to burn him in a cellar; for that the smoke of Mr. Patrie Hamilton had infected all those on whom it had blazed.

culties, not only in Scotland, but all over Europe. As the reformers aimed at a total subversion of ancient establishments, which they represented as idolatrous, impious, and detestable; the priests, who found both their honours and property involved, thought they had a right to resist, by every expedient, these dangerous invaders, and that the same simple principles of equity which justified a man in killing a pest or a robber, would acquit them of all violence. Evidently, and pressing home the point, it is never acceptable to ecclesiastics, taught, they said, to be admitted in other cases; but seemed an absurdity where fundamentals were shaken, and where the possession of their tenements, which had been brought in danger. But though the church was thus carried by policy, as well as inclination, to kindle the fires of persecution, they found the success of this remedy very uncertain. The superhuman zeal of the reformers, inflamed by punishment, was apt to prove contagious on the compassionate minds of the spectators. The new doctrine, amidst all the dangers to which it was exposed, secretly spread itself everywhere; and the minds of men were gradually disposed to a revolution in religion.

But the most dangerous symptom for the clergy in Scotland was, that the nobility, from the example of England, would wish to see eyes to the church revenues, and hoped, if a reformation took place, to enrich themselves by the plunder of the ecclesiastics. James himself, who was very poor, and was somewhat inclined to magnificence, entertained a great dread of the scheme, by like motives; and began to threaten the clergy with the same fate that had attended them in the neighbouring country. Henry also never ceased exhorting his nephew to unite with his people, and being assured, both by the pride of making proselytes, and the prospect of security, should Scotland embrace a close union with him, he solicited the King of Scots to meet him at York; and he obtained a ready compliance.

The ecclesiastics were alarmed at this resolution of James, and they employed every expedient in order to prevent the execution of it. They represented the danger of innovation; the pernicious consequences of aggrandiz-ing the nobility, already too powerful; the hazard of putting himself into the hands of the English, his hereditary enemies; the dependence on them which must ensue upon his loss the friendship of France, and of all foreign powers. To these considerations, they added the prospect of immediate interest, by which they found the king to be much governed: they offered him a present grant of fifty thousand pounds: they promised him that the Irish church would be overruled by the power, and that the revenues of the clergy, and the wealth of the bishoprics, would enrich him; and they pointed out to him the confiscation of heretics, as the means of filling his exchequer, and of adding a hundred thousand pounds a year to the crown revenues. The innovations of his new example, to whom youth, beauty, and address had given a powerful influence over him, seconded all these reasons; and James was at last engaged, first to delay his journey, then to send excuses to the King of England, who had already come to York, in order to be present at the interview.

Henry, vexed with the disappointment, and enraged at the affront, vowed vengeance against his nephew; and he began, by permitting piracies at sea and incursions on land, to put his threats in execution. But he received soon after, in his own family, an affront to which he was much more sensible, and which touched him in a point where he always showed an extreme delicacy. He thought himself very happy in his new marriage: the agreeable person and disposition of Catherine had entirely captivated his affections; and he made no secret of his devoted attachment to her. He had even publicly, in his chapel, returned his incomes, to whom the beauty, youth, and address had given a powerful influence over him, seconded all these reasons; and James was at last engaged, first to delay his journey, then to send excuses to the King of England, who had already come to York, in order to be present at the interview.

Among the disciples converted by Hamilton, was one Nair Forrest, who became a zealous preacher; and who, though he did not openly discover his sentiments, was suspected in lean towards the new opinions. His diocese, the Bishop of Dunkeld, enjoined him, when he met with a good epistle or good gospel, which favoured the liberties of holy church, to preach on it, and let the rest alone. The extreme attachment of the Scriptures was regarded in those days as a sure characteristic of heresy; and Forrest was soon after brought to trial, and condemned to the flames. While the priests were deliberating on the manner of his execution, a bystander advised them to burn him in a cellar; for that the smoke of Mr. Patrie Hamilton had infected all those on whom it had blazed.

The clergy were at that time reduced to great difficulties, not only in Scotland, but all over Europe. As the reformers aimed at a total subversion of ancient establishments, which they represented as idolatrous, impious, and detestable; the priests, who found both their honours and property involved, thought they had a right to resist, by every expedient, these dangerous invaders, and that the same simple principles of equity which justified a man in killing a pest or a robber, would acquit them of all violence. Evidently, and pressing home the point, it is never acceptable to ecclesiastics, taught, they said, to be admitted in other cases; but seemed an absurdity where fundamentals were shaken, and where the possession of their tenements, which had been brought in danger. But though the church was thus carried by policy, as well as inclination, to kindle the fires of persecution, they found the success of this remedy very uncertain. The superhuman zeal of the reformers, inflamed by punishment, was apt to prove contagious on the compassionate minds of the spectators. The new doctrine, amidst all the dangers to which it was exposed, secretly spread itself everywhere; and the minds of men were gradually disposed to a revolution in religion.

But the most dangerous symptom for the clergy in Scotland was, that the nobility, from the example of England, would wish to see eyes to the church revenues, and hoped, if a reformation took place, to enrich themselves by the plunder of the ecclesiastics. James himself, who was very poor, and was somewhat inclined to magnificence, entertained a great dread of the scheme, by like motives; and began to threaten the clergy with the same fate that had attended them in the neighbouring country. Henry also never ceased exhorting his nephew to unite with his people, and being assured, both by the pride of making proselytes, and the prospect of security, should Scotland embrace a close union with him, he solicited the King of Scots to meet him at York; and he obtained a ready compliance.

The ecclesiastics were alarmed at this resolution of James, and they employed every expedient in order to prevent the execution of it. They represented the danger of innovation; the pernicious consequences of aggrandiz-one Lascelles brought intelligence of her dissolute life to Cranmer; and told him, that his sister, formerly a servant in the family of the old Duchess of Norfolk, with whom Catherine was educated, had given him a particular account of her licentiousness. Derham and Mannoc, both of them servants to the duchess, had been admitted to her bed; and she had even taken little care to conceal her shame from the other servants of the family. The perjury and betrayal of her secrets had rendered both her life and character dangerous to conceal or to discover, communicated the matter to the Earl of Hertford, and to the chancellor.

They agreed that the matter should by no means be buried in silence; and the archbishop himself seemed the more ready to believe and give public credit to the information he had given; and still appealed to his sister's testimony. That nobleman next made a journey under pretence of hunting, and went to Sussex, where the woman was at the present time. He questioned her in her former intelligence, and particular as to the facts; and the whole bore too much the face of probability. Mannoc and Derham, who were arrested at the same time, and examined by the chancellor, made the queen's guilt entirely certain by their confession; and discovered other particulars, which redounded still more to her dishonour.

Three maids of the family were admitted into her secrets, and some of them had even passed the night in bed with John Lascelles; and still more so after that he had been convicted of her guilt; for that man was so deeply affected, that he remained a long time speechless, and at last burst into tears. He found to his surprise, that his great skill in distinguishing a true maid, of which he boasted in the case of Anne of Cleves, had failed him in that of his present consort. The queen, being next questioned, denied her guilt; but when informed that a full discovery was made, she confessed that she had been criminal before marriage; and only insisted that she had never been false to the king's bed. But as there was evidence that one Colepeper was connected with the night with alien marriage; and as it appeared that she had taken Derham, her old paramour, into her bed in a whisper, in the little chamber, and as a kind of a seclusion; and the king, besides, was not of a humour to make any difference between these degrees of guilt.

H. D. 15.2. Henry found that he could not by any means so fully or expeditiously satiate his vengeance on all these criminals, as by assembling a parliament, the usual instrument of his tyranny. The two Houses, having received the queen's confession, made an address to the king. They enjoined her to be dealt with this untoward accident, to which all men were subject; but to consider the frailty of human nature, and the mutability of human affairs; and from these views to deduce a submission and resign all he had passed a bill of attainder against the queen and her accomplices; and they begged him to give his assent to this bill, not in person, which would renew his vexation, and might easily be ordered to by the legislature, who promised for that purpose. And as there was a law in force, making it treason to speak ill of the queen, as well as of the king, they craved his royal pardon if any of them should, on the present occasion, have transgressed any part of the statute.

Having obtained a gracious answer to these requests, the parliament proceeded to vote a bill of attainder for treason against the queen, and the Viscountess of Rocheford, who had conducted her secret amours; and in this bill Colepeper and Derham were also comprehended. At the same time they passed a bill of attainder for misprision of treason against the old Duchess of Norfolk, Catherine's grandmother; her uncle Lord William Howard, and his lady, together with the Countess of Bridgewater, and nine persons more; because they knew the queen's vicious course, and left her bed before her majesty had ceased it. This was an effect of Henry's usual extravaganza, to expect that parents should so far forget the ties of natural affection, and the sentiments of shame and decency, as to reveal to him the most secret disorders of their family. He subjected, moreover, to a sort of public censure for the cruelty of this proceeding: for he pardoned the Duchess of Norfolk, and most of the others condemned for misprision of treason.

However, to secure himself for the future, as well as his successors, from this fatal accident, he engaged the parliament to pass a law somewhat extraordinary. It was enacted, That any one who knew, or shrewdly suspected, any guilt in the queen, might, within twenty days, disclose it to the king or council, without incurring the penalty of any former law against defaming the queen; but prohibiting every one, at the same time, from spreading the matter abroad without the necessary assistance. This was also enacted, That if the king married any woman who had been Incontinent, taking her for a true maid, she should be guilty of treason if she did not previously reveal her guilt to the king; and that the imprisonment of the queen, under a singular clause, and said, that the king must henceforth took out for a widow; for no reputed maid would ever be persuaded to incur the penalty of the statute. After all these laws were passed, the queen was beheld on Tower-hill, together with Lord Rocheford. They behaved in a manner suitable to their dissolute life: and as Lady Rocheford was known to be the chief instrument in bringing Anne Boleyn to her end, she died unpitied; and men were more confirmed, by the discovery of this woman's guilt, in the favourable sentiments which they had entertained of that unfortunate queen.

The king made no demand of any subsidy from this parliament; but he found means of enriching his exchequer from another quarter; he took further steps towards the dissolution of colleges, hospitals, and other foundations of that nature. The courtiers had been practising on the presidents and governors to make a surrender of their revenues to the king; and they had been successful with eight of them. But there was an obstacle to their further progress: it had been provided, by the local statutes of most of these foundations, that no surrender, or for any number of years, could be made in a deed, without the unanimous vote of all the fellows; and this vote was not easily obtained. All such statutes were annulled by parliament; and the revenues of these houses were now exposed to the caprice of the king and his favourites. The church had been so long their prey, that nobody was surprised at any new invades made upon her. From the regular, Henry now proceeded to make devastations on the secular clergy. He exorted many of the bishops a surrender of chapter lands; and by this device he pillaged the sees of Canterbury, York, and London, and enriched his greedy parasites and flatterers with their spoils.

The clergy have been commonly so ecclesiastical in their fortunate and religious interests, and in their zeal for their temporal interests, that they have been constantly in a state of war. But Henry, so desirous of the union of church and state, and so jealous of the rule of the papacy, rendered them the instruments of his sway, and the conveniences of his superstition. They were required to be the custodians of the faith; to suppress faction, and to extirpate heresy; and to be the revengers of the crown, and the executors of the laws, as well as the ministers of the temporal state. They were required to be the custodians of the faith; to suppress faction, and to extirpate heresy; and to be the revengers of the crown, and the executors of the laws, as well as the ministers of the temporal state.
a forfeiture of goods, chattels, and lands, during life; he was still equally bent on maintaining a rigid purity in speculative principles. He had appointed a commission, consisting of the two archbishops, and several bishops of both provinces, together with a considerable number of doctors of divinity; and by virtue of his ecclesiastical supremacy, he had given them in charge to choose a religious successor. Before the commissioners had made any progress in this arduous undertaking, the parliament, in 1541, had passed a law, by which they ratified all the tenets which these divines should thereafter establish with the king's consent; and they were now expressly declared that they took their religion upon trust, and had no other rule, in spiritual as well as temporal concerns, than the arbitrary will of their master. There is only one clause of the statute which may seem at first sight to savour somewhat of the spirit of liberty: it was enacted, That the ecclesiastical commissioners should establish nothing repugnant to the laws and statutes of the realm. But in reality this proviso was inserted by the king, to serve his own purposes. By introducing a confusion and contradiction into the laws, he became more master of every one's life and property. And as the ancient independence of the church still gave him jealousy, he was well pleased, under cover of such a clause, to introduce appeals from the spiritual to the civil courts. It was for a like reason that he would never promulgate a body of canon law; and be encouraged the judges on all occasions whenever the ecclesiastical causes, wherever they thought the law of royal prerogative concerned.
A happy innovation; though at first invented for arbitrary purposes.

The king, armed by the authority of parliament, or rather by their acknowledgment of that spiritual supremacy which he believed inherent in him, employed his commissioners to select a system of tenets for the assent and belief of the realm. At this volume was published, called the Institution of a Christian Man, which was received by the convocation, and voted to be the standard of orthodoxy. All the delicate points of justification, faith, free-will, good works, and grace, are there defined with a leaning towards the opinion of the reformers: the sacraments, which a few years before were only allowed to be three, were now increased to the number of seven, conformably to the sentiments of the catholics.
The king's caprice is discernible throughout the whole;
and the book is in reality to be regarded as his composition. For Henry, while he made his opinion a rule for the nation, would tie his own bands by no canon or authority, but only prescribed even by any which he himself had formerly established.

The people had occasion, soon after, to see a further instance of the king's inconstancy. He was not long satisfied with the publication of a Christian Man; he ordered a new book to be composed, called the Evolution of a Christian Man; and without asking the assent of the convocation, he published by his own authority, and that of the parliament, this new model of orthodoxy. It differs from the Institution; but the king was no less positive in his new creed than he had been in the old; and he required the belief of the nation to swear at his signal.
In both these compositions he was particularly careful to inculcate the doctrine of passive obedience; and he was as equally careful to retain the nation in the practice.

While the king was spreading his own books among the people, he seems to have been extremely perplexed, as well as alarmed, at the course which was taken with the Scriptures. A review had been made by the synod, of the new translation of the Bible; and Gardiner had proposed, that instead of employing English expressions throughout, several of the most frequent, should still be permitted; because it was feared, that if they were removed, as he pretended, such peculiar energy and significance, that they had no correspondent terms in the vulgate tongue. Among these were, ecclesia, penitentia, poenit, contrita, holocencium, sacramentum, elemonia, mystica, precept, sacrificium, sanctitas, uti.subplots

facies, pecatum, gratia, hostia, charitus, &c. But as this mixture would have appeared extremely barbarous, and was plainly calculated for no other purpose than to retain the people in their ancient ignorance, the proposal was rejected. The knowledge of the people, however, at least their disputative turn, seemed to be an inconvenience still more dangerous; and the king and parliament, soon after the publication of the Scriptures, instructed the commission which they had formerly made; and prohibited all but gentlemen and merchants from perusing them. Even that liberty was not granted without an apparent hesitation, and a strong fear of being suspected of the conception that the public prints communicated secret or unlawful ideas. The publication was allowed to read, so to do quietly and with good order.
And the preamble to the act sets forth, That many seditious and ignorant persons had abused the liberty granted them of reading the Bible, and that great diversity of opinion, animosities, tumults, and schisms, had been occasioned by pervverting the sense of the Scriptures. It seemed very difficult to reconcile the king's model for uniformity with the permission of free inquiry.

The mass-book also passed under the king's revival; and little alteration was as yet made in it: some doubtful or fictitious saints only were struck out; and the name of the Pope was erased. This latter precaution was likewise used with regard to the other books of the church; and even an old book that was sold. The word Pope was carefully omitted or blotched out; as if that precaution could abolish the term from the language, or as if such a persecution of the Papacy would somehow imprint it more strongly in the memory of the people.

The king took care, about this time, to clear the churches from another abuse which had crept into them. Plays, interludes, and farces, were there often acted in defence of the former superstitions; and the reverence of the multitude for ancient principles and modes of worship, was thereby gradually effaced. We do not hear that the catholics attempted to retaliate, by employing this powerful engine against their adversaries, or endeavouring, by like arts, to expose that fanatical spirit by which, it appears, the reformers were frequently actuated. Perhaps the people were not disposed to relish a jest on that side: pertaining greater simplicity and the more spiritual abstract worship of the protestants gave less hold to ridicule, which is commonly founded on sensible representations. It was, therefore, a very agreeable concession, which the king made to the catholic party, to suppress entirely these religious comedies.

Thus Henry laboured incessantly, by arguments, creeds, and penal statutes, to bring his subjects to a uniformity in their religious sentiments: but a nation, with the greatest earnestness, into all those scholastic disputes, he encouraged the people, by his example, to apply themselves to the study of theology; and it was in vain afterwards to tell them, that in the present age the protestant church would restrain their tongues or pens, that they would cordially agree in any set of tenets or opinions prescribed to them.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Henry, being determined to avenge himself on the King of Scots for slitting the advances which he had made him, would gladly have obtained supply from parliament, in order to procure that enterprise, but as he did not think it prudent to discover his intentions, that assembly, conformably to their frugal maxims, would understand no hints; and the king was disappointed in his expectations. He continued, however, to make preparations for war; and as soon as read. There were but 500 copies printed of this first authorized edition of the Bible; a book, of which there are now several millions of copies in the kingdom.

Q Burnet, vol. i. p. 110.
he thought himself in a condition to invade Scotland, he published a manifest, by which he endeavoured to justify his hostilities. He complained of James's breach of word, in relieving the Earl of Angus; and for the escape of the queen of the quarrel; but in order to give a more specious colour to the enterprise, he mentioned other injuries, namely, that his nephew had granted protection to some English rebels and fugitives, and had detained some terms of his capitation to return to England.

He even revived the old claim to the vassallage of Scotland, and he summoned James to do homage to him as his liege lord and superior. He employed the Duke of Norfolk, whom he called the scion of the Scots, to command in the war; and though James sent the Bishop of Aberdeen and Sir James Leurmont of Darsay, to appease his uncle, he would hearken to no terms of accommodation. While Norfolk was assembling his army at Newcastle, Sir Robert Bowes, attended by Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Ralph Evers, Sir Brian Latoun, and others, made an incursion into Scotland, and advanced towards Jedburgh, with an intention of pillaging and destroying that town. The Earl of Angus, and George Douglas by his brother, who had been many years banished their country, and had subsisted by Henry's bounty, joined the English army in this excursion; and the forces commanded by Bowes exceeded forty thousand men, and was fit for any preparations for defence, and had posted a considerable body, under the command of the Earl of Huntley, for the protection of the borders. Lord Hume, at the head of his vanguard, met them, and, having engaged and overpowered the English, put them to flight, and were pursued by the enemy. Evers, Latoun, and some other persons of distinction, were taken prisoners.

A few only, of small note, fell in the skirmish. The Duke of Norfolk, meanwhile, began to move from his encampment at Carlisle to England, and took possession of Shrewsbury, Derby, Cumberland, Surrey, Hertford, Rutland, with many others of the nobility, he advanced in the borders. His forces amounted to above twenty thousand men; and it required the utmost efforts of Scotland to resist such a formidable armament. James had assembled his whole military force at Fala and Soutry, and was ready to advance as soon as he should be informed of Norfolk's invasion of his kingdom. The English passed the Tweed at Berwick, and marched along the banks of the river as far as Kelso; but hearing that James had collected near thirty thousand men, they repassed the river at that village, and retreated into their own country. The King of Scots, hearing of this, returned to the place of his revenge on his invaders, gave the signal for pursuing them, and carrying the war into England. He was surprised to find that his nobility, who were in general disaffected on account of the preference which he had given to the clergy opposed this resolution, and refused to attend him in his projected enterprise. Enraged at this mutiny, he reproached them with cowardice, and threatened vengeance; but still resolved, with the forces which adhered to him, to make an impression on the enemy. He sent ten thousand men to the western borders, who entered England at Solway frith; and he himself followed them at a small distance, ready to join them upon occasion. Disguised, however, he held a secret session of peers and commons, sent a message to the army, deposing Lord Maxwel, their general, and conferring his command on Oliver Sinclair, a private gentleman, who was his favourite. The army was extremely disgusted with this alteration, and was ready to disband; when a small body of English appeared, not exceeding 500 men, under the command of Dacres and Musgrave. A panic ensued, which took off the whole English, and, to flight, and were pursued by the enemy.

Few were killed in this rout; for it was no action; but a great many were taken prisoners, and some of the principal nobility: among these the Earls of Cassils and Glenorchy, the Duke of Orkney, the Earl of Arran, and Sir John, Oliphant, Grey, who were all sent to London, and given in custody to different noblemen.

The King of Scots, hearing of this disaster, was astonishe d; and being naturally of a melancholy disposition, as well as endowed with a high spirit, he expressed his anger of his temper on this dismal occasion. Rage against his nobility, who, he believed, had betrayed him; shame for a defeat by such unequal numbers; regret for the past, fear of the future; all these passions so wrought up in him, that he would admit of no consolation, but abandon ef himself wholly to despair. His body was wasted by sympathy with his anxious mind; and even his life began to be thought in danger. He had no issue living; and hearing that his queen was safely delivered, he asked whether she had brought him a male or a female child? Being told, the latter; he turned himself in his bed: "The crown came with a woman," said he, and it will go with one: many miseries await this poor king:

Henry will make it his own, either by force of arms or by marriage." A few days after, he expired, in the flower of his age; a prince of considerable estate, with able virtues and a great degree of vigilance and personal courage, for pressing those dis orders to which his kingdom during that age was so much exposed. He executed justice with impartiality and great strictness; and, according to the custom of the church against the rapine of the nobility, he escaped not the hatred of that order. The Protestants also, whom he opposed, have endeavoured to throw many stains on his memory; but have not been able to fix any considerable imputation upon.

Henry was no sooner informed of this victory, and of the death of his nephew, than he proceeded, as James had foreseen, the scheme of uniting the Scotch regent, Lord Andrew Stewart, with James, Earl of Edward, to the hereditary of that kingdom. He called together the Scottish nobles who were his prisoners; and after reprimanding them in severe terms for their pretended breach of treaty, he began to soften his danger, and proposed to them this expedient, by which, he hoped, those disorders, so prejudicial to both states, would for the future be prevented. He offered to bestow on them their liberty with their arms; and only required of them engagements to favour the marriage of the Prince of Wales with their young mistress. They were easily prevailed on to give their assent to a proposal which seemed so natural and so advantageous to both kingdoms; and being conducted to Newcastle, they were informed by Sir John Holden, for their return, in case the intended nuptials were not completed; and they thence proceeded to Scotland, where they found affairs in some confusion.

The Pope, observing his authority in Scotland to be in danger from the spreading of the new opinions, had bestowed on Beaton, the primatial dignity of cardinal, in order to confer more influence upon him; and that prelate had long been regarded as prime minister to James, and as the head of that party which defended the ancient privi leges and property of the ecclesiastics. Upon the death of his master, this man, apprehensive of the consequences both to his party and to himself, endeavoured to keep peace at the time, and for this purpose, he was accused of executing a deed, which required a high degree of temerity. He forged, it is said, a will for the king, appointing himself, and three noblemen more, regents of the kingdom during the minority of the infant princess; at least, for historians are not well agreed in the circumstances of the fact, he bad read to James a paper of that import, in which that monarch, during the delirium which preceded his death, had promised to send him. By virtue of this will, Beaton had put himself in posses for them to act with greater temper or moderation, after they had embraced the resolution of suspending the ancient establishments. So loud was the popularity of the prelates, that the land was persuaded the softness of the law preachers was equivalent to a formed design of choosing the national religion of which, as was afterwards shewn in different periods of their lives, even an inclination to the new doctrines. This was shown by the reception that his son was accorded by the clergy, from the.spreadings of affairs during that age, which rendered it impossible son of the government; and having united his interests with those of the queen-dowager, he obtained the consent of the convention of states, and excluded the pretensions of the Earl of Arran.

James, Earl of Arran, of the name of Hamilton, was next heir to the crown by his grandmother, daughter of James III. and on that account he was entitled to possess that high office into which the cardinal had obtruded himself. The prospect also of his succession after a princess, who was in such tender infancy, procured him many partisans; and though his character indicated little space for a great man, a prospect of which he had not foreseen, he was not afraid to apply to the electorate of his province with the offer of the crown. These adherents, joined to these same of his own family, he had been able to make opposition to the cardinal's administration; and the suspicion of Bolton's forgery, with the accession of the noblemen who had been prisoners in England, assisted too by some money sent from London, was able to turn the balance in his favour. The Earl of Angus and his brother, having taken the present opportunity of returning into their native country, opposed the cardinal with all the credit of that powerful family; and the majority of the convention had now embraced opposite interests to those which formerly prevailed.

Arran was declared governor; the cardinal was committed to custody under the care of Lord Seton; and a negociation was commenced with Sir Ralph Sadler, the English ambassador, for the marriage of the infant queen with the Prince of Wales. The following conditions, or Treaty with Scotland, were quickly agreed on; that the queen should remain in Scotland till she should be ten years of age: the cardinal was then to be sent to be educated; that six Scottish noblemen should immediately be delivered as hostages to Henry; and that the kingdom, notwithstanding its union with England, should still retain its laws and privileges. By means of these equitable conditions, the war between the nations, which had threatened Scotland with such dismal calamities, seemed to be fully composed, and to be changed into perpetual concord and amity.

But the cardinal-primate, having prevailed on Seton to restore him to his liberty, was able, by his intrigues, to confound all these measures, which appeared so well concerted. He collected the most considerable ecclesiastics; and having represented to them the imminent danger to which their revenues and privileges were exposed, he persuaded them to collect privately from the clergy a large sum of money, by which, if intrusted to his management, he hoped to defraud them of their revenues. He persuaded the partisans whom he acquired by pecuniary motives, to raise up the zeal of those who were attached to the catholic worship; and he represented the union with England as a threat to the security of the nation and to the ancient religion. The national antipathy of the Scots to their southern neighbours was also an infallible engine by which the cardinal wrought upon the people; and through the terror of Henry's arms, and their own inability to make resistance, had procured a temporary assent to the alliance and marriage proposed, the settled habits of the nation produced an extreme aversion to those measures. The English ambassador and his retinue received many insults from persons whom the cardinal had instigated to commit those invasions, in hopes of bringing on a rupture: but Sadler prudently dissembled the matter; and waited patiently till the day appointed for the discovery of the hostilities. He then declared in the regent the performance of that important article; but received for answer, that his authority was very precarious, that the nation had now taken a different impression, and that it was not in his power to remove any of the nobles or to deliver themselves as hostages to the English. Sadler, foreseeing the consequence of this refusal, sent a summons to all those who had been prisoners in England, and requisition of the present of the sums which they had promised of returning into custody. None of them showed so much sentiment of honour as to fulfil their engagements, except Gilbert Kennedy, Earl of Cassillis. Henry was so well pleased with the behaviour of this nobleman, that he not only received him graciously, but honoured him with presents, gave him his liberty, and sent him back to Scotland, with his two brothers, whom he had left as hostages.

This behaviour of the Scottish nobles, though it reflected dishonour on the nation, was not attended with any evil. Henry foresaw that all those persons would now be deeply interested to maintain their enmity and opposition to England. And as a war was soon expected with that kingdom, he found it necessary immediately to apply to England for assistance of that ancienly, during the present distresses of the Scottish nation. Though the French king was fully sensible of his interest in supporting Scotland, a demand of aid could not have been made on him at a more unsatisfactory season. His pretensions on the Milanese, and his resistance against Charles, had engaged him in a war with that potentate; and having made great though fruitless efforts during the preceding campaign, he was the more disabled at present from defending his own dominions, much more from granting any succour to the Scots. Matthew Stuart, Earl of Lenox, a young nobleman of a great family, was at that time in the French court; and Francis being informed that he was engaged in ancient and hereditary enmity with the Hamiltons, who had murdered his father, sent him over to his native country, as a support to the cardinal and the queen-mother: and he promised to the queen-mother, if she would assist him in military success, should soon be dispatched after him. Arran, the governor, seeing all these preparations against him, assembled his friends, and made an attempt to get the person of the infant queen into his custody; but being repulsed, he resolved to manage matters with his enemies, and to intrust that precious charge to four neutral persons, the heads of potent families, the Grisahams, Areskines, Landseys, and Livingstones. The arrival of Lenox, in the interests of the English, to render the victory of the French party over the English still more indispensible.

The opposition which Henry met with in the Restoration with Scotland, from the French intrigues and the resentment, and further confirmed the resolution which he had already taken, of breaking with France, and of uniting his arms with those of the emperor. He had other grounds of complaints against the French king, which, though not of great importance, yet being recent, were able to overbalance those great injuries which he had formerly received from Charles. He pretended that Francis had engaged to imitate his example, in separating himself from the league of the North: to the contrary, he had broken his promise in that particular. He was dissatisfied that James, his nephew, had been allowed to marry, first, Magdelene of France, then a princess of the house of Guise; then James, in these alliances as pledges, which Francis gave, of his intentions to support the Scots against the power of England. He had been informed of some rancours which the French king had thrown out against his conduct with regard to his wives. He was very disgusted that Francis, after so many obligations which he owed him, had sacrificed him to the emperor; and in the confidence of friendship, had rashly revealed his secrets to that subtle and interested monarch. And he complained that regular payments were never made of the sums due to him by France, and of the pension which had been stipulated. Impelled by all these motives, he alienated himself from his ancient friend and confederate, and formed a league with the emperor, and sent him to Scotland, to rally the allies; and to require that prince to pay Henry all the sums which he owed him, and to consign Boulogne, Montreuil, Terouanne, and Arras, as a security for the regular payment of the sums which they had promised of returning into custody. None of them showed so much sentiment of honour as to fulfil their engagements, except Gilbert Kennedy, Earl of Cassillis.
Guizene; for Charles, the duchy of Burgundy, and some other territories. That they might have a pretence for enforcing these claims, they sent a message to Francis, requiring him to renounce his alliance with Sultan Solymman, and to make reparations for all the prejudice which Christendom had sustained from that unnatural condercy. Upon the French king's refusal, war was de-cclared against him. But it is proper to remark, that the partisans of France objected to Charles his alliance with the heretical King of England, as no less obnoxious than that which Francis had contracted with the Turk; both having at last provoked a breach of the solemn promise which he had given to Clement VII. never to make peace or alliance with England.

While the treaty with the emperor was a parliament, negotiating, the king summoned a new session of parliament, in order to obtain supplies for his projected war with France. The parliament granted him a subsidy, to be paid in three years: it was levied in a peculiar manner; but exceeded not three shillings in the pound upon any individual. The convocation gave the king six shillings in the pound, to be levied in three years. Greater sums were always, even during the establishment of the catholic religion, exacted from the clergy than from the laymen. Charles, in his day, when Henry dissolved the monasteries, and sold their revenues, or bestowed them on his nobility and courtiers, that he had killed the men which brought him the muniments of state.

The parliament also facilitated the execution of the former law, by which the king's proclamations were made equal to statutes: they appointed that any nine counsellors should form a legal court for punishing all disobedience to proclamations. They declared it a case of criminal causes, as well as of all parliament, seemed, if the king had so pleased, the necessary consequence of this enormous law. He might issue a proclamation, enpowering any judge or justice, to arrest and imprison the criminals, not for breach of the statute, but for disobedience to his proclamation. It is remarkable, that Lorde Mountjoy entered a protest against this law; and it is equally remarkable, that no protest is the only one entered against any public bill during this whole reign.

It was enacted this session, That any spiritual person who preached or taught contrary to the doctrine contained in the king's book, The Evolution of Christian Man, or contrary to any doctrine which he should thereafter pronounce, was to be admitted on the first conviction to renounce his error; on the second, he was required to carry a fugger, which, if he refused to do, or fell into a third offence, he was to be imprisoned in the house for the third offence, were only to forfeit their goods and chattels, and to be liable to perpetual imprisonment.

Indictments must be laid within a year after the offence, and the prescriptions of the statute, therefore, determined, distinctly.

These penalties were lighter than those which were formerly imposed on a denial of the real presence: it was, however, subjoined in this statute, that the act of the Six Articles was still in force. But in order to make the king more entirely master of his people, it was enacted, That he might be hereafter, at his pleasure, change this act, or any provision in it. By this clause, both parties were retained in subjection; so far as regarded religion, the king was invested, in the fullest manner, with the sole legislative authority in his kingdom: and all his subjects were, under the severest penalties, expressly bound to receive implicitly whatever doctrine he should please to recommend to them.

The reformers began to entertain hopes that this great power of the crown might still be employed in their favour. The king married Catherine of di Court; and his choice was considered a monument of virtue, and somewhat inclined to the new doctrine.

By this marriage, Henry confirmed what had formerly been foretold in jest, that he would be obliged to espouse a wicked queen. With which the emperor seemed a circumstance no less favourable to the catholic party; and thus matters remained still nearly balanced between the factions.

The advantages gained by this powerful confedency between

Henry and Charles were insensible during the present year. The campaign was opened with a victory gained by the Duke of Cleves, France's ally, over the forces of the emperor. As a rejoinder to this, it will be proper to remark, that the partisans of France objected to Charles his alliance with the heretical King of England, as no less obnoxious than that which Francis had contracted with the Turk; both having at last provoked a breach of the solemn promise which he had given to Cle-

their services. In a little time he had collected an army of ten thousand men, and he threatened his enemies with immediate destruction. The cardinal had no equal force to oppose him; but he foresaw that Lenox could not long submit so great an army, and he endeavoured to gain time by opening a negotiation with him. He seduced his followers by various arts; he prevailed on the Douglasses to change party; he represented to the whole nation the danger of civil wars and commotions: and Lenox, observing the unequal contest in which he was engaged, was at last obliged to lay down his arms, and to accept of the terms of accommodation with the parliament. Present peace was restored; but no confidence took place between the parties. Lenox, fortifying his castles, and putting himself in a posture of defence, waited the arrival of English succours, from whose assistance alone he expected to obtain the superiority over his enemies.

While the winter season restrained Henry from military operations, he summoned a new parliament; in which a law was passed, as he was pleased to dictate, with regard to the succession of the crown. After declaring that the Prince of Wales, or any of the king's male issue, were first and immediate inheritors of the crown, he next restored the two princesses, Mary and Elizabeth, to their right of succession. This seemed a reasonable piece of justice, and corrected what the king's former violence had thrown into confusion; but it was impossible for Henry to do any thing to be regarded as a betrayal of his paramount power, under so circumstance, his usual extravagance and caprice. Though he opened the way for these two princesses to mount the throne, he would not allow the acts to be reversed which had declared them illegitimate; he made the parliament confer on him a power of still excluding them, if they refused to submit to any conditions which he should be pleased to impose; and he required them to enact, that, in default of his disposing of the crown as he pleased, by will or letters patent. He did not probably foresee, that, in proportion as he degraded the parliament, by rendering it the passive instrument of his various and violent inclinations, he taught the people to regard all his acts as invalid, and thereby defeated even the purposes which he was bent to attain.

An act passed, declaring that the king's usual style should be, King of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and on earth the supreme head of the church of England and Ireland. It seemed a palpable inconsistency to retain the title of defender of the faith, which the court of Rome had conferred on him, for maintaining the former position of Luther; and to shew his ecclesiastical supremacy in opposition to the claims of that court. An act also passed for the remission of the debt which the king had lately contracted by a general loan, levied upon the realm, and with easily believed, that after the former act of this kind, the loan was not entirely voluntary. But there was a peculiar circumstance attending the present statute, which none but Henry would have thought of; namely, that those who had already gotten payment, either in whole or in part, should refund the money to the exchequer.

The oaths which Henry imposed for the security of his ecclesiastical model, were not more reasonable than his other measures. All his subjects of any distinction had already been obliged to renounce the Pope's supremacy; but as the clauses to which they swore had not been deemed entirely satisfactory, another oath was imposed; and it was added, that all those who had taken the former oaths should be understood to have taken the new one. A strange supposition! to represent men as bound by an oath which they had never taken.

The freile law in which the parliament gave their sanction, was that by which they mitigated the law of the Six Articles, and enacted, that no person should be put to his trial upon an accusation concerning any of the offences comprised in that sanguinary statute, except on the oaths of the parties. English commissioners were authorized for the purpose; and that no person should be arrested or committed to ward for any such offence before he was indicted. Any preacher accused of speaking in his sermon contrary to these articles, must be indicted within forty days after such preaching.

The king always experienced the limits of his authority whenever he demanded subsidies, however moderate, from the parliament; and therefore, not to hazard a refusal, he made no mention of any want of a supply: but as he was both in France and Scotland, as well as his usual prodigality, had involved him in great expense, he had recourse to other methods of filling his exchequer. Notwithstanding the payment of some of his debts, he yet required new loans from his subjects; and he promised gold from forty-five shillings to forty-eight an ounce; and silver from three shillings and nine-pence to four shillings. His pretence for this innovation was to prevent the money from being exported; as if that expedient could anywhere serve the purpose. He even coined some base money, and ordered it to be current by proclamation. He named commissioners for levying a bounteous, and he extorted about seventy thousand pounds by this expedient. Read, alderman of London, a man somewhat advanced in years, having refused to contribute, or not coming up to the expectations of the commissioners, was enrolled as a foot soldier; where he was sold to be ransomed to William Read, who had been already refractory, was thrown into prison, and obtained not his liberty, but by paying a large composition. These powers of the prerogative, (which at that time passed unquestioned,) the compelling of any man to do service for the king in time of war, and the demoralizing a man during pleasure, not to mention the practice of exacting loans, rendered the sovereign in a manner absolute master of the person and property of every individual.

Early this year the king sent a fleet and an army to invade Scotland. The fleet consisted of near two hundred vessels, and carried on board ten thousand men. Dudley, Lord Lisle, commanded the sea forces; the Earl of Hertford the land forces. They were discharged with the utmost success, and after dispersing a small body which opposed them, they took that town without resistance, and then marched to Edinburgh. The gates were soon beaten down, (for little or no resistance,) and the English first pillaged and then set fire to the city. The regent and cardinal were not prepared to oppose so great a force, and they fled to Stirling. Hertford marched eastward; and being joined by a new body under Evers, warden of the east marches, he laid waste the whole country, burned and destroyed Haddington and Dunbar, then retreated into England; having lost only forty men in the whole expedition. The Earl of Arran collected some forces; but finding that the English had so completely the advantage, he retired to Leven, which Lenox, who was justly suspected of a correspondence with the enemy. That nobleman, after making some resistance, was obliged to fly into England, where Henry settled a pension upon him. Some years after he married Margaret Douglas, in marriage. In return, Lenox stipulated conditions, by which, had he been able to execute them, he must have reduced his country to total servitude.

Henry's policy was blamed in this sudden and violent incursion; by which he inflamed the passions of the Scots, without subdued their spirit; and it was commonly said, that he did too much, if he intended to solace an alliance, and too little, if he meant a conquest. But the reason of his releasing the troops was, that he resolved to carry on a projected enterprise against France, in which he intended to employ the whole force of his kingdom. He had concerted a plan with the emperor, which threatened the total ruin of the monarch, and must, as a necessary consequence, have involved the ruin of England. These two princes had agreed to invade France with forces amounting to above a hundred thousand men: Henry engaged to set out from Calais; Charles from the Low Countries; they were to enter on no stage; but leaving all the frontier towns behind them, to march directly to Paris, where they were to join their forces, and thence to proceed to the entire conquest of the kingdom. France could not resist to the formidable preparations much above forty thousand men.
Henry, having appointed the queen, returned, during his absence, passed over to Calais with thirty thousand men; accompanied by the Duke of York, John Erroll, Earl of Arundel, Vere, Earl of Oxford, the Earl of Surrey, Paulet, Lord John, Lord Ferrers of Charleyst, Lord Mountjoy, Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Francis Bryan, and the most flourishing nobility and gentry of his kingdom. King Henry was attended by the Count de Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thousand foot and four thousand horse; and the whole composed an army which nothing on that frontier was able to resist. The chief force of the French armies was driven to the side of Champagne, in order to oppose the Imperialists.

The emperor, with an army of near sixty thousand men, had taken the field much earlier than Henry; and not to lose time, while he waited for the arrival of his confederate, he sat down before Luxembourg, which was surrendered to him: he there procured to Commandery on the Meuse, which he took: Ligny met with the same fate: he next had siege to St. Diacre on the Marine, which, though, during a week place, made a brave resistance under the Count of Santerre, the governor, and the siege was protracted beyond expectation.

The emperor was employed before this town at the time, the English forces were assembled in Picardy. Henry, either tempted by the defenceless condition of the French frontier, or thinking that the emperor had first broken his engagement by forming sieges, or, perhaps, foreseeing at last the resolution of the Earl of Carlisle of attacking the French power, instead of marching forward to Paris, sat down before Montreuil and Boulogne. The Duke of Norfolk commanded the army before Montreuil: the king himself that before Boulogne. Verrin was governor of the latter place, and under him Philip Corne, a brave old soldier, who encouraged the garrison to defend themselves to the last extremity against the English. He did not yield, but gave battle to the French, and the town was immediately surrendered to Henry, by the cowardice of Verrin; who was afterwards beheaded for this dishonourable capitulation.

During the siege of Montreuil, the Charles had taken St. Diacre, and finding the season much advanced, he began to hear a treaty of peace with France, since all his schemes for subduing that kingdom were likely to prove abortive. In order to have a pretence for deserting his ally, he sent a messenger to the English camp, requiring Henry immediately to fulfil his engagements, and to meet him with his army before Paris. Henry replied, that he was too far engaged in the siege of Boulogne to raise it with the forces of England; but that for the present, he would bring the concert, by besieging St. Diacre. This answer served

Charles as a sufficient reason for concluding a peace with Francis, at Crepy, where no mention was made of England. He stipulated to give Flanders as a dowry to his daughter, whom he agreed to marry to the Duke of Orleans, Francis's second son; and Francis, in return, withdrew his troops from Piedmont and Savoy, and renounced all claim to Milton, Naples, and other territories in Italy. This peace, so advantageous to Francis, was procured, partly by the decisive victory obtained in the beginning of the campaign, by the Count of Angoulé, over the Imperialists, at Cerisoles, in Piedmont, partly by the objects of the English, which they projected against the Protestant princes in Germany. Charles ordered his troops to separate from the English in Picardy; and Henry, finding himself obliged to raise the siege of Montreuil, returned into England. This campaign served to the populace as matter of great triumph; but all men of sense concluded that the king had, as in all his former military enterprises, made, at a great expense, an acquisition which was of no importance.

The war with Scotland, meanwhile, was conducted feebly, and with various success. Sir Ralph Evers, now Lord Evers, Duke of Northumberland, and Suffolk, Fitzalan Earl of Arundel, and having laid waste the counties of Tiviotdale and the Merse, they proceeded to the abbey of Coldingham, which they took possession of and fortified. The governor assembled an army of eight thousand men, in order to dislodge them from this post; but he had no sooner opened his gates than a sudden panic seized him; he left the army, and fled to Dubar. He complained of the mutiny of his troops, and pretended apprehensions lest they should deliver him into the hands of the English; but his own unwarlike spirit was generally believed to have been the cause of this dishonourable flight. The Scottish army, upon the departure of their general, fell into confusion; and had not Angus, with a few of his retainers, brought off the cannon, and protected their rear, the English might have gained great advantages over them. Evers, elated with this success, boasted to Henry that he had conquered all Scotland to the Forth; and he claimed a reward for this important service. The Duke of Norfolk, who knew what difficulties such acquisitions would be maintained against a warlike enemy, advised the king to grant him, as his reward, the conquests of which he boasted so highly. The next inroad made by the English showed the vanity of Evers's hopes. This general led about five thousand men into Tiviotdale, and was employed in ravaging that country, when intelligence was brought him, that some Scots for the most part the abbey of Melrose. Angus had roused the governor to more activity; and a proclamation being issued for assembling the troops of the neighboring counties, a considerable body had repaired thither to oppose the enemy. Norman Leith, and the Earl of Forth, commanded the English army, with some volunteers from Fife; and he inspired courage into the whole, as well by this accession of force, as by his personal bravery and intrepidity. In order to bring their troops to the necessity of a peace, the Scottish leaders ordered all their cavalry to dismount; and they resolved to wait, on some high grounds near An-cram, the assault of the English. The English, whose parties were large, and pursued with too much to despoise the enemy, thought, when they saw the Scottish horses led off the field, that the whole army was retreating; and they hastened to attack them. The Scots received them in good order, and supported by the advantage of the ground, as well as by the surprise of the English, who expected no resistance, they soon put them to flight, and pursued them with considerable slaughter. Evers and Latoun were both killed, and above a thousand men were made prisoners. In order to support the Scots in this war, Francis, some time after, sent over a body of auxiliaries, to the number of three thousand five hundred men, under the command of Montgomerie, Lord of Eglinton. The Earl of Haddington, the governor assembled an army of fifteen thousand men at Haddington, and marched thence to ravage the east borders of England. He laid all waste wherever he came; and having met with no considerable resistance, he retired into his own country, and disbanded his army. The Earl of Hereford, in revenge, committed ravages on the middle and west marches; and the war on both sides was signalized rather by the ills inflicted on the enemy, than by any considerable advantage gained by either party. The war, likewise, between France and England, was not distinguished this year by any memorable event. Francis had equipped a fleet of above two hundred sail, besides galleys; and having embarked some kindred in the ships, on board, he sent them to make a descent in England. They sailed to the Isle of Wight, where they found the English fleet lying at anchor in St. Helen's. It consisted not of above two thousand sail and the admiral thought it most advisable to remain in that road, in hope of drawing the French into the narrow channels and the rocks, which were unknown to them. The two fleets cannonaded each other for two considerable hours; and the admiral, near the Mary Rose, one of the largest ships of the English fleet, the damage on both sides was inconsiderable.

Francis's chief intention in equipping so great a fleet was, to prove to the king of Scots that his force was mere gaucherie, which he resolved to besiege; and for that purpose, he ordered a fort to be built, by which he intended to block up the harbour. After a considerable loss of time and money, the fort was found so ill constructed, that he was obliged to abandon it; and though he had assemblage on that frontier an army of near forty thousand men, he was not able to effect any considerable enterprise.

Henry, in order to defend his possessions in France, had levied fourteen thousand Germans; who, having marched to Fleurens, in the bishopric of Liége, found that they could advance no further. The emperor could not detain them a passage through his dominions; they received intelligence of a superior army on the side of France ready to intercept them; want of occupation and of pay soon produced a mutiny among them; and having seized the English camp, they were on the point of being reduced into their own country. There appears to have been some want of foresight in this expensive armament.

The great expense of these two wars, upheld by Henry, obliged him to summon a new parliament. The Commons granted him a subsidy, payable in two years, of two shillings a pound on land: the spirituality voted him six shillings a pound. But the parliament, apprehensive lest more demands should be made upon them, endeavoured to save themselves by a very extraordinary liberality of other people's property: by one vote they bestowed on the king all the revenues of the universities, as well as of the chantries, free chapels, and other foundations: he was pleased to increase it as increased his power; but he had no intention to rob learning of all her endowments; and he soon took care to inform the universities that they must not touch their revenues till a general and ancientablishment of endowments owe their existence to the generosity of the king, not to the protection of this servile and prostituting parliament.

The public spirit of the parliament further appeared in the preamble of a statute, in which they recognised the king to have always been, by the word of God, supreme head of the church of England; and acknowledged that the articles and other ecclesiastical persons have no manner of jurisdiction but by his royal mandate; to him alone, say they, and such persons as he shall appoint, full power and authority is given from above to hear and determine all manner of causes ecclesiastical, and to correct all manner of heresies, errors, vices, and sins whatsoever. No mention is here made of the concurrence of a coerecreation, or even of a parliament. His proclamations are, in effect, acknowledged to have, not only the force of law, but the authority of revelation; and by his royal power he might regulate the actions of men, control their words, and even direct their inward sentiments and opinions.

The king made, in person, a speech to the parliament on proroguing them; in which, after thanking them for their loving attachment to him, which, he said, equalled what was ever paid by their ancestors in any king of England, he complained of their dissensions, disputes, and animosities in religion. He told them, that the several pulpits were become a kind of batteries against each other; and that one preacher called another heretic and anabaptist, which was retaliated by the opprobrious appellations of papist and hypocrite; that he had permitted his people the use of the Scriptures, not in order to furnish them with materials for disputing and railing, but that he might enable them to inform their consciences, and resolve, and to correct all manner of heresies, errors, vices, and sins whatsoever. No mention is here made of the concurrence of a coerecreation, or even of a parliament. His proclamations are, in effect, acknowledged to have, not only the force of law, but the authority of revelation; and by his royal power he might regulate the actions of men, control their words, and even direct their inward sentiments and opinions.

The king made, in person, a speech to the parliament on proroguing them; in which, after thanking them for their loving attachment to him, which, he said, equalled what was ever paid by their ancestors in any king of England, he complained of their dissensions, disputes, and animosities in religion. He told them, that the several pulpits were become a kind of batteries against each other; and that one preacher called another heretic and anabaptist, which was reta natures of interest, rendered so frequent among Henry's ministers and counsellors. The catholics took hold of the king by his passion for orthodoxy; and they represented to him, that if his halduable zeal for enforcing the truth met with no better success, it was altogether owing to the primate, whose example and encouragement were, in reality, the secret supports of heresy. Henry, seeing the point, determined to have the primate as last; and he desired the council to make inquiry into Cranmer's conduct; promising that, if he were found guilty, he should be committed to prison, and brought to condign punishment. Cranmer, not considering the primate as last; and his old friends, from interested views, as well as the opposite party from animosity, began to show him marks of neglect and disregard. He was obliged to stand several hours among the lacqueys at the door of the council-chamber before he could be admitted: and when he was at last called in, he was told, that they had determined to send him to the Tower. Cranmer said, that he appealed to the king himself; and finding his appeal disregarded, he produced a ring, which Henry had given him as a pledge of favour and protection. The council were concluded; and when they came before the king, he restrained them in the severest terms; and told them that he had cast aside his own merit, as well as with their maligity and envy: but he was determined to crush all their cabals, and to teach them, by the severest discipline, since gentle methods were ineffectual, a more duty. He called the secretary of state, Wolsey, who was Cranmer's capital enemy, apologized for their conduct, and said, that their only intention was to set the primate's innocence in a full light, by bringing him to an open trial; and Henry obliged them all to embrace him as a sign of their sincerity; which was immediately done.
Cranmer rendered this agreement more sincere on his part, than is usual in such forced compliances.1

Persecutions. But though Henry's favour for Cranmer remained unaltered, he renewed his severe treatment against him, raising his pride and peevishness, irritated by his declining state of health, impelled him to punish with fresh severity all others who presumed to entertain a different opinion from himself, in their conduct or their prismatic points. Anne Askue, a young woman of merit as well as beauty,2 who had great connexions with the chief ladies at court, and with the queen herself, was accused of dogmataising on that delicate article; and Henry, instead of showing indulgence to the weakness of her sex and age, was but the more provoked that a woman should dare to oppose his theological sentiments. She was prevailed on by Bonner's arguments to make a seeming recantation; but she qualified it with a full denial of her own sentiments, and assured the king that zealos pried. She was thrown into prison, and she there employed herself in composing prayers and discourses, by which she fortified her resolution to endure the consequence of her sentiments, and to maintain them unaltered;
and she even wrote to the king, and told him, that, as to the Lord's supper, she believed as much as Christ himself had said of it, and as much of his divine discipline as the catholic church had required: but while she could not be brought to acknowledge an assent to the king's expectations, this declaration availed her nothing, and was rather regarded as a fresh insult. The chancellor, Wrothelsly, who had succeeded Audley, and who was much attached to the catholic party, was sent to examine her with regard to her patrons at court, and the great ladies who were in correspondence with her: but she maintained a high degree of fidelity to her friends, and would confess nothing. She was put to the torture, in the most barbarous manner, and continued still resolute in preserving secrecy. Some authors add an extraordinary circumstance: that the chancellor, who stood by, ordered the bestemmed to be taunted with the rack still further; but that officer refused compulsion: the chancellor menaced him; but met with a new refusal; upon which that magistrate, who was otherwise a person of merit, but into whose wisdom and discretion to confide was not able, was at lengthужит the rack, and drew it so violently that he almost tore the body asunder. Her constancy still surpassed the barbarity of her persecutors, and they found all their efforts to be baffled. She was then condemned to be burned alive; and being so disloqued by the rack that she could not stand, she was carried to the stake in a chair. Together with her were conducted Nicholas Belenian, a priest, John Lassels, of the king's household, and John Adams, a tailor, who had been burned with the rack; and they were all tied to the stake; and, in that dreadful situation, the chancellor sent to inform them that their pardon was readily drawn and signed, and should instantly be granted; but they refused to accept it by a recantation. They only regarded this offer as a new ornament to their crown of martyrdom; and they saw with tranquility the exequiary kindle the flames which consumed them. Wrothelsly did not consider, that this public and noted instance intrenched their honour the more to maintain a steady perseverance.

Though the severity and fidelity of Ann Ausee saved the queen from this peril, that princess soon after fell into a new danger, from which she narrowly escaped.
An ulcer had broken out in the king's leg, which, added to his extreme corpulency, and his bad habit of body, began both to threaten his life, and to render him even more than usually obstinate. He had just attended him with the most tender and dainty care, and endeavoured, by every soothing art and compliance, to allay those gusts of humour to which he was become so subject. His favorite topics of conversation were of Cranmer, Squires, and Catherine, whose good sense enabled her to discourse on any subject, was frequently engaged in the argument; and being secretly inclined to the principles of the reformers, she unwarily betrayed too much of her mind on this subject. These occasions, as well as some other incidents which would presume to differ from him, complained of her obstinacy to Gardiner, who gladly laid hold of the opportunity to inflame the quarrel. He praised the king's zealous conformity to the orthodox party of his subjects and represented, that the more elevated the person who was chaustised, and the more near to his person, the greater terror would the example strike into every one, and the more glorious would the scaffold appear to posterity.
The chancellor, being consulted, was engaged by religious zeal to second these topics; and Henry, hurried on by his own impetuous temper, and encouraged by his counsellors, went so far as to order a representation to be drawn up against his consort. Wrothelsly executed his commands; and soon after brought the paper to him to be signed: for as it was high treason to throw slander upon the queen, he might otherwise have been questioned for his treason, had he satisfied the court. It was read to the queen, and fell into the hands of one of the queen's friends, who immediately carried the intelligence to her. She was seemingly of the extreme danger to which she was exposed; but did not desert her supported. She made her way, and in the most graceful manner, to the court, and expressed her address, still to elude the efforts of her enemies.
She paid her usual visit to the king, and found him in a more serene disposition than she had reason to expect. He entered on the subject which was so familiar to him; and he seemed to challenge her to an argument in divinity.
She gently declined the conversation, and remarked, that such profound speculations were ill suited to the natural nebility of her sex. Women, she said, by their first creation, were made subject to men: the male was created after the image of God; the female after the image of the male: it belonged to the husband to choose principles for his wife: the wife's duty was, in all cases, to adopt implicitly the sentiments of her husband: and as to herself, it was doubly her duty, being blast with a husband who was qualified, by his judgment and learning, not only to choose principles for his own family, but for the most wise and knowing of every nation. Not so, said the king; replied the queen; "you are now become a doctor, Kate; and better fitted to give than receive instruction." She meekly replied, that she was sensible how little she was entitled to these attempts, but she knew she was not the less entitled to speak, when any of the king's questions the truth of this circumstance. Fox, however, describes her own poem, where she relates it. Unusual and, in justice to the king, that he disapproved of Wrothelsly's conduct, and condemned the lieutenant-his majesty, he well knew, that her conceptions could serve to no other purpose than to give him a little momentary amusement; that she found the conversation apt to languish, when not renewed by some opposition, and she had ventured sometimes to reign a con traritry of sentiments, in order to give him the pleasure of refuting her; and that she also purposed, by this innocent artifice, to engage him into topics whence she had observed, by frequent experience, that she could most easily incite him to the proposal of marriage. Henry imagined that he had entertained views of espousing the Lady Mary; and he was instantly determined to repose, by the most severe expedients, so dangerous an ambition.

Actuated by these motives, and perhaps influenced by that old disgust with which the ill conduct of Catherine Howard had inspired him against her whole family, he gave private orders to arrest Norfolk and Surrey; and they were on the morrow new arrived in the Tower.

Surrey being a commoner, his trial was the more expeditious; and as to proofs, neither parliaments nor juries seem ever to have given the least attention to them except in cases

During this whole reign. He was accused of entertaining in his family some Italians, who were suspected to be spies; a servant of his had paid a visit to Cardinal Pole in Italy, whence he was suspected of holding a correspondence with that unwholesome prelate; he had quartered the arms of Edward the Confessor on his escutcheon, which made him suspected of aspiring to the crown, though hitherto the object of universal and open conviction. During more than twenty years, maintained that his innocence, and the heralds had even justified it by their authority. These were the crimes for which a jury, notwithstanding his eloquence and spirited defence, condemned the Earl of Surrey to be put to death; and their sentence was soon after executed upon him.

The innocence of the Duke of Norfolk

Attainted of the

was still, if possible, more apparent than that of his son; and his services to the crown had been greater. His duchess, with whom he lived on bad terms, had been so base as to carry intelligence to his enemies of all she knew against him: Elizabeth Holland, he married a mistress of her to the designs of the court; yet, with all these advantages, his accusers discovered no greater crime, than his once saying that the king was sickly, and could not hold out long; and the kingdom in any cause of the crown, through the diversity of religious opinions. He wrote a pathetic letter to the king, pleading his past services, and protesting his innocence: soon after, he embraced a more proper expedient for appeasing Henry, by making a submission and confession, such as his enemies required; but nothing could mollify the unrelenting temper of the king. He assembled a parliament as the surest and most expeditious instrument of his tyranny; and the proceedings of it, however without trial or evidence, passed a bill of attainder against him, and sent it down to the Commons. Cranmer, though engaged for many years in an opposite party to Norfolk, and though he had received many and great injuries from him, would have no hand in so unjust a prosecution; and he retired to his seat at Croydon. The king was now approaching fast towards his end; and fearing lest Norfolk should escape him, he sent a message to the Commons, by which he desired them to hasten the bill, on pretence that Norfolk enjoyed the dignity of Earl Marshal, and it was necessary to appoint another, who might officiate at the ensuing ceremony of installing his son Prince of Wales. The subsequent proceedings, though founded on so frivolous a pretence; and the king, having affixed the royal assent to the bill by commissioners, issued orders for the execution of Norfolk on the morning of the twenty-ninth of January. But before he was carried to the Tower, that the king himself had expired that night, the lieutenant deferred obeying the warrant; and it was not thought advisable by the council to begin a new reign with so great a step in the kingdom, who had been condemned by a sentence so unjust and tyrannical.

The king's health had long been in a declining state; but for several days all those near him plainly saw his end approaching. He was become so weak that one durst inform him of his condition; and as some persons during this reign had suffered as tractors for forstilling the king’s death,” every one was afraid lest, in the transports of his fury, he might, on this pretext, punish capitally the author of such friendly intelligence. At last, Sir Thomas More set in motion some appearance of secrecy, and exhorted him to prepare for the fate which was awaiting him. He expressed his resignation; and desired that Cranmer might be sent for; but before the prelate arrived he was speechless, though perspiring with all the violence of his desires. Cranmer came; and he gave some sign of his dying in the faith of Christ: he squeezed the prelate’s hand, and immediately expired, after a reign of thirty-seven years and nine months; and in the fifty-sixth year of his age.

The king had made his will near a month before his demise; in which he confirmed the destination of parliament, by laying the crown, first to Prince Edward, then to the Lady Mary, next to the Lady Elizabeth. The two princesses he obliged, under the penalty of forfeiting their title to the crown, not to marry without consent of the council, which he appointed for the government of his minor son. After his own children, he settled the succession on Frances Brandon, Marchioness of Dorset, elder daughter of his sister, the French queen; then on Eleanor, Countess of Cumberland, the second daughter. In passing over the posterity of the Queen of Scots, his elder daughter: he had a political, not a personal, design; but as he subjoined, that, after the failure of the French queen’s posterity, the crown should descend to the next lawful heir, it afterwards became a question, whether the crown should be more sincere and religiously preserved to the English nation. It was thought that those princes were not the next heirs, after the house of Suffolk, but before that house; and that Henry, by expressing himself in this manner, meant entirely to exclude them. It was, indeed, on this ground which he had received from the Scots, had irritated him extremely against that nation; and he maintained to the last that character of violence and cuprice, by which his life had been so much distinguished. Another circumstance of his character, most clearly reflected with regard to strange contrarieties of his temper and conduct: he left money for masses to be said for delivering his soul from purgatory; and though he destroyed all those institutions established by his ancestors and others for the benefit of their souls: and had even left the doctrine of purgatory doubtless in all the articles of faith which he promulgated during his later years; he was yet determined, when the hour of death was approaching, to take care at least of his own future repose, and to adhere to the safer side of the question.º

His character. The principal qualities of this prince were so different from himself in different parts of his reign that, as it is well remarked by Lord Herbert, his history is his best character and description. The absolute uncontrolled authority which he maintained at home, and the regard which he acquired among foreign nations, are circumstances which entitle him, in some degree, to the appellation of a great prince; while his tyranny and barbarity exclude him from the character of a good one. He possessed, indeed, great vigour of mind, which qualified him for exercising dominion over men; courage, intrepidity, vigilance, inflexibility: and though these qualities lay not always under the guidance of a regular and solid judgment, they were applied at times in his interests, and others for the benefit of the commonwealth and every one dreaded a contest with a man who was known never to yield or to forgive, and who, in every controversy, was determined either to ruin himself or his antagonist. A catalogue of his vices would comprehend many of the worst qualities incident to human nature: violence, cruelty, profusion, rapacity, injustice, obstinacy, arrogance, bigotry, presumption, caprice: but neither was he subject to all these vices in the most extreme degree, which was one reason why he was sometimes very liberal, sometimes very severe. His heart was sincere, open, gallant, liberal, and capable at least of a temporary friendship and attachment. In this respect he was unfortunate, that the incidents of his reign served to display his faults in their full light: the treatment which be met with from the court of Rome, provoked him to violence; the danger of a revolt from his superstitious subjects, seemed to require the most extreme measures; and at the same time, it is plain that his situation tended to throw an additional lustre on what was great and magnificent in his character: the emulation between the emperor and the French king rendered him all the more insatiable in the pursuit of a conduct, of great importance in Europe: the extensive powers of his prerogative, and the submissive, not to say slavish, disposition of his parliaments, made it the more easy for him to assume and maintain that entire dominion, by which his reign is so much distinguished in the English history.

It may seem a little extraordinary, that notwithstanding his cruelty, his extortion, his arbitrary administration, this prince not only acquired the regard of his subjects, but never was the object of their hatred: he seems even, in some degree, to have possessed, to the last, their love and affection.º His exterior qualities were advantageous, and fit to captivate the multitude: his magnificence and personal heryery rendered him illustrious in vulgar eyes: and it may be said, with truth, that the English, in that age, were so thoroughly subdued, that, like eastern slaves, they were inclined to adore those tyrants in whose hands they were exercised over themselves, and at their own expense.

With regard to foreign states, Henry appears long to have supported an intercourse of friendship with Francis, and maintained it, though these were more sincere and religiously preserved to the English nation. Their common jealousy of the Emperor Charles, and some resemblance in their characters, (though the comparison sets the French monarch in a very superior and advantageous light,) served as the cement of their mutual amity. Francis is said to have been affected with the king’s death, and to have expressed much regret for the loss. His own health began to decline: he foretold that he should not long survive his friend; and he lived in about two months after him.

There were ten parliaments summoned in succession by Henry VIII. and twenty-three sessions held. The whole time in which these parliaments sat during this long reign exceeded not three years and a half. It amounted not to a twelvemonth during the first twenty years. The innovations in religion obliged the king afterwards to call these assemblies more frequently; but though these were the most important transactions that ever fell under the cognizance of parliament, their devote submission to Henry’s will, added to their earnest desire of soon returning to their country seats, produced a quick despatch of the bills, and made the sessions short duration. All the king’s capitulations were indeed blindly complied with, and no regard was paid to the safety or liberty of the subject. Besides the violent prosecution of whatever he was pleased to term heresy, the laws of treason were multiplied beyond all former precedents. Even words to the disarrangement of the king, queen, or royal issue, were subjected to that penalty; and so little care was taken in framing these rigorous statutes, that they contained obvious contradictions; and such that, had they been strictly executed, every man without exception must have fallen under the penalty of treason. By one statute,º for instance, it was declared treason to assert the validity of the king’s marriage; and by another,º to partake of the communion, or to use the elements; and by another,º to say any thing either to the disarrangement or slander of the princes, Mary and Elizabeth; and to call them spurious, would no doubt have been construed to their slander. Nor would even a profound silence, with regard to these delicate points, he able to save a person from such penalties. For by the former statute, whoever refused to answer upon oath any point contained in that act, was subjected to the pains of treason: and the king’s representative was to pose to any one a question with regard to the legality of either of his first marriages: if the person were silent, he was a traitor by law: if he answered either in the negative... or in the affirmative, he was no less a traitor. So monstrous were the inconsistencies which arose from the furious passions of the king, and the slavish submissiveness of his parliaments. It is hard to say whether these contradictions were owing to Henry's precipitancy, or to a formed design of tyranny. It may not be improper to recapitulate whatever is memorable in the statutes of this reign, whether with regard to government or commerce: nothing can better show the genius of the age than such a review of the laws.

The abolition of the ancient religion much contributed to the regular execution of justice. While the cathole superstition lasted, the prince had no possibility of punishing any crime in the clergy: the church would not permit the magistrate to try the offences of her members, and she could not herself inflict any civil penalties upon them. But Henry restrained these pernicious immunities: the privilege of clergy was abolished for the crimes of petty treason, murder, and felony, to all under the degree of a subdeacon. But the former superstition not only protected crimes in the clergy: it exempted also the laity from punishment, by affording them shelter in the churches and sanctuaries. The parliament abolished these privileges. It was first declared, that no sanctuaries were allowed in cases of murder, theft, or any other crime. It was next, in the case of murder, felony, and rape. A final and limited them in other particulars. The further progress of the Reformation removed all distinction between the clergy and other subjects; and also abolished entirely the privileges of sanctuaries. Some consequences were implied in the neglect of the canon law.

The only expedient employed to support the military spirit during this age was, the reviving and extending of some old statutes passed for the employment of archers, on which the defence of the kingdom was supposed much to depend. Every man was ordered to have a bow; butts were ordered to be erected in every parish: and every man was to be furnished with two arrows, or bows, which were to be made, to two of elm or oak for the service of the common people. The use of cross-bows and hand-guns was also prohibited. What rendered the English bowmen more formidable was, that they carried halberts with them, by which they were enabled upon occasion to engage in close fight with the enemy. Frequent musters or arrays were also made of the people, even during time of peace; and all men of substance were obliged to have a complete suit of armour or harness, as it was called. The military spirit of the English, during that age, rendered this precaution, it was thought, sufficient for the defence of the nation; and as the king had then an absolute power of command over all his subjects, in all cases of necessity, in case of danger, appoint new officers, and levy regiments, and collect an army as numerous as he pleased. When no faction or division prevailed among the people, there was no foreign power that ever thought of invading England. The city of London alone could muster fifteen thousand men. Discipline, however, was no advantage wanting to these troops; though the garrison of Calais was a nursery of officers; and Tournay first, Boulogne afterwards, served to increase the number. Every one who served abroad was allowed to alienate his lands without paying any fees. A general permission was granted to dispose of land by will. The parliament was so little jealous of the rights of the crown, that in 1560 a statute was passed (as used to be at that time, scarcely worth preserving,) that there is an instance of one Strode, who, because he had introduced into the Lower House some bill regarding tin, was severely treated by the Statuaries courts in Cornwall: heavy fines were imposed on him; and upon his refusal to pay, he was thrown into a dungeon, loaded with irons, and used in such a manner as brought his life in danger: yet all the notice which the public took of this enormity, even at such a pulley court, was to enact, That no man could afterwards be questioned for his conduct in parliament. This prohibition, however, must be supposed to extend only to the inferior courts: for as to the king, and privy-council, and star-chamber, they were scarcely bound by any law.

There is a bill of tonnage and poundage, which shows what uncertain ideas the parliament had formed both of their own privileges, and of the rights of the sovereign. This duty had been voted to every king since Henry IV. during the term of his own life only: yet Henry VIII. had been allowed to levy it six years without any law; and though he levied it during the first four years of his reign, without that time, no attention had been given either to grant it to him regularly, or restrain him from levying it. At last the parliament resolved to give him that supply; but even in this concession they plainly show themselves at a loss to determine whether they grant it, or to consider any part of himself to levy it. They say that the imposition was made to endure during the natural life of the late king and no longer: they yet blame the merchants who had not paid it to the present king: they observe that the law for tonnage and poundage was expired; yet make no scruple to call that imposition the king's due: they affirm, that he had sustained great and manifold losses by those who had defrauded him of it; and to provide a remedy, they vote him that supply during his life time, and no longer. It is remarkable that, notwithstanding this last clause, all his successors, for more than a century, persevered in the like irregularity, for a period of a certain term in which the whole nation acquiesced, and which gave no offence. But when Charles I. attempted to continue in the same course which had now received the sanction of many generations, so much were the opinions of men altered, and the spirit of the times changed, that the first pretext was the loss occasioned by the foreign nations, partial or ignorant, still represent this measure as a most violent and unreasoned enormity in that unhappy prince.

The parliament was allowed to make laws for Wales without consent of parliament. It was forgotten, that with regard both to Wales and England, the limitation was abolished by the statute, which gave to the royal proclamations the force of law.

The foreign commerce of England, during this age, was mostly confined to the Netherlands. The inhabitants of the Low Countries bought the English commodities, and distributed them to the eastern parts of Europe: Hence the mutual dependence of those countries on each other; and the great loss sustained by both in case of a rupture. During all the variations of politics, the sovereigns endeavoured to avoid coming to this extremity; and though the trading uncour was not on a large scale, yet the yielding up to Francis, the nation always leaned towards the emperor.

In 1528, hostilities commenced between England and the Low Countries; and the inconvenience was soon felt on both sides. But such a supply as cloth in England, the English merchants could not buy it from the clothiers, and the clothiers were obliged to dismiss their workmen, who began to be tumultuous for want of bread. The cardinal, to appease them, sent for the merchants, and ordered them to buy cloth as usual. They told him, that they could not dispose of it as usual; and, notwithstanding his menaces, he could get no other answer from them. An agreement was at last made, to continue the commerce between the states, even during war. It was not till the end of this reign that any salaried, car- rotes, turnips, or other edible roots, were produced in Eng- land. (cabbage and celeriac were at that time, scarcely worth preserving,) that there is an instance of one Strode, who, because he had introduced into the Lower House some bill regarding tin, was severely treated by the Statuaries courts in Cornwall: heavy fines were imposed on him; and upon his refusal to pay, he was thrown into a dungeon, loaded with irons, and used in such a manner as brought his life in danger: yet all the notice which the public took of this enormity, even at such a pulley court, was to enact, That no man could afterwards be questioned for his conduct in parliament. This prohibition, however, must be supposed to extend only to the en went to foreign traders; and, in the year 1517, being moved by the seditions of some of Dr. Bele, and the intrigues of Lincoln, a broker, they raised an insurrection in the city itself. They early rose in London, by breaking open the prisons, where some persons were confined for insulting foreigners. They next proceeded to the house of Mestus, a Frenchman, much hated by them; where they committed great disorders; killed several of the household, and burnt his house. The mayor could not appease them; nor Sir Thomas More, late under-sheriff, though much respected in the city. They also threatened Cardinal Wolsey with some insult; and he threatened to send a committee to the provincial town, and return himself on his guard. Tired at last with these disorders, they dispersed themselves; and the Earls of Shrewsbury and Surrey seized some of them. A proclamation was issued, that women should not meet together to babble and talk, and that all men should keep their wives in their houses. Next day, the Duke of Norfolk came into the city, at the head of thirteen hundred armed men, and made inquiry into the tumult. Bele and Lincoln, and several others, were sent to the Tower, and confined for treason. Lincoln and thirteen more were executed. The other criminals, to the number of four hundred, were brought before the king, with ropes about their necks, fell on their knees, and cried for mercy; and Henry, in his own name, was pleased to pardon; be dismissed them without further punishment.

So great was the number of foreign artisans in the city, that, at least, fifteen thousand Flemings alone were, at one time or another, in London. It was the ambition of the state, or at least of the state, to keep the city poor. Henry became jealous of their favour for queen Catherine; Henry himself confesses, in an edict of the star-chamber, printed amongst the statutes, that the foreigners starved the natives; and obliged them, from idleness, to have recourse to theft, murder, and other enormities. He also asserts, that the vast multitude of foreigners raised the price of grain and bread. And to prevent an increase of the evil, all foreign merchants were prohibited from having above two foreigners in the same house, either by themselves, or domestics. A lea jealously arose against the foreign merchants; and, to appease it, a law was enacted, obliging all denizens to pay the duties imposed upon aliens. The parliament had done better, to have encouraged foreign merchants and artisans to come over in greater numbers to England; which might have excited the emulation of the natives, and have improved their skill. The prisoners in the kingdom for debts and crimes are asserted, in an act of parliament, to be sixty thousand persons and above; which is scarcely credible. Harrison asserts, that 72,000 criminals were executed during this reign, for theft and robbery, which would amount to 20,000 annually. As he adds, that in the last year of Elizabeth's reign, there were not above 400 in a year: it appears, that in all England, there are not at present 50 executed for those crimes. If these facts be just, there has been a great improvement in morals since the reign of Henry VIII. That this improvement has been chiefly owing to the increase of industry and of the arts, which have given maintenance, and which is almost of equal importance, occupation, to the lower classes.

There is a remarkable clause, in a statute passed near the beginning of this reign, by which we might be induced to believe, that England was extremely decayed from the flourishing condition which it had attained in preceding times. It had been in the reign of Edward VI, that no magistrate, in town or borough, who by his office ought to keep peace, should, during the continuance of his magistracy, sell, either in wholesale or retail, any wine or venison. The apprehension of this statute, in order to prevent fraud or private views in fixing the assize; yet the law is repealed in this reign. The reason assigned is, that, since the making of that statute and ordinance, many and the most part of all the cities, boroughs, and towns corporates, have been reduced into the state of decay, and are not inhabited by merchants, and men of such substance, as at the time of making that statute: for at this day the dwellers and inhabitants of the same cities and boroughs are commonly bakers, vintners, fishmongers, and other victuallers, and there remain few others to bear the expense; so that many are prone to exalt past times above the present, that it seems dangerous to credit this reasoning of the parliament, without further evidence to support it. So different are the views in which the same object appears, that some may be inclined to draw an opinion adverse to the regular policy established in the reign of Henry VIII. than in a former period, and a stricter administration of justice; an advantage which induced the men of landed property to leave their towns and become proprietors of country houses. Wolsey, in a speech to parliament, represented it as a proof of the increase of riches, that the customs had increased beyond what they were formerly.

But if there were really a decay of commerce, and industry, and population, in England, the statutes of this reign, except by abolishing monasteries, and restraining holidays, circumstances of considerable moment, were not, in other respects, well calculated to remedy the evil. The fixing of the wages of artificers was attempted: 3 luxury in apparel was prohibited by repeated statutes; and probably without effect. The chancellor and other ministers were empowered to fix the price of poultry, cheese, and butter. A statute was even made that tin, copper, lead, or iron, should be sold at a halfpenny a pound; mutton and veal at a halfpenny a farthing, moneys of that age. The previous, that these four species of butcher's meat were the food of the poorer sort. This act was afterwards repealed. The practice of depopulating the country, by abandoning tillage, and throwing the lands into pasture, was continued; 4 as appears by the new laws which were, from time to time, enacted against that practice. The king was entitled to half the rents of the land, where any farmhouses were allowed to fall to decay. 5 The unskilful husbandry was probably the cause why the proprietors found no profit in tillage. The number of sheep allowed to be kept in one flock was restrained to two thousand. Sometimes, says the statute, one proprietor, or farmer, would keep a flock of twenty-four thousand. It is remarkable, that the parliament ascribes the increasing price of mutton to this increase of sheep: because, say they, the commodity being gotten into few hands, the price of it is raised at pleasure. 6 It is more probable that the effect proceeded from the daily increase of money: for it seems almost impossible that such a commodity could be engrossed.

In the year 1544, it appears that an acre of good land in Cambridgeshire, which was let at a little above a shilling, was raised to five shillings in the acre. It was raised to five shillings in the acre, by the increase of revenues and the increasing expense of our present money. 7 This is ten times cheaper than the usual rent at present. But commodities were not above four times cheaper: a presumption of the bad husbandry in that age. Some laws were made with regard to beggars and vagrants; one of the circumstances in government which humanity would most powerfully recommend to a benevolent legislator; which seems, at first sight, the most easily adjusted; and which is yet the most difficult to settle in such a manner as to attain the end without destroying industry. The convicts formerly were a support to the poor; but at the same time tended to encourage idleness and beggary.

In 1546, a law was made for fixing the interest of money at 10 per cent.; the first legal interest known in England. Formerly all loans of that nature were regarded as usurious. The reason of this statute is, that it treats the interest of money as illegal and criminal: and the pretexts still remained so strong, that the law permitting interest was repealed in the following reign.

This reign, as well as many of the foregoing and even subsequent reigns, is abound with monopolizing laws, confining particular manufactures to particular towns, or excluding the open country in general. There remain still too many traces of similar absurdities. In the subsequent reign, the corporations which had been opened by a former law, and obliged to admit tradesmen of different kinds, were again shut up by act of parliament; and every one was prohibited from exercising any trade, who was not of the corporation.

Henry, as he possessed himself some talent for letters, was an encourager of them. He founded Trinity College in Cambridge, and gave it ample endowments. Wolsey founded Christ Church in Oxford, and intended to call it Cardinal College: but upon his fall, which happened before he had entirely finished his scheme, the king seized all the revenues; and this, with all the other misfortunes of that minister, is said to have given him the greatest concern. But Henry afterwards restored the revenues of the college, and only changed the name. The cardinal founded in Oxford the first chair for teaching Greek; and this novelty rent that university into violent factions, which frequently came to blows. The students divided themselves into parties, which bore the names of Greeks and Trojans, and was as frequent as an animosity as was formerly exercised by those hostile nations. A new and more correct method of pronouncing Greek being introduced, it also divided the Grecians themselves into parties; and it was remarked, that the churchmen who approved the former pronunciation, the protestants gave countenance to the new. Gardiner employed the authority of the king and council to suppress innovations in this particular, and to prevent the students from using the Greek Alphabet. So little liberty was then allowed of any kind! The penalties inflicted upon the new pronunciation were no less than whipping, degradation, and expulsion; and the bishop declared, that rather than permit the liberty of innovating in the pronunciation of the Greek alphabet, it would be better that the language itself were totally banished the universities. The introduction of the Greek language into Oxford excited the emulation of Cambridge. Wolsey intended to have enriched the library of his college; but being at Oxford with copies of all the manuscripts that were in the Vatican, the countenance given to letters by this king and his ministers contributed to render learning fashionable in England: England, which speaks with great satisfaction of the general regard paid by the nobility and gentry to men of knowledge. It is needless to be particular in mentioning the writers of this reign, or of the preceding. There is no man of that age who has not at least been mentioned among our classics. Sir Thomas More, though he wrote in Latin, seems to come the nearest to the character of a classical author.

CHAP. XXXIV.

EDWARD VI.

A.D. 1547.

The late king, by the regulations which he imposed on the government of his infant son, the king, that was to be so frail, had so great an interest in the safety of which the succession had projected to reign even after his decease; and he imagined that his ministers, who had always been so obsequious to him during his lifetime, would never afterwards depart from the plan which he had traced out to them. He fixed as well as by the limitations of the succession, projected to reign even after his decease; and as Edward was then only a few months past nine, he appointed sixteen counsellors; to whom, during the minority, he entrusted the government of the king and kingdom. Their names were, Cranmer, Archishop of Canterbury; Lord Wriothesley, chancellor; Lord St. John, great master; Lord Russell, privy seal; the Earl of Hertford, chamberlain; Viscount Lisle, admiral; Tostal Bishop of Durham; Sir Anthony Brown, master of horse; Sir William Paget, secretary of state; Sir Edward North, chancellor of the court of augmentations; Sir Edward Montague, chief justice of the common pleas; Budge, tiller of the marches; Sir Thomas Herbert, chief gentlemen of the privy chamber; Sir Edward Wotton, treasurer of Calais; Dr. Wotton, Dean of Canterbury. To these executors, with whom was intrusted the government, the regal authority, were added a number of other counsellors, who possessed no immediate power, and could only assist with their advice when any affair was laid before them. The council was composed of the Earls of Arundel and Essex; Sir Thomas Cheney, treasurer of the household; Sir John Gascoigne, controller; Sir Robert Paget, vice-chancellor; Sir William Petre, secretary of state; Sir Richard Rich, Sir John Baker, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Seymour, Sir Richard Southwell, and Sir Edmund Pocham. The usual caprice of Henry appears somewhat in this nomination; while he appointed several persons of inferior station among his executors, and gave only the place of counsellor to a person of such rank as the Earl of Arundel, and to Sir Thomas Seymour, the king's uncle.

But the first act of the executors and counsellors was to depart from the distant restraints of the regency. They proceeded to the transference of every office which they believed their predecessors had been able to fill, as well as to the transference of every office which they believed their predecessors had been able to fill, as well as to the establishment of the church, which was already in a state of desolation. The king, who was then but a boy, did not resist the wishes of his regency; and as they were, in the opinion of the prelates and people, a body of men totally unlike to be the guides of a young prince, they appeared to be exercised in their office with some approbation. Sir Thomas Wotton, the lay bishop, was at first partial to them; but he was afterwards struck with their inability to do any good. The king's uncle was banished from court; and his place was filled by Sir Edward Wotton, the treasurer. The young king was then so immersed in the business of the regency, that he neither had time to think of anything else, nor even the power of exercising his will; for that was divided among the council. The business of the regency was in the hands of the commencement of the reign, and the measures which were executed, were all approved by the king. The counsellors, who were not of the most active spirit, and who were resolved to devote their lives in an great measure upon himself. He opposed, therefore, the proposal of choosing a protector; and represented that innovation as an infringement of the late king's will, which, being corroborated by act of parliament, ought to be observed as the law to them, and could not be altered but by the same authority which had established it. But he seems to have stood alone in the opposition. The counselors and counsellors were mostly courtiers who had been raised by Henry's favor, not men of high birth or great hereditary influence; and as they had been sufficiently accustomed to submission during the reign of the late monarch, and had no pretensions to govern the nation by their own authority, they acquiesced more willingly in a proposal which seemed calculated for preserving public peace and tranquillity. It being therefore agreed to name a protector, the choice fell of course on the Earl of Hertford, who was the king's maternal uncle, was strongly interested in his safety; and, possessing no claims to interest the crown, could never have any separate interest, which might lead him to endanger Edward's person or his authority. The public was informed by proclamation of this change in the administration; and despatches were sent to all foreign courts to give them information of it. All those who were possessed of any office resigned their former connections, and accepted new ones in the name of the young king. The bishops themselves were constrained to make a like submission. Care was taken to insert in their new commissions, that they held their offices during pleasure; and it is there expressly affirmed that all manner of authority and jurisdiction, as well ecclesiastical as civil, is originally derived from the crown. The executors, in their next measure, showed a more submissive deference to Henry's will; because many of them found their account in it. The late king had intended, when he had restored nobility, in order to supply the place of those peers which had fallen by former attainders, or the failure of issue; and that he might enable the new peers to support their dignity, he had resolved either to bestow estates on them, or advance them to higher offices. He had even gone so far as to inform them of this resolution; and in his will he charged his executors to make good all his promises, which had been given in the most amicable manner, Sir William Paget, Sir Anthony Denny, and Sir William Herbert, with whom Henry had always conversed in a familiar manner, were called before the board of regency; and having given evidence of what they knew concerning the king's promises, their testimony was relied on, and the executors proceeded to the fulfilling of these engagements. Hertford was created Duke of Somerset, marquess and lord treasurer; Wenceslas, Earl of Southampton; the Earl of Essex, Marquis of Northampton; Viscount Lisle, Earl of Warwick; Sir Thomas Seymour, Lord Seymour of Sidley, and admiral; Sir Richard Rich, Sir William Willoughby; and Sir Edward Hillary, chief justice of the court of king's bench. Several to whom the same dignity was offered, refused it; because the other part of the king's promise, the bestowal of estates on these new noblemen, was deferred till a more convenient time. Sir Edward Hillary, as an executive, the Somerset the protector, were, in the mean time, endowed with spiritual preferments, deaneries, and prebends. For, among many other invasions of ecclesiastical privileges and jurisdictions, it was thought that following spiritual benefits on laymen began now to prevail.

The Earl of Southampton had always been engaged in an opposite party to Somerset; and it was not likely that faction, which had secretly prevailed, even during the arbitrary reign of Henry, should be suppressed in the weak administration that usually attends a minority. The former nobleman, that he might have the greater leisure for attending to public business, bad, of himself and from his own authority, put the greater credit in commission, and had empowered four lawyers, Southwell, Tregonol, Oliver, and Bellasis, to execute, in his absence, the office of chancellor. This measure seemed very exceptionable, and the more so, as two of the commissioners being the same lawyers suspected that, by this nomination, the chancellor had intended to discredit the common law. Complaints were made to the council, who, influenced by the protector, gave orders that the chancellor should be summoned. They consulted the judges with regard to so unusual a case, and received for answer, that the commission was illegal, and that the chancellor, by his presumption in granting it, had justly forfeited the great seal, and was even liable to punishment. The council summoned him to appear before them. He maintained, that he held his office by the late king's will, founded on an act of parliament, and could not lose it without a trial so parliament; that if the commission which he had granted were found illegal, it might be cancelled, and all the ill consequences of it be easily remedied; and that the depriving him of his office for an error of this nature, was a precedent by which any other injuries might be committed on him. But still further assurance was given.

On presence that the whole of the council, without choosing him protector, was not a sufficient foundation for his authority, he procured a patent from the young king, by which he entirely overthrew the will of Henry VIII., and produced a total revolution in the government, and may seem even to have overthrown all the laws of the kingdom. He named himself Protector with full regal power, and appointed a council consisting of all the former councillors, and all the executors, except Southampton. He reserved a power of naming any other council of late at pleasure: and he was bound to consult with such only as he thought proper. The protector and his council were likewise empowered to act at discretion, and to execute whatever they deemed for the public service, without incurring any penalty or forfeiture from any law, statute, proclamation, or ordinance whatsoever. Eten had this patent been more moderate in its concessions, and had it been drawn by directions from the executors appointed by Henry, the legality might have been questioned; since it seems essential to a trust of this nature to be exercised by the persons intrusted, and not to admit of a delegation to others: but as the patent, by its very tenor, where the executors are not so much as mentioned, appears to have been surreptitiously obtained from a minor king, the protectorship of Somerset was a plain usurpation, which it is impossible by any arguments to justify. The confidence, however, of the executors, and their present acquiescence in the new establishment, made it be universally submitted to; and as the young king discovered an extreme attachment to his uncle, who was also in the main a man of moderation and probity, no objections were made to his protectorate. Several, on the contrary, were made on the ground of true, that the known division by the religious zeal of the opposite sects, deemed it the more necessary to intrust the government to one person, who might check the exorbitance of faction, and restore the public tranquillity. And though some clauses of the patent seemed to imply a formal subversion of all limited government, so little jealousy was then usually entertained on that head, that no exceptions were made. Nor were claims or pretensions of this nature, advanced by any person possessed of sovereign power. The actual exercise alone of arbitrary administration, and that in many, and great, and flagrant, and unpopular instances, was able sometimes to give some alarm to the nation.

The extensive authority and imperious character of Henry had retained the partisans of both religions in subjection; but, upon his demise, the hopes of the protestants, and the fears of the catholics, began to revive, and the zeal of these parties produced every where disputes and animosities, the usual preludes to more fatal divisions. The protector had long been regarded as a secret partisan of the reformation; and, being made reconciled to all, from restraint, he scrupled not to discover his intention of correcting all abuses in the ancient religion, and of adopting still more of the protestant innovations. He took care that all persons who had been attached to the old church might be attached to the same principles; and as the young prince discovered a zeal for every kind of literature, especially the theological, far beyond his tender years, all men foresaw, in the course of his reign, the total abolition of the catholic faith in England; and they early began to declare themselves in favour of those tenets which were likely to become in the end entirely prevalent. After Southampton's fall, few members of the council seemed to retain any attachment to the Romish communion; and most of the counsellors appeared even sanguine in forwarding the progress of the reformation. The riches which most of them had acquired from the spoils of the clergy, induced them to the new religion; but the council of England and Rome; and by establishing a contrariety of speculative tenets, as well as of discipline and worship, to render a coalition with the mother church altogether impracticable. Their reputation, in the chief seats of religious spirit, was excited by the prospect of pillaging the secular, as they had already done the regular, clergy; and they knew that while any share of the old principles remained, or any regard to the ecclesiasties, they could never hope to succeed in that way.

The numerous and burdensome superstitions with which the Romish church was loaded, had thrown many of the reformers, by the spirit of opposition, into an enthusiastic strain of devotion, and all arts, corruptions, pomp, order, and exterior observances, were zealously proscribed by them, as hindrances to their spiritual contemplations, and obstructions to their immediate converse with heaven. Many circumstances concurred to inflame this during spirit; the novelty itself of their doctrines, the triumph of making proselytes, the furious persecutions to which they were exposed, their animosity against the ancient tenets and practices, and the necessity of procuring the concurrence of the laity, by depressing the literate by, and tendering to them the plunder of the ecclesiastics. Wherever the Reformation prevailed over the opposition of civil authority, this genius of religion appeared in its full extent, and the futility of all the tenets, which, though less durable, were, for some time, not less dangerous than those which were connected with the ancient superstition. But as the magistrate took the lead in England, the transition was more gradual; much of the ancient reign was preserved; and a reasonable degree of subordination was retained in discipline, as well as some pomp, order, and ceremony in public worship.

The protector, in his schemes for advancing the Reformation, made always recourse to the counsels of Cranmer, who, being a man of moderation and prudence, was averse to all violent changes, and determined to bring over the people, by insensible innovations, to that system of doctrine, discipline, and worship, which he deemed perfect. He probably also foresaw that a system, which carefully avoided the extremes of reformulation, was likely to be most lasting; and that a devotion, merely spiritual, with which the first fervour of new sects, so often upon the relaxation of these, naturally gave place to the meads of superstition. He seems, therefore, to have intended the establishment of a hierarchy, which, being supported, instead of being set up, would stand as an perpetual barrier against Rome, and might retain the reverence of the people, even after their enthusiastic zeal was diminished, or entirely evaporated.

Opposed with greatest authority, any further advances towards reformation, was Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester; who, though he had not obtained a place in the council of regency, on account of late discoveries which had been made against him to Henry, was enticed by his age, experience, and capacity, to the highest trust and confidence of his party. This prelate still continued to magnify the great wisdom and learning of the late king, which, indeed, were generally and sincerely revered by the nation; and he insisted on the prudence of persevering, at least till the young king's majority, in the ecclesiastical model established by that great monarch. He defended the use of images, which were vigorously attacked by the new sects; and he persuaded them as serviceable in maintaining a sense of religion among the illiterate multitude. He even designed to write an apology for holy water, which Bishop Ridley had spoken against in a sermon; and he maintained that, by the power of the Almighty, it might be rendered an instrument of doing good; as much as the shadow of St. Peter, the hem of Christ's garment, or the spitile and clay laid upon the eyes of the blind. Above all, he insisted, that the laws ought to be observed, that the constitution ought to be preserved inviolate, and that it was dangerous to follow the will of the sovereign, in opposition to an act of parliament.

But though there remained at that time in England an idea of laws and a constitution, sufficient at least to furnish a topic of argument to such as were discontented with any immediate exercise of authority, this plea could scarcely, in the present case, be maintained with any plausibility by Gardner. An act of parliament had invested the crown with a legislative power; and royal proclamations, even during a minority, were armed with the force of law. The ancient bishops, having been deprived of their jurisdiction, and suspended, during the interval, the jurisdiction of the bishops, he appointed a general visitation to be made in all the dioceses of England. The visitors consisted of a mixture of clergy and laymen, and had six circuits assigned them. The chief purport of their instructions was, besides correcting improprieties and irregularities in the clergy, to abolish the ancient superstitions, and to bring the discipline and worship somewhat nearer the practice of the reformed churches. The moderation of Somerset and Cranmer is apparent in the conduct of this delicate affair. The visitors were enjoined to retain for the present all images which had not been abjured by the parish church, and to instruct people not to despise such ceremonies as were not yet abrogated, but only to beware of some particular superstitions, such as the sprinkling of their beds with holy water, the wearing of consecrated candles, or the use of consecrated banners, in order to drive away the devil.

But nothing required more the correcting hand of authority than the abuse of preaching, which was now generally propagated, throughout England, in defending the ancient practices and superstitions. The court of Synod, in order to ease the exchequer of the annuities paid to monks, had commonly placed them in the vacant churches; and these men were fed by interest, as well as by incensation from this source; for so much was necessary for the profit of the clergy. Orders therefore were given to restrain the topics of their sermons: twelve homilies were published, which were enjoined to read to the people; and those who ventured to expound the most pure and ancient principles, were denied permission, from preaching anywhere but in their parish churches. The purpose of this injunction was to throw a restraint on the catholic divines; while the protestants, by the grace and privilege of the present, should be allowed unbounded liberty.

Bonner made some opposition to these measures; but soon after retracted and acquiesced. Gardiner was more high-spirited and tenacious. He represented the peril of perpetual innovations, and the necessity of adhering to some system. "'Tis a dangerous thing," said he, "to use too much freedom in researches of this kind. If you cut the old and sacred, you are to think that to water is apt to have a mind to. If you indulge the humour of novelty, you cannot put a stop to people's demands, nor govern their indulgences at pleasure." "For my part," said he, on another occasion, "my sole concern is, to manage the third and last part of my life with decency, and to make a handsome exit off the stage. Provided this point is secured, I am not solicitous about the rest. I am already by nature confirmed to death: no man can give me a pardon from this sentence; nor so much as beg me a reprieve. To speak my mind, and to act as my conscience directs, are two branches of liberty which I can never part with. Sincerity in speech, and integrity in action, are entertained by me as the first of all the principles. For the thing else takes its leave; and I must not resign them upon any consideration. The best on it is, if I do not throw them away myself, no man can force them from me; but if I give them up, then I am ruined by myself, and deserve to lose all my preferences." This opposition of Gardiner drew on him the indignation of the council; and he was sent to the Fleet, where he was used with some severity.

One of the chief objections urged by Gardiner against the new homilies, was, that they defined, with the most metaphysical precision, the doctrines of grace, and of justification by faith; points, he thought, which it was superfluous for any man to know exactly, and which certainly much exceeded the comprehension of the vulgar. A famous martyrologist calls Gardiner, on account of this opinion, "an insensible ass, and one that had no feeling of God, nor had any power of the principal demonstration." The meanest protestant imagined, at that time, that he had a full comprehension of all these mysterious doctrines, and he heartily despised the most learned and knowing person of the other; that was not acquainted by himself, and had no acquaintance with regard to them. It is indeed certain, that the reformers were very fortunate in their doctrine of justification, and might venture to foretell its success, in opposition to all the ceremonies, old and superstitious, of the church; by exalting Christ and his sufferings, and renouncing all claim to independent merit in ourselves, it was calculated to become popular, and coincided with those principles of panegyric and of self-abasement which generally have place in religion.

Tonstal, Bishop of Durham, having, as well as Gardiner, many of the more solemner public protests, was despaired of; but no further severity was, for the present, exercised against him. He was a man of great moderation, and of the most unexceptionable character in the kingdom.

The same religious zeal which engaged Foreign affairs. Somerset to promote the Reformation at home, led him to carry his attention to foreign countries; where the interests of the protestants were now exposed to the most imminent danger. In such a policy so easy to be executed, that the legates soon found it rather necessary to interpose, in order to appease the animosity of the divines, and bring them at last to some decision.* The more difficult task for the legates was, to moderate or divert the zeal of the council for reformation, and to repress the ambition of the prelates, who desired to exalt the episcopal authority on the ruins of the sovereign pontiff. Finding this humour become prevalent, the legates, on pretence that the plague had broken out at Trent, transferred the sudden council to Bologna, where, they hoped, it would be more under the direction of his Holiness. For the emperor, no less than the Pope, had learned to make religion subservient to his ambition and policy. He was resolved to employ the imputation of heresy, as a pretence for subduing the protestant princes, and opposing the liberties of Germany; but found it necessary to cover his intentions under deep air, and to prevent the combination of his adversaries. He separated the Palatine and the Elector of Brandenburgh from the protestant conference: he took arms against the Elector of Saxony, and the Landgrave of Hesse; by the fortune of war, he made the former prisoner: he employed treachery and prevarication against the latter, and detained him captive, by breaking a safe-conduct which he had granted him. He suppressed the power of his half-sister, the Electress; he roused the German princes, who were astonished with his success, were further discouraged, by the intelligence, which they had received, of the death, at last, to Henry VIII., of the German princes, who were astonished with his success, were further discouraged, by the intelligence, which they had received, of the death, of the last, and of Francis II., their usual resources in every calamity.

Henry II., who succeeded to the crown of France, was a prince of vigour and abilities; but less hasty in his resolution than Francis, and less inflamed with rivalry and animosity against the emperor Charles. Though he sent ambassadors to the princes of the Smalandic league, and promised them protection, he was unwilling, in the commencement of his reign, to hurry into a war with so great a power as that of the emperor; and he thought that it all depended on his policy, of which he could at any time lay hold of.* He was much governed by the Duke of Guise and the Cardinal of Lorraine; and he hearkened to their counsel, in choosing rather to give instruction to his clergy, and to engage the multitude, of which he was by the last at the beginning of Henry VIII., had learned the lesson of the protection of the French monarchy.

The hatred between the two factions, the partisans of the ancient and those of the reformed religion, became every day more violent in Scotland; and the resolution, which the cardinal primate had taken, to employ the most rigorous punishments against the reformers, brought matters to a decision. There was one Wishart, a gentleman by birth, who employed himself with great zeal in preaching against the ancient superstitions, and began to give alarm to the clergy, who were justly terrified with the danger of some fatal revolution in the kingdom. This man was sent to Rome, in the purity of his morals, and for his extensive learning; but these praises cannot be much depended on; for we know, that, among the reformers, severity of manners supplied the place of talents, and virtues; and the age was in general so ignorant, that most of the priests in Scotland imagined the New Testament to be a composition of Luther's, and asserted, that the Old alone was the word of God.* But, however the case may have stood, with regard to those estimable qualities ascribed to Wishart, he was strongly possessed with the desire of innovation; and he enjoyed those talents which qualified him for becoming a popular preacher, and for setting the example of the multitude. The magistrates of Dun- de, where he exercised his mission, were alarmed by his progress; and being unable, or unwilling, to treat him with rigour, they contented themselves with denying him the liberty of preaching, and, in a manner, the bounds of their jurisdiction. Wishart, moved with indignation, that they had dared to reject him, together with the word of God, menaced them, in imitation of the ancient prophets, with some imminent calamity; and he withdrew to the west country, where he daily increased the number of his proles. Meanwhile, a plague broke out in Dundee; and all men exclaiming, that the town had drawn down the vengence of Heaven, hindered the pious preacher, and that the priesthood would never cease, till they had made him atone for their offence against him. No sooner did Wishart hear of this change in their dispossession of his mission, but he erected to his pulpit on the top of a gate: the infected stood within; the others without. And the preacher failed not, in such a situation, to take advantage of the imminent terror of the people, and to enforce his evangelical mission.*

The assiduity and success of Wishart became an object of attention to Cardinal Beaton; and he resolved, by the punishment of the recusant, to curb the zeal of the reformers, and to engage all into other innovators. He engaged the Earl of Both- well to arrest him, and to deliver him into his hands, contrary to a promise given by Bothwell to that unhappy man; and by a lettre de cachet, he was sent by the gale of mixture, to St. Andrews, where, after a trial, he condemned him to the flames for heresy. Arran, the governor, was irresolute in his temper; and the cardinal, though he had saved him, he, by concur in the condemnation and execution of Wishart. He determined therefore, without the assistance of the secular arm, to bring that heretic to punishment; and he himself beheld from his window the dismal spectacle. Wishart suffered with the usual patience; but could not forbear remarking the insulting envy. He fore- told that, in a few days, he should, in the same place, lie as low as now he was exalted aloft, in opposition to true piety and religion.

This prophecy was probably the immediate cause of the event which it foretold. The disciples of this martyr, enraged at the imposition of a cardinal; and having associated to them Norman Lesly, who was disgusted on account of some private quarrel, they conducted their enterprise with great secrecy and success. Early in the morning the enterprisers entered the cardinal's palace, which he had not yet fortified; and though they were not above sixteen persons, they thrust out a hundred tradesmen and fifty servants, whom they seized separately, before any suspicion arose of their intentions; and having shouldered their prey against the door, they proceeded deliberately to execute upon the cardinal their purpose on the cardinal. That prelate had been alarmed with the noise which he heard in the castle; and had barricaded the door of his chamber; but finding that the rioters for force their way, and having obtained, as is believed, a promise of life, he opened the door; and reminding them that he was a priest, he conjured them to spare him. Two of the assassins pressed upon him; but a third, James Melvill, more calm and more considerate in villany, stopped their career, and bade them reflect, that this sacrifice was the work and judgment of God, and ought to be attended with becoming deliberation and gravity. Then turning the point of his sword towards Beaton, he called to him, "Repent thee, thou wicked cardinal, of all thy sins and iniquities, especially of the murder of Wishart, that instrument of God for the conversion of these bands: it is his death which now cries vengeance upon thee: we are sent by God, to inflict the deserved punishment. For here, before the Almighty, I protest, that it is neither hatred of thy person, nor love of the diabolical portion of thy people, which moves me to seek thy death: but only because thou hast been, and still remainest, an obstinate enemy to Christ Jesus, and his holy gospel." Having spoken these words, without giving Beaton time to deliberate his resolution, to which he exhorted him, he thrust him through the body; and the cardinal fell dead at his feet. This murder was executed on the 26th of May, 1546. The assassins, being reinforced by the number of a hundred and forty persons, prepared themselves for the defence of the castle, and sent a messenger to London, craving assistance from Henry. That prince, though Scotland was comprehended in his peace with France, would not forego the opportunity of disturbing the government of a naval king; and he promised to take them under his protection.

It was the peculiar misfortune of Scotland, that five short reigns had been successively followed by as many long minorities; and the execution of justice, which the prince was beginning to introduce, had been continually interrupted by the cabals, factions, and animosities of the great. But, besides these innate and ancient evils, a new element had arisen that would destroy all these: the contents of theology, which were sufficient to disturb the most settled government; and the death of the cardinal, who was possessed of abilities and virtue, seemed much to affect the welfare of the dominion. A queen-dowager was a woman of uncommon talents and virtue; and she did as much to support the government, and supply the want of Arran, the governor, as could be expected in her situation.

The Protector of England, as soon as the news of the Caste state was brought to some composer, made preparations for war with Scotland; and he was determined to execute, if possible, that project, of uniting the two kingdoms by marriage, on which the looking had been so intent, and which he had recommended with his dying breath to his executors. He levied an army of 18,500 men, and equipped a fleet of sixty sail, on board of which he himself had embarked, armed with provisions and ammunition. He gave the command of the fleet to Lord Clinton: he himself marched at the head of the army, entered by the Earl of Warwick. These hosts were more successfully employed in revenging some depredations committed by the borderers: but besides that Somerset revived the ancient claim of the superiority of the English crown over that of Scotland, he refused to enter into negotiation on any other condition than the marriage of the young queen with Edward.

The protector, before he opened the campaign, published a manifesto, in which he enforced all the arguments for that measure. He said, that there seemed originally to have intended this island for one empire; and having cut it off from all communication with foreign states, and guarded it by the sea, he had pointed out to the inhabitants the danger, necessity, and importance of the education and customs of the people concerned with nature; and by giving them the same language, and laws, and manners, had invited them to a thorough union and concord: and to bring order and security; and thus had prepared an expedient by which they might become one people, without leaving any place for that jealousy, either of honour or of interests, to which rival nations are naturally attached: that the crown of Scotland had devolved on a female; that of England on a male; and happily the two sovereigns, as of a rank, were also of an age, the most suitable to each other: that the hostile dispositions which prevailed between the nations, and which arose from past injuries, would soon be extirpated, after a long and secure peace had established confidence between them; that the memory of former miseries, which at present inflamed their mutual animosity, would then serve only to make them cherish, with more passion, a state of happiness and tranquillity so long unknown to their ancestors: that when hostilities had ceased between the kingdoms, the Scottish nobility, who were at present engaged in the same wars, would learn to cultivate the arts of peace, and would soften their minds to a love of domestic order and obedience; that as this situation was desirable to both kingdoms, so particularly to Scotland, which had been exposed to the greatest miseries from intestine and foreign wars, and saw herself every moment in danger of losing her independence, by the efforts of a richer and more powerful people; that though England could change the state of her sovereign, she was willing to resign every pretension for the sake of future peace, and desired an union, which would be the more secure, as it would be concluded on terms entirely equal; and that, besides all these motives, positive engagements had been taken for completing this alliance; and the honour and good faith of the nation were pledged to fulfil what their interest and safety so loudly demanded.

Somerset soon perceived that these reminiscences had no influence; and that the queen dowager's attachment to France and to the Catholic religion would render ineffectual all negotiations for the intended marriage. He found himself, therefore, obliged to try the force of arms, and to carry the depredations of the English over to a measure, for which they seemed to have entertained the most incurable aversion. He passed the borders at Berwick, and advanced towards Edinburgh, without making any serious halt. But the Queen was willing to resign every pretension for the sake of future peace, and desired an union, which would be the more secure, as it would be concluded on terms entirely equal; and that, besides all these motives, positive engagements had been taken for completing this alliance; and the honour and good faith of the nation were pledged to fulfil what their interest and safety so loudly demanded.

Somerset in short set out on the 20th of June, 1547, to invade the borders. He met with no opposition from the English; except from the small castles which he obliged to surrender at discretion. The protector intended to have punished the governor and garrison of one of these castles for their temerity in resisting such unequal force: but they eluded his anger by asking only a few hours' respite, till they should prepare themselves for death; and after which they found his ears more open to their applications for mercy.

The governor of Scotland had summoned together the whole force of the kingdom; and his army, double in number to that of the English, had taken post on advantageous ground, guarded by the banks of the Esk, about four miles from Edinburgh. The Scottish army, under the eye of the English, had a perfect view of them. They were very confident of revenging some depredations committed by the borderers: but besides that Somerset revived the ancient claim of the supremacy of the English crown over that of Scotland, he refused to enter into negotiation on any other condition than the marriage of the young queen with Edward.

A. D. 1547.—CHAP. XXXIV.

The protector, before he opened the campaign, published a manifesto, in which he enforced all the arguments for that measure. He said, that there seemed originally to have intended this island for one empire; and having cut it off from all communication with foreign states, and guarded it by the sea, he had pointed out to the inhabitants the danger, necessity, and importance of the education and customs of the people concerned with nature; and by giving them the same language, and laws, and manners, had invited them to a thorough union and concord: and to bring order and security; and thus had prepared an expedient by which they might become one people, without leaving any place for that jealousy, either of honour or of interests, to which rival nations are naturally attached: that the crown of Scotland had devolved on a female; that of England on a male; and happily the two sovereigns, as of a rank, were also of an age, the most suitable to each other: that the hostile dispositions which prevailed between the nations, and which arose from past injuries, would soon be extirpated, after a long and secure peace had established confidence between them; that the memory of former miseries, which at present inflamed their mutual animosity, would then serve only to make them cherish, with more passion, a state of happiness and tranquillity so long unknown to their ancestors: that when hostilities had ceased between the kingdoms, the Scottish nobility, who were at present engaged in the same wars, would learn to cultivate the arts of peace, and would soften their minds to a love of domestic order and obedience: that as this situation was desirable to both kingdoms, so particularly to Scotland, which had been exposed to the greatest miseries from intestine and foreign wars, and saw herself every moment in danger of losing her independence, by the efforts of a richer and more powerful people; that though England could change the state of her sovereign, she was willing to resign every pretension for the sake of future peace, and desired an union, which would be the more secure, as it would be concluded on terms entirely equal; and that, besides all these motives, positive engagements had been taken for completing this alliance; and the honour and good faith of the nation were pledged to fulfil what their interest and safety so loudly demanded.

Somerset soon perceived that these reminiscences had no influence; and that the queen dowager's attachment to France and to the Catholic religion would render ineffectual all negotiations for the intended marriage. He found himself, therefore, obliged to try the force of arms, and to carry the depredations of the English over to a measure, for which they seemed to have entertained the most incurable aversion. He passed the borders at Berwick, and advanced towards Edinburgh, without making any serious halt. But the Queen was willing to resign every pretension for the sake of future peace, and desired an union, which would be the more secure, as it would be concluded on terms entirely equal; and that, besides all these motives, positive engagements had been taken for completing this alliance; and the honour and good faith of the nation were pledged to fulfil what their interest and safety so loudly demanded.

The governor of Scotland had summoned together the whole force of the kingdom; and his army, double in number to that of the English, had taken post on advantageous ground, guarded by the banks of the Esk, about four miles from Edinburgh. The Scottish army, under the eye of the English, had a perfect view of them. They were very confident of revenging some depredations committed by the borderers: but besides that Somerset revived the ancient claim of the superiority of the English crown over that of Scotland, he refused to enter into negotiation on any other condition than the marriage of the young queen with Edward.
would stipulate not to contrive the queen to any foreign prince, but to detain her at home till she reached the age of choosing a husband for herself. So moderate a demand was rejected by the Scots merely on account of its moderation; and it made them imagine that the protector must either enter on either side, or stand still; and they were confirmed in their fear, that he was now contented to abide so much of his former pretensions. Inflamed also by their priests, who had come to the camp in great numbers, they believed that the English were desirous, because of God, and exposed to divine vengeance; and that no success could ever crown their arms. They were confirmed in this fond conceit when they saw the protector change his ground, and move towards the sea; but he did not intend that he should be distinguished as the Irish archers, whom Argyle had brought over for this service.

Somerset was much pleased when he saw this movement of the Scottish army; and as the English had usually been defeated by the French, he made himself master of his opportunity. He ranged his van on the left, farthest from the sea; and ordered them to remain on the high grounds on which they placed them, till the enemy attempted to advance. He was impatient of battle; and his rear towards the right; and beyond the van was posted Lord Grey at the head of the men at arms, and ordered them to take the Scottish van in flank, but not till they should be engaged in close fight with the van of the English.

While the Scots were advancing on the plain, they were galled with the artillery from the English ships: the eldest son of Lord Graham was killed: the Irish archers were thrown into disorder; and even the other troops began to stagger: when Lord Grey, perceiving their situation, neglected his orders, left his ground, and at the head of his heavy-armed horse, made an attack on the Scottish infantry, in hopes of gaining all the honours of the victory. On advancing, he found a slough and ditch in his way; and behind were ranged the enemy armed with spears, and the field on which they stood was fallow ground, broken with ridges which lay across the front, and disordered the movements of the English cavalry. In the assault the shock of this body of horse was feeble and irregular; and as they were received on the points of the Scottish spears, which were longer than the lances of the English, they were easily dislodged and discomfited. Grey himself was dangerously wounded: Lord Edward Seymour, son of the protector, had his horse killed under him; the standard was near being taken; and had the Scots possessed any good body of cavalry, who could have pursued the advantage, the whole English army had been exposed to great danger.

The protector, meanwhile, assisted by Sir Ralph Sadler, and Sir Ralph Vane, employed himself with diligence and success in rallying the cavalry. Warwick showed great presence of mind in maintaining the ranks of the foot, on which the horse recoiled: he made Sir Peter Maitels advance, captain of the foot horsearchers, and Sir Peter Gamboa, captain of some Italian and Spanish horsearchers on horseback; and ordered them to ply the Scottish infantry with their shot. They matched to the slough and discharged their pieces full in the face of the enemy: the ships called them from the flank; the artillery, planted on a height, infested them from the front; the English archers poured in a shower of arrows upon them; and the vanguard, descending from the hill, advanced leisurely, and in great numbers. Among these circumstances, the Scottish van began to retreat: the retreat soon changed into a flight, which was begun by the Irish archers. The panic of the van communicated itself to the main body, and passing thence to the rear, rendered the whole field a scene of confusion, terror, flight, and consternation. The English army perceived from the heights the condition of the Scots, and began the pursuit with loud shouts and acclamations, which added still more to the dismay of the vanquished. The horse in particular, eager to revenge the front which they had received in the beginning of the day, did the most bloody execution on the flying enemy; and from the field of battle to Edinburgh, for the space of five miles, the whole ground was strewn with dead bodies; broken pikes above all, and the monks, received no quarter; and the English made sport of slaughtering men, who, from their extreme zeal and animosity, had engaged in an enterprise so ill befitting their profession. Few victories have been more decisive, or gained with smaller loss to the conquerors. There fell not two hundred of the English; and according to the most moderate computation, there perished above ten thousand of the Scots. About fifteen hundred were taken prisoners. This action was called the battle of Pinkie, from a nobleman's seat of that name in the neighbourhood.

The queen-dowager and Arran fled to Stirling, and were scarcely able to collect such a body of forces as could check the incursions of small parties of the English. About the same time, the Earl of Lenox and Lord War-ton entered the west marches, at the head of five thousand men, and proceeded to devastate over all the neighbouring counties. Had Somerset prosecuted his advantages, he might have imposed what terms he pleased on the Scottish nation: but he returned to England with some counsellors, and even his own brother, the admiral, were carrying on cabals against his authority. Having taken the castles of Ilum, Dunglass, Eymouth, For-bridge, Roxborough, and some other small places, having received the submission of some counties of the borders, he retired from Scotland. The fleet, besides destroying all the shipping along the coast, took Broughton in the Frith of Tay; and having fortified it, they left it a garrison. Arran desired leave to send commissioners in order to treat of a peace; and Somerset, having appointed Beefour for the place of conference, left Warwick with full powers to negotiate: but no commissioners were appointed from Scotland; nor agreed. The overthrow of the Scots was an article to gain time till succours should arrive from France.

The protector, on his arrival in England, summoned a parliament; and being some time after, what was talked of as an assurance against the Scots, he procured from his nephew a patent, appointing him to sit on the throne, upon a stool or bench, at the right hand of the king, and to enjoy the same honours and privileges that he usually enjoyed, as though he were his son, or his eldest brother, or uncle of the kings of England. In this patent the king employed his dispensing power, by setting aside the statute of precedence enacted during the former reign. But if Somerset gave offence by assuming too much power, he, on the other hand, deserved great praise on account of a parliament, in which the repeals of former statutes was much mitigated, and some security given to the freedom of the constitution. All laws were repealed which extended the crime of treason beyond the statute of the twenty-fifth of Edward III.; all laws enacted during the late reign extending the crime of felony; all the former laws against Lollardy or heresy, together with the statute of the Six Articles. None were to be accused for words, but within a month after they were spoken. By these repeals several of the most rigorous laws that ever had passed in England were annulled; and some dawn, both of civil and religious liberty, began to appear to the people. Hereby, however, was still a capital crime by the common law, and was subjected to the penalty of burning. Only there remained no precise standard by which that crime was to be defined or punished in a circumstance which might either be advantageous or harmful to public security, according to the disposition of the judges.

A repeal also passed of that law, the destruction of all laws, by which the king's proclamation was made of equal force with a statute. That other law likewise was mitigated, by which the king was empowered to annul every statute passed before the four-and-twentieth year of his age: be could prevent their future execution; but could not recall any past effects which had ensued from them.

It was also enacted, That all who denied the king's supremacy, or asserted the Pope's, should, for the first offence, be confined in the Tower, and suffer the pillory; for the second offence, should incur the penalty of a premonstrate; and for the third, be attainted of treason. But if, after the first of March ensuing, endeavoured, by writing, printing, or any other manner, to deprive the king of his estate or titles, particularly of his supremacy, or to confer them on any other, he was to be adjudged guilty of treason. If any of the lords of the crown should usurp upon another, or endeavour to break the order of succession, it was declared treason in them, their aiders and abettors. These were the most considerable acts passed during this session. The members in general discovered a very passive disposition with regard to religion: some few appeared zealous for the Reformation: others secretly harboured a strong propensity to the catholic faith; but the greater part appeared willing to take any impression which they should receive from interest, authority, or the reqeusting faction.

The convocation met at the same time with the parliaments; and as it was found that their debates were at first cramped by the rigorous statute of the Six Articles, the king granted them a dispensation from that law, before it was put in practice by parliament. The lower house, as well as the house of peers, was heard in the same manner. Orders were issued by council, that candles should no longer be carried about on Candlemas-day, ashes on Ash-Wednesday, palms on Palm-Sunday, wafers for ancient religious practices, or new-termed superstitions; though it is fortunate for mankind when superstition happens to take a direction so innocent and inoffensive. The severe disposition which naturally attends all reformers, prompted likewise the council to abolish some gay and showy ceremonies which belonged to the ancient religion.

An order was also issued by the council for the removal of all images from the churches: an innovation which was much desired by the reformers, and which alone, with regard to the populace, amounted almost to a total change of the established religion. An attempt had been made to separate the use of images from their abuse, the reverence for it then regarded as the most important part of this design was found, upon trial, very difficult, if not wholly impracticable. As private masses were abolished by law, it became necessary to compose a new profession service; and the council went so far, in the preface which they prefixed to this work, as to leave the practice of auricular confession wholly indifferent. This was a prejudice to the entire alteration of that invention, one of the most powerful engines that ever was contrived for degrading the laity, and giving their spiritual guidance an entire ascendant over them. And it may justly be said, that though the priest's action, which attends confession, serves somewhat to ease weak minds from the immediate agonies of superstition, it operates only by enforcing superstition itself, and thereby preparing the mind for a more violent reliance on the religious ceremonies.

The people were at that time extremely distracted by the opposite opinions of their preachers; and as they were totally unable to judge of the reasons advanced on either side, and as the greater part either feared, or suffered, to escape the prison during pleasure; for the second offence, should incur the penalty of a premonstrate; and for the third, be attainted of treason. But if, after the first of March ensuing, endeavoured, by writing, printing, or any other manner, to deprive the king of his estate or titles, particularly of his supremacy, or to confer them on any other, he was to be adjudged guilty of treason. If any of the lords of the crown should usurp upon another, or endeavour to break the order of succession, it was declared treason in them, their aiders and abettors. These were the most considerable acts passed during this session. The members in general discovered a very passive disposition with regard to religion: some few appeared zealous for the Reformation: others secretly harboured a strong propensity to the catholic faith; but the greater part appeared willing to take any impression which they should receive from interest, authority, or the reqeusting faction.

The convocation met at the same time with the parliaments; and as it was found that their debates were at first cramped by the rigorous statute of the Six Articles, the king granted them a dispensation from that law, before it was put in practice by parliament. The lower house, as well as the house of peers, was heard in the same manner. Orders were issued by council, that candles should no longer be carried about on Candlemas-day, ashes on Ash-Wednesday, palms on Palm-Sunday, wafers for ancient religious practices, or new-termed superstitions; though it is fortunate for mankind when superstition happens to take a direction so innocent and inoffensive. The severe disposition which naturally attends all reformers, prompted likewise the council to abolish some gay and showy ceremonies which belonged to the ancient religion.

Scots to be subjected by foreigners, involved them in perpetual war with England, and left them no expedient by which they could continue the friendship of that powerful nation. It was answered, on the other hand, that the queen's presence was the very cause of war with England; that that nation would desert, when they found that their wishes were so small as to become altogether impracticable; and that Henry, being engaged by so high a mark of confidence, would take their sovereign under his protection, and use his utmost efforts to defend the kingdom. These arguments were aided by French gold, which was plentifully advanced among the nobles. The governor had a pension conferred on him of twelve thousand livres a year, received the title of Duke of Chateaulain, and obtained for his son the command of a hundred men at arms. And as the clergy dreaded the consequences of the English alliance, they seconded this measure with all the zeal and industry which either principle or interest could impel.

of insatiable ambition; arrogant, assuming, implacable; and though esteemed of superior capacity to the protector, he possessed not, to the same degree, the confidence and regard of the people. By his flattery and address, he had so insinuated himself into the good graces of the queen-dowager, that, forgetting her usual prudence and decency, she married him immediately upon the denounce of the king: insomuch, that had she soon proved pregnant, it might have been doubtfu to which husband the child belonged. The credit and riches of this alliance supported the ambition of the admiral; but gave unavailing to the Duchess of Somerset, who, unequipped as she was, the brother's wife should have the precedence, employed all her credit with her husband, which was too good, first to create, then to widen, the breach between the two brothers.

The first symptom of this misunderstanding appeared when the protector commanded the army in Scotland. Secretary Paget, a man devoted to Somerset, remarked, that Seymour was forming separate intrigues among the councillors; was corrupting by presents the king's servants; and even endeavouring, by improper indulgences and liberalties, to captivate the affections of the young monarch. Paget represented to him the danger of this conduct; desired him to reflect on the numerous enemies, whom the sudden elevation of their family had created; and warned him, that any disaffection between him and the protector would be irrecoverably lost, of effect the ruin of both. Finding the remonstrances of Paget were unheeded, and the young monarch to have been supplied with the clearest intelligence of the danger to Somerset, and engaged him to leave the enterprise upon Scotland unfinished, in order to guard against the attacks of his domestic enemies. In the ensuing parliament, the admiral's projects appeared still more formidable; he proposed to the king, as he had acquired many partisans, he made a direct attack upon his brother's authority. He represented to his friends, that formerly, during a minority, the office of protector in the kingdom had been kept separate from that of governor of the king's person; and that the present union of these two important trusts conferred on Somerset an authority which could not safely be lodged in any subject.

The young king was even prevailed on to write a solemn letter to the parliament, desiring that Seymour might be appointed his governor; and that nobleman had formed a party in the two Houses, by which he hoped to effect his purpose. The design was discovered before its execution; and some common friends were sent to remonstrate with him, but had so little influence, that he threw out many menacing expressions, and rashly threatened, that if he were thwarted in his attempts, he would make this parliament the blackest ever cast in England. Paget, the Secretary of State, sent for him to answer for this conduct; but he refused to attend: they then began to threaten in their turn, and informed him that the king's letter, instead of averting any thing to the execution of his wishes, was only a demonstration to him as a criminal enterprise, and be construed as a design to disturb the government, by forming a separate interest with a child and minor. They even let fall some menace of sending him to the Tower for his temerity; and the admiral, finding himself prevented in his design, was obliged to submit, and to desire a reconciliation with his brother.

The mild and moderate temper of Somerset made him willing to forget these enterprises of the admiral; but the ambition of that turbulent spirit could not be so easily appeased. His spouse, the queen-dowager, died in childbirth; but so far from regarding this as a check to his aspiring views, he grounded on it the scheme of a most extraordinary elevation. He made his addresses to the Lady Elizabeth, then in the sixteenth year of her age; and that princess, whom the hurry of business and the pursuits of ambition could not, in her more advanced years, discourse entirely from the tender passions, seems to have listened to the insinuations of a man who possessed every talent proper to captivate the affections of the fair. But as his proposals were not acceptable, he gave up all hopes of succession, if they married without the

It was apparent that, notwithstanding what is pretended, there must have been some defect in the evidence against Seymour, when such demands, founded on the plainest principles of law and equity, were absolutely rejected. We shall indeed conclude, if we carefully examine the charge, that many of the articles were general, and scarcely applicable to an equity; many others might be susceptible of a more favourable interpretation; and that, though, on the whole, Seymour appears to have been a dangerous subject, he had not advanced far in those treasonable projects imputed to him. The chief part of his actual guilt seems to have consisted in some unwarrantable practices in the admiralty, by which pirates were protected, and illegal impositions laid upon the merchants. But he was not proceeded against, at that time, an easy instrument of vengeance, to wit, the parliament; and needed not to give themselves any concern with regard either to the guilt of the persons whom they prosecuted, or to the evidence which would be produced against them. A session of parliament being held, it was to be solved to proceed against Seymour by bill of attainder; and the young king being induced, after much solicitation, to give his consent to it, a considerable weight was laid on his approbation. The matter was first laid before the Upper House; and several peers, rising up in their places, gave an account of what they knew concerning Lord Seymour's conduct, and his criminal words or actions. The court received as undoubted evidence; and though the prisoner had formerly engaged many friends and partisans among the nobility, no one had either the courage or the interest to assert or defend him, except in his defence, that the testimony against him should be delivered in a legal manner, and that he should be confronted with the witnesses. A little more scruple was made in the House of Commons; there were even some members who objected against the whole method of proceeding by bill of attainder passed in absence; and insisted that a formal trial should be given to every man before his condemnation. But when a message was sent to the House to proceed, and offering that the same narratives should be laid before them which had satisfied the peers, they were easily prevailed upon to acquiesce! The bill passed without any objection. Lord Seymour was beheaded on the 20th March. tradition, which so naturally takes place in all great innovations: and they flattered themselves that they had established nothing that was new, but had recovered, or rather added, what Christians might without scruple concur. The mass had always been celebrated in Latin; a practice which might have been deemed absurd, had it not been found useful to the ecclesiastics, that the king was indeed the head of the church, but not the council during a minority. Having declined to give full satisfaction on this head, he was sent to the Tower, and threatened with further effects of the council's displeasure.

These severities, being exercised on men possessed of office and authority, seemed, in that age, a necessary policy, in order to enforce a uniformity in public worship and discipline; but there were in it circumstances of allusion, derived from no origin but the bigotry of theologians; a malady which seems almost incurable. Though the protestant divines had ventured to renounce opinions, deemed certain during many ages, they regarded, in their turn, the new system as so certain, that they would suffer no contradiction with regard to it; and they were ready to burn in the same flames, from which they themselves had so narrowly escaped, even those that had the assurance to differ from them.

A commission, by act of council, was granted to the prime, and some others, to examine and search after all anaabaptists, heretics, or contrivers of the book of common prayer. The commissioners were empowered to impress and imprison, to impose pence on them; and to give them absoluteness: or, if these criminals were obstinate, to excommunicate and imprison them, and to deliver them over to the secular arm: and in the execution of this, they were so bound to observe the ordinary methods of trial; the forms of law were dispensed with; and if any statutes happened to interfere with the powers in the commission, they were overruled and abrogated by the council. Tradesmen in London were brought before these commissioners, and were accused of maintaining, among other opinions, that a man regenerate could not sin, and that, though the outward man might be perishing, the inward was alive in all the guilt. They were prevailed on to abjure, and were dismissed. But there was a woman accused of heretical pravity, called Joan Bocher, or Joan of Kent, who was so pernicious, that the commissioners could make no impression upon her. Her doctrine was, that Christ was not truly incarnate of the Virgin, whose flesh, being the outward man, was sinfully begotten, and born in sin; and consequently, he could take none of it, but the word; by the consent of all the heretics, which was all that was necessary. at last metamorphosed her to the flames. Some time after, a Dutchman, called Van Paris, accused of the heinous which has received the name of Arianism, was condemned to the same punishment. He suffered with so much satisfaction, that he hugged and caressed the fagots that were consuming him; a species of frenzy, of which there is more than one instance among the martyrs of that age.

These rigorous methods of proceeding soon brought the whole nation to a conformity, seeming or real, with the national doctrine and the national worship. The Lady Mary alone continued to adhere to the mass, and refused to admit the established mode of worship. When pressed and menaced on this head, she applied to the emperor; who, using his interest with Sir Philip Hobby, the English ambassador, procured her a temporary connivance from the council.

CHAP. XXXV.

A.D. 1549.

There is no abuse so great in civil Discourses of society, as not to be attended with a variety of personal consequences; and in the beginnings of reformation, the loss of these advantages is always felt very sensibly, while the benefit resulting from the change is the slow effect of time, and is seldom perceived by the bulk of a nation. Source any institution can be imagined less favourable, in the main, to the interests of mankind, than that of monks and friars; yet was it followed by many good effects, which, having consequently the suppression of monasteries, were much regretted by the people of England. The monks, always residing in their convents, in the centre of their estates, spent their money in the provinces and among their tenants, afforded a ready market for commodities, were a sure resource to the poor and indigent; and though their hospitality and charity gave but too much encouragement to idleness, and prevented the increase of public reicles, yet did it provide to many a relief from the extreme pressure of want and necessity. It is also observable, that, as the friars were limited by the rules of their institution to a certain mode of living, they had not equal motives for extortion with other men; and they wereadena by the law, as they were not in England, in Roman Catholic countries, the best and most indulgent landlords. The abbots and priors were permitted to give leases at an under-value, and to receive, in return, a large present from the tenant; in the same manner as is still practised by the bishops and colleges. But when the abbey-lands were distributed among the principal nobility and courtiers, they fell under a different management: the rents of farms were raised, while the tenants found not the same facility in disposing of the produce; the money was often spent in the capital; and the farmers, living at a distance, were exposed to oppression from their new masters, or to the still greater incapacity of the stewards. The arts of manufacture were much more advanced in other European countries than in England; and even in England these arts had much less success than the knowledge of a profession which, of all mechanical employments, requires the most reflection and experience. A great demand arose for wool both abroad and at home; pasture was found more profitable than unskilful tillage: whole estates were converted by enclosures into pastures as a useless burden, were expelled their habitations: even the cottagers, deprived of the commons on which they formerly fed their cattle, were reduced to misery: and a decay of manufactures, as well as the diminution of the former plenty, was remarked in the kingdom. This was now of an old date; and Sir Thomas More, alluding to it, observes in his Utopia, that a sheep had become in England a more venemous animal than a lion or wolf, and devoured whole villages, cities, and provinces.

The commercial system which had been practiced in Europe, after the discovery of the West Indies, had a tendency to inflame these complaints. The growing demand, in the more commercial countries, had heightened every where the price of commodities, which could easily be transported thither; but in England, the labour of men, who could not so easily change their habituation, still remained nearly at the ancient rates; and the poor complained that they could no longer gain a subsistence by their industry. It was by an addition alone of tax, and complying with such measures were enabled to procure a maintenance; and though this increase of industry was at last the effect of the present situation, and an effect beneficial to society, yet it was difficult for the people to shake off their former habits of indolence; and nothing but necessity could compel them to such an exertion of their faculties.

It must also be remarked, that the profusion of Henry VIII. had reduced him, notwithstanding the advantages to such difficulties, that he had been obliged to remedy a present necessity, by the pernicious expedient of debasing the coin; and the wars in which the protector had been engaged, had reduced them to carry goods and commodities at an abuse. The usual consequences ensued: the good specie was hoarded or exported; base metal was coined at home, or imported from abroad in great abundance; the common people, contented with their wages in it, could not purchase commodities at the usual rates; and a universal decay and stagnation of commerce took place; and loud complaints were heard in every part of England.

The protector, with loved popularity, and pitied the condition of the people, encouraged these complaints by his endeavours to redress them. He appointed a commission for making inquiry concerning enclosures; and issued a proclamation, ordering all late enclosures to be had open by a day's notice of the owner; and with such countenance from government, began to rise in several places, and to commit disorders; but were quelled by remonstrances and persuasion. In order to give them greater satisfaction, Somerset appointed new commissioners, whom he sent every where, with an unlimited power, to hear and determine all causes about enclosures, highways, and cottages. As this commission was disagreeable to the men and nobility, they endeavoured to make it as unprofitable and illegal; and the common people, fearing it would be cluded, and being impatient for immediate redress, could no longer contain their fury, but sought for a remedy by force of arms; this rising began at once in several parts of England, as if a universal conspiracy had been formed by the commonality. The rebels in Wiltshire were dispersed by Sir William Herbert; those in the neighbouring counties, Oxford and Gloucester, by Lord Gray of Wilton. Many of the rioters were killed in the field: others were executed by martial law. The commotions in Hampshire, Sussex, Kent, and other counties were quelled by severer expedients; but the disorders in Devonshire and Norfolk threatened more dangerous consequences.

The commonality in Devonshire began with the usual complaints against enclosures and against oppressions from the gentry. At Whalley, while priest or curate had the address to give their discontent a direction towards religion; and the delicacy of the subject in the present emergency made the ministers immediately suppress the formation. In Lancashire still further, but not closely united with government; but here many of them took part with the populace; among others, Humphry Arundel, governor of St. Michael's Mount. The rioters were brought into the form of a regular army, which amounted to 20,000 men; and the troops, after having been sent against them at the head of a small force; but finding himself too weak to encounter them in the field, he kept at a distance, and began to negotiate with them; and the tumult was at an end, by cluding their fury by delay, and of dispersing them by the difficulty of their subsisting in a body. Their demands were, that the state should be restored, half of the abbey-lands resumed, the law of the Six Articles executed, holy water and holy bread respected, and all other particular grievances redressed. The council, however, declined to discuss the remission of taxes, and the sending of regular troops, and promised them pardon upon their immediate submission. Enraged at this disappointment, they marched to Exeter; but he sent before them crosses, banners, holy water, candlesticks, and other emblems of Christianity, together with the host, which they covered with a canopy. The citizens of Exeter shut their gates; and the rebels, as they had no cannon, endeavoured to take the place, first by means of a mortar, and then by scaling, but without success. Russell, meanwhile, lay at Homiton till reinforced by Sir William Herbert and Lord Gray, with some German horse, and some Italian archers under Battista Spinola. He then resolved to attempt the relief of Exeter, which was now reduced to extremities. He attacked the rebels, drove them from all their posts, did great execution upon them both in the action and pursuit, and took many prisoners. Another leader, sent to London, tried and executed. Many of the inferior sort were put to death by martial law. The year of St. Thomas, one of the principal incendiaries, was hanged on the top of his own steeple, arrayed in his popish weeds, with his head upon his horse's neck. The insurrection in Norfolk rose to a still greater height, and was attended with greater acts of violence. The populace were at first excited, as in other places, by complaints against enclosures; but finding their numbers amount to twenty thousand, they grew insolent, and proceeded to more exorbitant pretensions. They required the suppression of the gentry, the placing of new councillors about the king, and the re-establishment of some of the ancient rights. One Ket, a tenant, had assumed the government over them, and he exercised his authority with the utmost arrogance and outrage. Having taken possession of Hovereld-hill near Norwich, he erected his tribunal under an old oak, thence called the oak of reformation; and summoning the gentry to appear before him, he gave such decrees as might be expected from his character and situation. The Marquis of Northampton was first ordered against him; but met with a repulse in an action where Lord Sheffield was killed. The protector affected popularity, and cared not to appear in person against the rebels; he therefore sent the Earl of Warwick at the head of a great army to the relief of Norwich; and he thereby afforded his mortal enemy an opportunity of increasing his reputation and character. Warwick, having tried some skirmishes with the rebels, at last made a general attack upon them, and put them to flight. Two thousand prisoners were taken at Norwich castle, nine of his followers on the boughs of the oak of reformation; and the insurrection was entirely suppressed. Some rebels in Yorkshire, learning the fate of their companions, accepted the offer of pardon, and threw down their arms. A general indemnity was soon after published by the protector.

But though the insurrections were thus at first made known to the Scots, and their leaders present in Scotland, and so numbers of them seemed to remain, they were attended with our interests in the nation. The forces of the Earl of Warwick, which might have been employed against Donald, were diverted from that enterprise; and the French general had leisure to reduce that county to some settlement and composure. He took the fortress of Broughly, and put the garrison to the sword. He straitened the English at Haddington; and though Lord Dacres was enabled to throw relief into the place, and to relieve the garrison, it was found at last very charged, and even impracticable, to keep possession of that fortress. The whole country in the neighbourhood was in commotion, and the English, and could afford no supply to the garrison:

the place lay above thirty miles from the borders; so that a regular army was necessary to escort such provisions thither: and as the plague had broken out among the troops, they perished daily, and were reduced to a state of great weakness. For these reasons, orders were given by the council to disband Hervey and his garrison at Berwick; and the Earl of Rutland, now created warden of the east marches, executed the orders.

The King of France also took advantage of the disturbances among the English, and made an attempt to recover Boulogne, that territory which Henry VIII. had conquered from France. On other pretences he assembled an army; and falling suddenly upon the Boulognois, took the castles of Sellefa perforated, and dislodged, though not supplanted with garrisons, ammunitions, and provisions. He endeavoured to surprise Boulogne, and was repulsed; but the garrison, not thinking the place tenable after the loss of the other fortresses, destroyed the works and retired to Boulogne. The rains, which fell in great abundance during the autumn, and a pestilential distemper which broke out in the French camp, deprived Henry of all hopes of success against Boulogne itself; and he ordered to Paris, left the command of the army to Gaspar de Coligny, Lord of Chatillon, so famous afterwards by the name of Admiral Coligny; and he gave him orders to form the siege early in the spring. The active disposition of this general engaged him to pursue the French, during the late insurrections against the place; but they all proved unsuccessful. Strozzi, who commanded the French fleet and galleys, endeavoured to make a descent on Jersey; but meeting there with an English fleet, he commenced an action which seems not to have been decisive, since the historians of the two nations differ in the account of the event. As soon as the French war broke out, the protector endeavoured to fortify himself with the alliance of the emperor; and he sent over Secretary Paet to Brussels, where Charles then kept court, in order to assist Sir Philip Hobby, the resident ambassador, in this negotiation. But that prince had formed a design of extending his dominions by the aid of the part of France of the Catholic religion; and though extremely desirous of securing the English alliance against France, his capital enemy, he thought it unsuitable to his other pretensions to enter into strict confederacy with a nation which had broken off all connexions with the church of Rome. He therefore declined the advances of friendship from England; and eluded the applications of the ambassadors. An exact account of this negociation is given in the letter of Hobby's; and it is remarkable that the emperor, in a conversation with the English ministers, asserted that the prerequisites of a King of England were more extensive than those of a King of France. Burnet, who preserves this letter, subjoins an observation, that in the one objection which the Scots made to marrying their queen with Edward was, that all their privileges would be swallowed up by the great prerogative of the kings of England. Somerset, despairing of assistance from the protector, was inclined to conclude a peace with France and Scotland; and besides that he was not in a condition to maintain such ruinous wars, he thought that there no longer remained any object of hostility. The Scots had sent away their queen; and could not, if ever so much inclin’d, complete the marriage contracted with Edward; and as Henry VIII. had stipulated to restore Boulogne in 1547, it seemed impracticable. In a letter of a few years, the execution of the treaty. But when he proposed these reasons to the council, he met with strong opposition from his enemies, who, seeing him unable to support the war, were determined, for that very reason, to oppose all proposals for a pacification. The protector ran high in the court of England; and matters were drawing to an issue fatal to the authority of the protector. After Somerset obtained the patent investing him with regular powers, the Scotch council paid no attention to the opinion of the other executors and counsellors; and being elated with his high dignity, as well as with his victory at Pimper, he thought that every one ought to yield every thing to his sentiments. All those who were not entirely devoted to him were sure to be neglected; whoever opposed his will received marks of anger or contempt; and while he showed a resolution to govern every thing, his capacity appeared not in any respect proportioned to his ambition. We shall see, however, that he made a conciliating and cautious exordium, and, having associated himself with Southampton, who had been re-admitted into the council, he formed a strong party, who were determined to free themselves from the slavery imposed on them by the protector.

The malcontent counsellors found the disposition of the nation favourable to their designs. The nobility and gentry were in general displeased with the prudence which Somerset seemed to have given to the people; and as they ascribed all the insults to which they had been lately exposed to his prostration, and to the countenance shown to the multitude, they apprehended a renewal of the same disorders from his present affectation of popularity. He had erected a court of requests in his own house for the relief of the people; and he interposed with the judges in their behalf; a measure which might be deemed illegal, if any other pretence could be brought against it. They might with certainty deserve that approbation. And this attempt, which was a stretch of power, seemed the more impolitic, because it disgusted the nobility, the surest support of monarchical authority.

But though Somerset courted the people, the interest which he had formed with them was in no degree answerable to his expectations. The cathedir party, who retained influence with the lower ranks, were his declared enemies, and took advantage of every opportunity to deride his conduct. The attenders and execution of his brother bore an odious aspect: the introduction of foreign troops into the kingdom was represented in invidious colours: their amusements were profane, and all that expense of the church and of the crown rendered him obnoxious; and the palace which he was building in the Strand, served by its magnificence, and still more by other circumstances, which attended it, to expose him to the censure of the public. The parish church of St. Mary, with three bishops' houses, was pulled down, in order to furnish ground and materials for this structure: not content with that outrage, an attempt was made to demolish St. Margaret's, Westminster, and to employ the stones to the same purpose: but the parishes rose in a tumult and chased away the protector's tradesmen. He then had his palace at St. Paul's church-yard, with a cloister and chapter house belonging to it; and these edifices, together with a church of St. John of Jerusalem, were made use of to raise his palace. What rendered the matter more odious to the people was, that the tombs and other monuments of the dead were defaced: and the bones, being carried away, were buried in unconsecrated ground.

All these imprudences were remarked by Somerset's enemies, who resolved to take advantage of them. Lord St. John, president of the council, the Earl of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five members more, met at Ely-house; and assuming to themselves the whole power of the council, began to act independently of the protector, whom they represented as the author of every public groan and misfortune. They wrote letters to the chief nobility and gentry of the realm, at the same time that of the progress, and requiring their assistance: they sent for the mayor and aldermen of London, and enjoined them to obey their orders, without regard to any contrary orders which they might receive from the Duke of Somerset. They then went, to the great indignation of the Tower, who expressed his resolution to comply with them. Next day, Rich, Lord Chancellor, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Shrewsbury, Sir Thomas Cheney, Sir John Gage, Sir Ralph Sadler, and Chief Justice Montague, founded on an act of parliament, was the only legal one; but composed chiefly of members who had formerly been appointed by Somerset, and who derived their seat from an authority which was now declared usurped and illegal. But such niceties were, during that age, little understood, and still less regarded in England.

A session of parliament was held; and as it was the usual maxim of that assembly to acquire in every possible way that authority which had been established, the council dreaded no opposition from that quarter, and had more reason to look for a corroboration of their authority. Somerset had been prevailed on to reconcile himself, on his knees, before the council, all the articles of charge against him; and he imputed these misdeemours to his own rashness, folly, and indiscretion, not to any malignity of intention. He even subscribed this confession; and the paper was given in to parliament, who, after sending a committee to examine him, and hear him acknowledge it to be genuine, passed a vote, by which they deprived him of all his offices, and fined him two thousand pounds a year in lord. Lord St. John was created treasurer in his place, and William Earl Marshal. The prosecution against him was carried no further. His fine was remitted by the king; he recovered his liberty; and Warwick, thinking that he was now free from all suspicion, and his mind lessened by his late tame and abject behaviour, re-admitted him into the council, and even agreed to an alliance between their families, by the marriage of his own son, Lord Dudley, with the Lady Jane Seymour, daughter of Somerset.

During this session a severe law was passed against riots. It was enacted, That if any to the number of twelve persons, should meet together for any matter of state, and being required by a lawful magistrate, should not disperse, it should be treason; and if any broke hedges, or violently pulled up poles about enclosures, without lawful authority, it should be felony: any attempt to kill a thief or a taker of game, or set a fieltri on a thief, or to receive stolen goods, was now made an act of treason.

The bishops had made an application, complaining that they were deprived of all their power, by the encroachments of the civil courts, and the present suspension of the canon law; that they could summon no offender before them, punish no vice, or exert the discipline of the church; from which diminution of their authority, they pretended, immorality had ever everywhere received great encouragement, and increase. The design of some was to revive the pontifical duties of the primitive church; but others thought, that such an authority, committed to the bishops, would prove more oppressive than confession, penance, and all the clerical immunities of the Roman superstition. The parliament, for the preservation of the government, were content with empowering the king to appoint thirty-two commissioners, to compose a body of canon laws, which were to be valid, though never ratified by parliament. Such implicit trust did they repose in the crown; without reflecting, that all their liberties and properties might be affected by these canons. The king did not live to affix the royal sanction to the new canons. Sir John Sharington, whose crimes and malversations had appeared so egregious at the condemnation of Lord Seymour, obtained from parliament a reversal of his attainder.

This man sought favour with the more zealous reformers; and Bishop Latimer affirmed, that though formerly he had been a most notorious knave, he was now so penitent that he had become a very honest man.

When Warwick and the council of regency began to exercise their power, they found themselves involved in the same difficulties and embarrassments that had embasset the protector. The wars with France and Scotland could not be supported by an exhausted exchequer; seemed dangerou to a divided nation; and an imperial war, and an imperial execution, had any object which even the greatest and most uninterrupted success could attain. The project of peace entertained by Somerset, had served them as a pretext for clamour against his administration; yet, after sending Sir Thomas Cheney to the empor, and making again a fruitless effort to engage him in the protection of Bouligne, they found his emissaries unsuspected, and illegal. It was now determined to have him made, by the canal of Guidotti, a Florentine merchant. The Earl of Bedford, Sir John Mason, Paget and Petro, were sent over to Bouligne, with full powers to negociate. The French king absolutely refused to pay the two millions of crowns which his subjects acknowledged to be due to the crown of England as arrears of pensions; and said that he never would consent to render himself tributary to any prince: but he offered the income of his dominion in Bouligne.

Bouligne was seized March 25th.
the difficulties upon him, and sending him new articles to subscribe. A last was selected of such points as they thought would be the hardest of digestion; and, not content with this, they also insisted on his submission, and the payment of a sum for an annuity of past errors. To make this subscription more mortifying, they demanded a promise, that he would recommend and publish all these articles from the pulpit; but Gardner, who saw that they intended to extend his ruin and discredit him, would not consent. He was not to gratify his enemies by any further compliance; he still maintained his innocence; desired a fair trial; and refused to subscribe more articles, till he should receive a warrant for the bishop. For this pretended offence, his bishopric was put under sequestration for three months; and as he then appeared no more compliant than before, a commission was appointed to try, or more properly, to condescend to him. The commissioners were, the prime, the Bishops of London, Ely, and Lincoln, Secretary Petre, Sir James Hales, and some other lawyers. Gardner objected to the legality of the commission, which was not founded on any statute or precedent; and he appealed from the commissioners to the king. His appeal was not regarded; sentence was pronounced against him: he was deprived of his bishopric, and committed to close custody in his books and papers were seized; he was sequestrated from all company; and it was not allowed him either to send or receive any letters or messages.

A.D. 1554.

Gardner, as well as the other prelates, had agreed to hold his office during the king's pleasure, only that the council had a mind to make use of a concession which had been so illegally and arbitrarily extorted, either to employ some forms of justice; a resolution which led them to commit still greater misdeeds and severities. But the violence of the reformers did not stop here. Day, Bishop of Chichester, Heath of Worchester, and Vossy of Exeter, were deprived of their bishoprics, on pretence of disobedience. Even Kitchen of Lincoln, of Salisbury, and Smyth of Coventry, though they had complied in every thing, yet not being supposed cordial in their obedience, were obliged to seek protection, by sacrificing the most considerable revenues of their see to the rapacious courtiers. The plunderers neglected not even smaller profits. An order was issued by council for purging the library at Westminster of all missals, legends, and other superstitious volumes; and delivering their furniture to Anthony Aucher. Many of these books were plated with gold and silver, and curiously embossed; and this finery was probably the superstition that condemned them. Great havoc was likewise made on the libraries at Oxford. Books and other works were destroyed; the volumes of divinity suffered for their rich binding; those of literature were condemned as useless; those of geometry and astronomy were supposed to contain nothing fit for a Christian. The unlearned, who had not the power to oppose these barbarous violences: they were in danger of losing their own revenues; and expected every moment to be swallowed up by the Earl of Warwick and his associates.

Though every one besides yielded to the authority of the council, the Lady Mary could never be brought to compliance; and she still continued to adhere to the mass, and to object the new liturgy. Her behaviour was, during some time, connived at; but at last, her two chaplains, Mallet and Berkeley, were thrown into prison; and remonstrances were made to the princess herself on account of her conduct and influence. The council wrote her a letter, by which they endeavoured to make her change her sentiments, and to persuade her that her religious faith was very ill grounded. They asked her what warrant there was in Scripture for the breakers in an unknown tongue, the use of images, for the substitution of the sacred: and they desired her to persuade St. Austin, and the other ancient doctors, who would convince her of the errors of the Romish superstition, and prove that it was founded merely on false miracles and lying stories. The Lady Mary remained obstinate against all this advice, and declared herself willing to endure death rather than renounce her religion: she only feared, she said, that she was not worthy to suffer martyrdom in so holy a cause; and forprotestant books, she thanked God, that as she never had, so she hoped never to read any of them. Dreading further violence, she endeavoured to make an escape to her kinsman Charles; but her design was discovered, she was not furnished with the necessary means; she trusted in her behalf, and even threatened hostilities, of liberty of conscience were refused her: but though the council, sensible that the kingdom was in no condition to support with courage a war, was not unprepared, they found great difficulty to overcome the scruples of the young king. He had been educated in such a violent abhorrence of the mass and other popish rites, which he regarded as impious and idolatrous, that he could not participate, he thought, in the sin, if he allowed its commission: and when, at last, the importance of Cranmer, Ridley, and Poore, prevailed somewhat over his opposition, he burst into tears; lamenting his sister's obstinacy, and bewailing his own hard fate, that he must suffer her to continue in such an abominable mode of worship.

The great object, at this time, of antipathy among the protestant party, was papists, both by profession, and engaging, the papists. Those they regarded as the common enemy, who threatened every moment to overwhelm the evangelical faith, and destroy its partisans by fire and sword: they had not as yet had leisure to attend to the other more important concerns of the state. Papists were regarded as the object of such furious quarrels and animosities, and they threw the whole kingdom into combustion. Several Lutheran divines, who had reputation in these days, Bucer, Faustus, and others, found a temporary shelter in England, from the persecutions which the emperor exercised in Germany; and they received protection and encouragement. John Alscas, a Polish nobleman, being a great friend to the beginnings of the Reformation, sought protection, and settled, during some time, at Emden in East Friesland, where he became preacher to a congregation of the reformed. Foreseeing the persecutions which ensued, he resolved to seek safety, and to engage, with him. The council, who regarded them as industrious useful people, and desired to invite over others of the same character, not only gave them the church of Augustine, but the exercise of other religions, but granted them a charter, by which they were erected into a corporation, consisting of a superintendent and four assisting ministers. This ecclesiastical establishment was quite independent of the church of England, and differed from it in many respects, without distinction.

These differences among the protestants were matter of triumph to the catholics, who insisted, that the moment men departed from the authority of the church, they lost all claim of truth and falsehood in matters of religion, and must be carried away by every wind of doctrine. The continual variations of every sect of protestants afforded them the same topic of reasoning. The book of Common Praver suffered in England a new renewal, and some rates and ceremonies, which had given offense, were omitted. The speculative doctrines, or the metaphysics of religion, were also reduced to forty-two articles. These were intended to obviate further divisions and variations; and the compiling of them had been postponed till the establishment of the liturgy, which was justly regarded as a more material object to the people. The eternity of hell torments is asserted in this confession of faith, and is also taken to extort from, not only that not heathen, how virtuous soever, can escape an endless state of the most exquisite misery, but also that every one who presumes to maintain that any pagan can possibly be saved, is himself exposed to the same danger. The ordinances of the church are now revised, and corrected. The theological zeal of the council, though seemingly fervent, went not so far as to make them neglect their own temporal concerns, which seem to have been uppermost in their thoughts: they even found leisure to attend... to the public interest; and, to the commerce of the nation, which was at that time very little the object of general study or attention. The trade of England had anciently been carried on altogether by foreigners, chiefly the inhabitants of the Hanse-towns, or Estrangers, as they were called; and in order to encourage these merchants to settle in England, they had been erected into a corporation by Henry III., had obtained a patent, were endowed with privileges by which they were exempt from all duties paid by others. So ignorant were the English of commerce, that this company, usually denominated the merchants of the Stil-yard, engaged, even down to the reign of Edward, almost the whole foreign trade of the kingdom. In the latter half of the fourteenth century, their navigation of their own country, the navigation of England was also in a very languishing condition. It was therefore thought, proper by the council to seek pretexts for annihilating the privileges of this corporation, privileges which put them nearly on an equal footing with Englishmen in the duties which they paid; and as such patents were, during that age, granted by the absolute power of the king, men were the less surprised to find them revoked by the same authority. Several remonstrances were made against this innovation by Lubec, Hamburg, and other Hanse-towns; but the council persevered in their resolution, and the good effect was, that some of the English merchants, under pretense of innocence, to the English merchants, by their very situation as natives, had advantages above foreigners in the purchase of cloth, wool, and other commodities; though these advantages had not hitherto been sufficient to raise their industry, or engage them to increase trade. But it was also then resolved, that when aliens' duty was also imposed upon all foreigners indiscriminately, the English were tempted to enter into commerce; and a spirit of industry began to appear in the kingdom.

About the same time a treaty was made with Gustavus Ericson, King of Sweden, by which it was stipulated, that if he sent bullion into England, he might export English commodities with ease, bound at such a price of bullion to no other prince; that if he sent oxen, steel, copper, &c. he should pay custom for English commodities as an Englishman; and that if he sent other merchandise, he should have free intercourse, paying custom as a stranger.

The bullion sent over by Sweden, though it could not be in great quantity, set the mint at work: good specie was coined; and much of the base metal formerly coined was recalled: a circumstance which tended extremely to the confidence of the nation.

But all these schemes for promoting Indian trade were likely to prove abortive, by the following apprehensions of domestic convulsions, arising from the ambition of Warwick. The dread of domestic convulsions, arising from the ambition of Warwick, and the jealousy of English merchants, with the station which he had attained, carried further his pretensions, and had gained partisans who were disposed to second him in every enterprise. The last Earl of Northumberland, his brother, had been attainted on account of the share which he had in the Yorkshire insurrection during the late reign, the title was at present extinct, and the estate was vested in the crown. Warwick now procured to himself a grant of those ample possessions, which lay chiefly in the North, the most warlike part of the kingdom; and he was dignified with the title of Duke of Northumberland. His friend, Sir John Somers, Lord Somers, was created, and the earldom of Warwick, in like manner, was created.

The ambition of Northumberland made him regard all increase of possessions and titles, either to himself or his partisans, as steps only to further acquisitions. Finding that Somerset, though degraded from his dignity, and even lessoned in the public opinion, by his speechless conduct, still enjoyed a considerable share of popularity, he determined to run the man whom he regarded as the chief obstacle to the attainment of his hopes. The alliance which had been contracted between two of the most powerful families had perished, no civil union, and only enabled Northumberland to compass with more cert.

HCaptacy the destruction of his rival. He secretly gained many of the friends and servants of that unhappy nobleman: he sometimes terrified him by the appearance of danger; sometimes provoked him by ill usage. The unguarded Somerset often broke out into menacing expressions against Northumberland; at other times he formed rash projects, which he immediately abandoned: his treacherous confidants carried to his enemy every passing word which his private suppliants uttered; and the schemes which they themselves had first suggested: and Northumberland, thinking that the proper season was now come, began to act in an open manner against him.

In one night, the Duke of Somerset, Lord Grey, David and John Seymour, Harrowden, and Neudigate, two of the duke's servants, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Thomas Palmer, were arrested and committed to custody. Next day the Duchess of Somerset, with her favourites, Crane and her wife, Sir Miles Partridge, Sir Michael Stanhope, Bannister, and others, were thrown into prison. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had all along acted as a spy upon Somerset, accused him of having formed a design to raise an insurrection in the North, to attack the garrison of Newcastle on a muster-day, to secure the Tower, and to raise a rebellion in London: but, what was the only probable accusation, he asserted, that Somerset had once had a project for uniting Northumberland, Somerset, and Pembroke, at a banquet which was to be given by them to Lord Paget. Crane and his wife confirmed Palmer's testimony with regard to this last design; and it appears that some rash scheme of that nature had really been mentioned. Unfortunately no regular counsel had been formed, or means prepared for its execution. Hammond confessed that the duke had armed men to guard him one night in his house at Greenwich.

Somerset was brought to his trial before the Marquis of Winchester, created high steward. Twenty-seven peers composed the jury, among whom were Northumberland, Pembroke, and Northampton, whom the former, having been drawn as judges in the trial of the man that appeared to be their capital enemy, Somerset was accused of high treason, on account of the projected insurrections, and of felony, in laying a design to murder his private councillors.

We have a very imperfect account of all state trials during that age, which is a sensible defect in our history: but it appears that some more regularity was observed in the management of this prosecution than had usually been employed in like cases. The witnesses were taken, examined at least examined by the privy-council; and though they were neither produced in court, nor confronted with the prisoner, circumstances required by the strict principles of equity for the discovery of their disposition to the jury. The proof seems to have been lame with regard to the treasonable part of the charge; and Somerset's defence was so satisfactory, that the peers gave verdict in his favour: the intention alone of assaulting the privy-councillors was supported by tolerable evidence; and the jury brought him in guilty of felony. The prisoner himself confessed that he had expressed his intention of murdering Northumberland and the other lords; but had not formed any resolution on that head: and when he received sentence, he asked pardon of those peers for the designs which he had heartened to against them. The people, by whom Somerset was beloved, hearing the first part of his sentence, by which the witnesses were examined, expressed their joy by loud acclamations: but their satisfaction was suddenly damped, on finding that he was condemned to death for felony.

Care had been taken by Northumberland's emissaries, to propose the young king against his uncle; and lest he should retract, no access was given to any of Somerset's friends, and the prince was kept from refreshing his mind with his companions and amusements. At last the prisoner's execution was brought to the scaffold on Tower-hill, amidst great crowds of spectators, who bore him such sincere kindness, as he met in the last moment, the fond hopes of his pardon. Many of them rushed in... to dip their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they long preserved as a precious relic; and some of them soon after, when Northumberland met with a like doom, worshiped him with this cruelty, and displayed to him these symbols of his crime. Somerset indeed, though many actions of his life were exceptional, seems in general to have merited a better fate; and the faults which he committed were weakness, not wickedness, not bribery, not robbery. His virtues were better calculated for private than for public life; and by his want of penetration and firmness, he was ill fitted to extricate himself from those calumnies and violations of his name, which at one time he was addicted. Sir Thomas Arundel, Sir Michael Stanhope, Sir Miles Partidge, and Sir Ralph Vane, all of them Somerset's friends, were brought to their trial, condemned, and executed; great injustice seems to have been used in their prosecution. Lord Paget, chancellor of the duchy, was convicted in the star-chamber, and condemned in a fine of 6000 pounds, with the loss of his office. To mortify him the more, he was degraded from the order of the Garter; as unworthy, on account of his mean birth, to share that honour. Lord Rich, chancellor, was also compelled to resign his office, on the discovery of some marks of friendship which he had shown to Somerset.

The House of Peers passed a bill, whose object was making a provision for the poor; but the Commons, not choosing that a money-bill should begin in the upper House, amended it in the same purpose. By this act the churchwardens were empowered to collect charitable contributions; and if any refused to give, or dissuaded others from that charity, the bishop of the diocese was empowered to proceed against them. Such large discretionary powers intrusted to any body of men, was a proper object of jealousy as the authority assumed by the peers.

There was another occasion on which the parliament reposed an unusual confidence in the bishops. They empowered them to proceed against such as neglected the Sundays and holidays. But these were unguarded concessions granted to the church; the general humour of the time rather than for any good end, to allow and even to palliate their property: many clergy, about this time, were obliged for a subsistence to turn carpenters or tailors, and some kept ale-houses.

The bishop of Durham made a very useful discovery to reduce the poor, and held both their revenues and spiritual office by a very precarious and uncertain tenure.

Toynel, bishop of Durham, was one of the most eminent prelates of the age, still less for the dignity of his see, than for the great learning which he had acquired, and also for his fertility of invention, his wit, and learning, and humanity, and beneficence. He had oppo-ed, by his vote and authority, all innovations in religion; but as soon as they were enacted, he had always submitted, and had concurred in the solemn act of submission. The bishop's character was so respectable, that the house of commons, by a majority of 370, passed the bill to make the bishop an accessory to felony, and to that effect, that for the first offence, their goods and chattels, and be imprisoned during pleasure; for the second, should incur a praemunire; for the third, should be attained for treason. But if any should unavoidably utter such a slander in writing, printing, painting, carving, or graving, he was for the first offence to be held a traitor. It may be worthy of notice, that the king and his next heir, the Lady Mary, were professedly of different religious; and religions which threw on each other the imputation of heresy, schism, idolatry, profaneness, blasphemy, wickedness, and all the opprobrious epithets that religious zeal has invented. It was almost impossible, therefore, for the people, if they spoke at all on these subjects, not to fall into the crime so severely punished by the statute, and the jealousy of the Commons for liberty, though it led them to reject the bill of treasons sent to them by the Lords, appears not to have been very active, vigilant, or clear-sighted.

But the Commons assured him to this House which was of more importance than that which is not, that no one should be convicted of any kind of treason, unless the crime were proved by the oaths of two witnesses confronted with the prisoner. The Lords for some time scrupled to pass this clause, though conformable to the most obvious principles of equity. But the members of that House trusted for protection to their present personal interest and power, and neglected the noblest and most permanent security, that of principle.

not have been practiced, or even imagined, in an age when there was any idea or comprehension of liberty. He engaged the king to write circular letters to all the sheriffs, in which he enjoined them to inform the freetholders, that they were required to choose men of knowledge and experience to inform the capital and great courts of the proceedings in the articles of attachmement, that the king continued in these words: "and yet, nevertheless our pleasure is, that where our privy-council, or any of them, shall, or on behalf, recommend, within their jurisdiction, men of learning and wisdom; in such cases their directions shall be regarded and followed, as tending to the same end which we desire; that is, to have this assembly composed of the persons in our realm the best fitted to give advice and good counsels. Some letters went from the king recommending members to particular counties, Sir Richard Cotton to Hampshire; Sir William Fitzwilliams and Sir Henry Nevil to Berkshire; Sir William Druyty and Sir Henry Benningfield to Suffolk, &c. But though some counties only received this species of congé d’élire from the king, the recommendations from the privy council and the counsellors, we may fairly presume, would extend to the greater part, if not to the whole, of the kingdom."

It is remarkable that this attempt was made during the reign of a minor king, when the royal authority is usually weakest; that it was patiently submitted to; and that it gave so little umbrage as to be taken notice of by any historian. The painful and laborious collector above cited, who never omits the most trivial matter, is the only person that has thought this memorable letter worthy of being transcribed.

The parliament answered Northumberland's first march, land's expectations. As Tontslad had in the interval been deprived of his bishopric in an arbitrary manner, by the scotomet of lay commissioners appointed to the see of Durham was by act of parliament divided into two bishoprics, which had certain portions of the revenue assigned them. The realities of the see, which included the jurisdiction of a count palatine, were given to that little umbrage as to be taken notice of by any historian. For involving the king in wars, wasting his treasure, engaging him in much debts, embossing the coin, and giving occasion for irreversible relations, the debts of the crown were at this time considerable. The king had received from France 400,000 crowns on delivering Boulogne; he had reaped profit from the sale of some chancy lands; the churches had been spoiled of all their plate and rich ornaments, which, by a decree of council, without any pretense of law or equity, had been converted to the king's use; yet such had been the capacity of the courtiers, that the crown owed about 300,000 pounds; and great dilapidations were at the same time made of the royal demesnes. The young prince, among other virtues, a disposition to frugality, which, had he lived, would soon have recovered them; however, great, that is, to be doubted but that nobleman had also purposed to make rich plunder of the revenue, as was then usual with the courtiers whenever a bishopric became vacant.

That nobleman represented to the prince, changed, whom youth and an infirm state of health made susceptible of any impression, that his two sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, had both of them been declared illegitimate. He read to the king, not doubting by his will had restored them to a place in the succession, the nation would never submit to see the throne of England filled by a bastard: that they were the king's sisters by the real marriage; that the bishoprics were legitimate, could not enjoy the crown as his heir and successors: that the Queen of Scots stood excluded by the late king's will; and being an alien, had lost by law all right of inheriting; not to mention, that as she was betrothed to the dauphin, she would by her succession render England, as she had already done Scotland, a prey to her design of acquiring by marriage a predominant interest in that kingdom. It was the opinion of the parliament, that the certain consequence of his sister Mary's succession, or that of the Queen of Scots, was the abolition of the protestant religion, and the repeal of the laws enacted in favour of the Reformations, and the establishment of the usurpation, idolatry, and idolatry of the church of Rome: that, fortunately for England, the same order of succession which justice required, was also the most conso- lentable to public opinion, and not on any side any just ground for doubt or deliberation: that when these three princesses were excluded by such solid reasons, the succession devolved on the Marchioness of Dorset, elder daughter of the French queen and the Duke of Suffolk: that the next heir of the marchioness was the Lady Jane Grey, a lady of the most amiable character, accomplished by the best education, both in literature and religion; and every way worthy of a crown: and that even if her title by blood were doubtful, which there was no just reason to pretend, the king was possessed of the same power that his father enjoyed, and might leave her the crown by letters patent. These reasons made impres- sion on the prince; and above all, his attachment to the protestant religion made him apprehend the consequences, if so bigoted a catholic as his sister Mary should succeed to the throne. And though he wore a tender affection to the Lady Elizabeth of Pembroke, liable to no such objection, means were found to persuade him that he could not exclude the one sister on account of illegitimacy, without giving also an exclusion to the other.

Northumberland, finding that his arguments were likely to operate on the king, began to prepare the other parts of his scheme. Two sons of the Duke of Suffolk by a second venter having died this season of the sweating sickness, that title was extinct; and Northumberland engaged the king to bestow it on the Marquis of Dorset. By means of this favour, and of others which he conferred upon him, he persuaded the new Duke of Suffolk and the duchess to give their daughter, the Lady Jane, the mar- riage to his fourth son, the Lord Guilford Dudley. In order to fortify himself by further alliances, he negociated a marriage between the Lady Catherine Gray, second daughter of Suffolk, and Lord Herbert, son of Bess of Pembroke. He also married his own daughter to Lord Hastings, eldest son of the Earl of Huntington. These marriages were solemnized with great pomp and festivity, and the people, who hated Northumberland, could not forbear witnessing in their own persons such public demonstrations of joy during the languishing state of the young prince's health.

Edward had been seized in the foregoing year, first with the measles, then with the small-pox; but having perfectly recovered from both these distempers, the nation entertained hopes that they would only serve to confirm his health: and he had afterwards made a progress through some parts of the kingdom. It was suspected that he had there overheated himself in exercise: he was the king's sick, seized with a cough, which proved obstinate, and gave way neither to regimen nor medicines: several violent hemorrhages: it was thought wise, that as the season advanced, his youth and temperance might get the better of the malady, men saw with great concern his blood and vigour insensibly decay. The general apprehension to the young prince, joined to the industrious game the Dudleys, made it be remarked, that Ed- ward had every moment declined in health, from the time that Lord Robert Dudley had been put about him in quality of gentleman of the bedchamber.

The languishing state of the young Edward's health made Northumberland the more intent on the execution of his project. He removed all except his own emissaries from about the king: he himself attended him with the greatest assiduity; he preserved the most anxious concern for his health and welfare: and by all these arts he prevailed on the young prince to give his final consent to the settlement projected. Sir Edward Montague, chief justice of the Common Pleas, Sir John Baker and Sir Thomas Bromley, two judges, with the attorney and solicitor-general, were summoned to the council, where, after some minutes of the intended deed were read to them, the king required them to draw them up in the forms of letters patent. They hesitated to obey; and desired time to consider of it. The more the judges doubted, the greater danger they found in compliance. The settlement of the crown by Henry VIII. had been made in consequence of an act of parliament; and by another act passed in the beginning of this reign, a device was devised to any of the heirs, the issue of abetters, to attempt on the right of another, or change the order of succession. The judges pleaded these reasons before the council. They urged, that such a patent as was intended, would be entirely invalid; that it would subject, not only the judges who drew it, but every counsellor who signed it, to the pains of treason; and that the only proper expedient, both for giving sanction to the new settlement, and freeing its partisans from danger, was to summon a parliament, and to obtain the consent of that assembly. The king said, that he intended afterwards to follow that method, and would call a parliament, in which he purposed to have his settlement ratified; but in the mean time, he required the judges, on their allegiance, to draw the patent in the form required. The council told the judges, that their refusal would subject all of them to the pains of treason. Northumberland gave to Montague the appellation of traitor; and said, the judges were more traitors than he. Sir Henry gave him the like answer, as that of Lady Jane's succession. The judges were reduced in great difficulties between the dangers from the law, and those which arose from the violence of present power and authority.8

The arguments were canvassed in several different meetings between the council and the judges; and no solution could be found of the difficulties. At last, Montague conveyed an expedient, which satisfied both his brethren and the counsellors. He desired that a special commission should be passed by the king and council, requiring the judges to draw a patent for the new settlement of the crown, that patent should immediately after be granted them for any offence which they might have incurred by their compliance. When the patent was drawn, and brought to the Bishop of Ely, chancellor, in order to give the great seal affixed to it, this prelate requested two of the judges should immediately sign it. Cranmer at first refused; and it was with much difficulty that he was prevailed on, by the violent menaces of Northumberland, to comply; but the constancy of Sir James Hales, who was one of the judges, gave the proper prejudice, on particular occasion, to the prejudices of his party, could not be shaken by any expedient. The chancellor next required, for his greater security, that all the privy counsellors should set their hands to the patent: the intrigues of Northumberland, or the fears of his violence, were so prevalent, that the counsellors complied with this demand. 8

Lady Jane Grey proclaimed queen.—Deserted by the people.—The queen proclaimed and acknowledged.—Northumberland executed.—Catholic religion proscribed.—Proposals to Henry VIII.—The queen's marriage.—Queen's marriage with Philip.—Wyatt's insurrection.—Noy's revolution.—The last days of Lady Jane Grey.—A parliament.—Philip's arrival in England.

The title of the Princess Mary, after the decease of her brother, was not exposed to any considerable difficulty; and the objections started by the Lady Jane's partisans were weakened by the nation. Though all the protestants, and even many of the catholics, believed the marriage of Henry VIII. with Catherine of Arragon to be unlawful and invalid; yet, as it had been contracted by the parties without any criminal intention, had been avowed by their parents, recognized by the nation, and seemingly founded on those principles of law and religion which then prevailed, few imagined that their issue ought on that account to be regarded as illegitimate. A declaration to that purpose had indeed been extracted from parliament by the usual violence and caprice of Henry; but as that monarch had afterwards been induced to restore his daughter to the right of succession, her title was now become as legal and parliamentary as it was ever esteemed just and natural. The public had long been familiarized to these sentiments: during all the reign of Edward, the princess was regarded as his lawful successor; and, in the eyes of the nation, the effects of her prejudices, the extreme hatred universally entertained against the Dudleys,4 who, men foresaw, would, under the name of Jane, be the real sovereigns, was more than sufficient to counterbalance, even with the party, the attachment to religion. This last attempt to violate the order of succession, had dispelled Northumberland's ambition and injustice in a full light; and when the people reflected on the long train of fraud, iniquity, and cruelty, by which that project had been conducted: that the lives of the two Seymours, as well as the title of the princesses, had been sacrificed to it; they were moved by indignation to exert themselves in opposition to such criminal enterprises. The general reverence also paid to the memory of Henry VIII. prompted the nation to defend the rights of his posterity; and the miseries of the ancient civil wars were not so entirely forgotten, that men were willing to return from the horrid edge, to incur the danger of like bloodshed and confusion.

Northumberland, sensible of the opposition which he must expect, had carefully concealed the destination made by the king; and in order to bring the two princes into his power, he had had the precaution to engage the council, before Edward's death, to write to them, in that prince's name, desiring their attendance, on precaution that his inftant state of health required the assistance of their coun-

on Mary. As they were much attached to the reformed communion, they could not forbear, amidst their tenders of duty, expressing apprehensions for their religion; but when she assured them that she never meant to change the laws of Edward, they enlisted themselves in her cause with zeal and affection. The nobility and gentry daily pressed her to deliver, and take possession of the county against her: she immediately made haste to retire; and she arrived, by quick journeys, first at Kemingham in Norfolk, then at Framlingham in Suffolk; where, with purpose and effect, she sent letters, in case she should find it impossible to defend her right of succession.

She wrote letters to the nobility and most considerable gentry in every county of England; commanding them to assist and defend the crown and person of her sister, and to despatch a message to the council, by which she notified to them that her brother's death was no longer a secret to her, promised them pardon for past offences, and required them immediately to give orders for proclaiming her Queen.

Northumberland found that further dissimulation was fruitless; he went to Non-house, accompanied by the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Pembroke, and others of the nobility; and he approached the Lady Jane, who resided there, with all the respect usually paid to the sovereign. Jane was, in a great measure, ignorant of these transactions; and it was with equal grief and surprise that she found herself placed in a situation, who, who wished to remain true to her father, was a lady of an amiable person, an engaging disposition, accomplished parts; and being of an equal age with the late king, she had received all her education with him, and seemed even to possess greater facility to acquire every part of mankind and polite literature. She had attained a familiar knowledge of the Roman and Greek languages, besides modern tongues; had passed most of her time in an application to learning; and experienced the advantages of a sumptuous establishment of amusements, usual with her sex and station. Roger Ascham, tutor to the Lady Elizabeth, having one day paid her a visit, found her employed in reading Plato, while the rest of the family were engaged in a party of hunting in the park; and on his admiring the singularity of her choice, she told him that she received more pleasure from that author than the others could reap from all their sport and gayety. Her heart, full of this passion for literature and the elegant arts, and of tenderness towards her husband, who was deserving of her affections, had never opened itself to the flattering allurements of ambition; and the counsellors immediately withdrew the thought of ever intruding noriwise agreeable to her. She even refused to accept of the present; pleaded the preferable title of the two princes; expressed her dread of the consequences attending an enterprise so dangerous, not to say so criminal; and, desiring her husband to remain in the same station in which he was born. Overcome at last by the entreaties rather than the reasons of her father and father-in-law, and above all her husband, she submitted to their will, and was prevailed on to relinquish her own judgment. It was then usual for the Kings of England, after their accession, to pass the first days in the Tower; and Northumberland immediately conveyed thither the new sovereign. All the counsellors were ordered to attend her to that fortress; and by this means became, in reality, prisoners in the hands of Northumberland; whose will they were necessitated to obey. Orders were given by the council to prevent the Keg of England from reaching London, and these were executed only in London and the neighbourhood. No applause ensued: the people heard the proclamation with silence and concern; some even expressed their scorn and contempt; and one Pot, a victualer's apprentice, was severely punished for this offense. The Protestant teachers themselves, who were employed to convince the people of Jane's title, found their eloquence fruitless; and Ridley, Bishop of London, who preached a sermon to that purpose, was removed to the bishopric of London, and kept in the Tower only.

The people of Suffolk, meanwhile, paid their attendance his followers, and had already proclaimed the queen, with his exterior marks of joy and satisfaction. The people everywhere, on the queen's approach, to London, gave sensible expressions of their loyalty and attachment. And the Lady Elizabeth met her at the head of a thousand horses which that prince, who had levied in order to support their joint title against the usurper,

The queen gave orders for taking into custody the Duke of Northumberland, who fell on his knees to the Earl of Arundel that arrested him, and abjectly begg'd his life. At the same time were committed the Earl of Warwick, his eldest son, Lord Ambrose and Lord Henry Dudley, two of his younger sons, Sir Andrew, his brother, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Huntingdon, Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates. The queen afterwards confided the Duke of Suffolk, Lady Jane Gray, and Lord Guilford Dudley. But Mary was desirous, in the beginning of her reign, to acquire popularity by the appearance of clemency; and because the counsellors pleaded constraint as an excuse for their treason, she extended her pardon to most of them. Suffolk himself recanted his liberty; and he owned this indulgence, in a great measure, to the contempt entertained of his capacity. But the guilt of Northumberland was too great, as well as his ambition and courage too dangerous, to permit him to entertain any reasonable hopes of life. When brought to his trial, he only desired permission to ask two questions of the peers appointed to sit on his jury; whether a man could be guilty of treason that obeyed orders given him by the king and had not been admitted on his jury. 'The love of his country,' he said, 'had made him acquiesce, and pleaded guilty. At his execution, he made profession of the Catholic religion, and told the people that they never would enjoy tranquillity till they returned to the faith of their ancestors: whether that such were his real sentiments, which he had formerly disguised from interest and ambition, or that he hoped by this declaration to render the queen more favourable to his family, Sir Thomas Palmer and Sir John Gates suffered with him; and this was all the blood spilled on account of so dangerous and criminal an enterprise against the rights of the sovereign. Sentence was pronounced against the Lady Jane, and Lord Guilford; but without any present intention of putting it in execution. The youth and innocence of the persons, neither of whom had reached their seventeenth yeare, pleaded sufficiently in their favour. Whereupon, as he ascended the tower, the Duke of Norfolk, who had been detained prisoner during all the last reign; Courtenay, son of the Marquis of Exeter, who, without being charged with any crime, had been subjected to the same punishment ever since his father's attainder; Gardiner, Tostal, and Bonner, who had been confined for their adhering to the catholic cause, appeared before her, and implored her clemency and protection. They were all of them restored to their liberty, and immediately admitted to her confidence and favour. Norfolk's attainder, notwithstanding that it had passed in parliament, was represented as null and invalid; because, among other informalities, no formal matter had been charged against him, except wearing a coat of arms, which he and his ancestors, without giving any offence, had always made use of, in the face of the court and of the whole nation. Courtenay soon after received the title of Earl of Devonshire; and though edged in such close confinement, that he was altogether unacquainted with the world, he soon acquired all the accomplishments of a courtier and a gentleman, and made a considerable figure during the few years of his life. He also besides performing all those popular acts, which, though they only affected individuals, were very acceptable to the nation, the queen endeavoured to ingratiate herself with the public, by granting a general pardon, though with some exceptions, and by remitting the subsidy voted to her brother by the last parliament.

The joy arising from the succession of the lawful heir, and from the removal of the usurper, hindered not the people from being agitated with great anxiety concerning the state of religion; and as the bulk of the nation inclined to the protestant communion, the apprehensions entertained concerning the principles and proceedings of the new queen were pretty general. The legitimacy of Mary's birth had appeared to be somewhat connected with the papal authority; and that princess, being brought up with her mother, had imbibed the strongest attachment to the catholic communion, and the highest aversion to those new tenets, whence, she believed, all the misfortunes of her family had originally sprang. The discouragements which she lay under from her father, though at last they brought her to comply with his will, tended still more to increase her disgust to the reformers; and the vexations which the protector and the council gave her, during Edward's reign, had no other effect than to confirm her further in her principles. Naturality of a sort and obstinate temper, and irritated by contradiction and misfortunes, she possessed all the qualities fitted to compose a bigot; and her extreme ignorance rendered her utterly incapable of forming an opinion on the difference of opinion to the opinions of others. The nation, therefore, had great reason to dread not only the abolition, but the persecution, of the established religion from the zeal of Mary; and it was feared, lest the example of her father might be repeated.

Gardiner, Bonner, Tostal, Day, Heath, Catholic religion and Vesey, were reinstated in their sees, restored either by a direct act of power, or what is nearly the same, by the sentence of commissioners appointed to review their trial and proceedings during his father's reign. The public opinion, which had been dissoluted by authority of parliament, the queen erected it anew by letters patent, and replaced Tostal in his regalities as well as his revenue. On pretence of discouraging controversy, she silenced, by an act of prerogative, all the preachers throughout England, except such as should obtain a particular licence; and it was easy to foresee that none but the Catholics would be favoured with this privilege. Judge Bate, Archdeacon of York, Coverdale, Bishop of Exeter, Redley of London, and Hooper of Gloucester, were thrown into prison; whether old Latimer also was sent soon after. The zealous bishops and preachers encouraged by her absence, and driven by her severity, that she would not pardon, continued to publish, and killed himself. The men of Suffolk were brow-beaten; because they presumed to plead the promise which the queen, when they enlisted themselves in her service, had given them of maintaining the reformed religion; one in particular was set in the pillory, because he had been too peremptory in recalling to her memory the engagements which she had taken on that occasion, and though the queen still promised in a public declaration before the council, to tolerate those who differed from her, men foresaw that this engagement, like the former, would prove but a feeble security when set in opposition to religious prejudices.

The merits of Cramer towards the queen during the reign of Henry had been considerable; and he had successfully employed his good offices in mitigating the severe prejudices which that monarch had entertained against her. But the active part which he had taken in promoting her mother's divorce, as well as in conducting the Reformation, had made him the object of her hatred; and though Gardiner had been equally forward in soliciting and defending that princess, she had made him the victim of her resentment.

The private, therefore, had reason to expect little favour during the present reign; but it was by his own indiscreet real that he brought on himself the first violence and persecution. A report being spread, that Cranmer, in order to be desired to officiate in the Latin service, the archbishop, to wipe off this aspersion, published a manifest in his own defence. Among other expressions, he there said, that as the queen was a far from the beginning, and her father of lies, he had at this time stirred up his servants to persecute Christ and his true religion: that this infernal spirit now endeavoured to restore the Latin satisfactory masses, a thing of his own invention and design; and that the order to which he was called was far from the example of Cranmer's name and authority: and that the mass is not only without foundation, either in the Scriptures or in the practice of the primitive church, but likewise discovers a plain contradiction to scripture and the inspired word, and is besides replete with many horrid blasphemies.7

The publication of this inflammatory paper, Cranmer was thrown into prison, and was tried for the part which he had acted in concurring with the Lady Jane, and opposing the queen's accession. Sentence of high treason was pronounced against him; and though his guilt was shared with the whole privy council, and was even less than that of this particular, was yet pronounced against him, and he must be allowed entirely legal. The execution of it, however, did not follow, and Cranmer was reserved for a more cruel punishment.

Peter Martyr, seeing a persecution gathering against the queen, desired leave to withdraw; and while some zealous catholics mov'd for his commutation, Cardin bono pleased that he had come over by an invitation from the government, and generously furnished him with supplies for his journey; but as bigoted zeal still increased, his wife's body, which had been interred at Oxford, was afterwards dug up by public orders, and buried in a dunghill.8 The bones of Bucer and Fagius, two foreign confessors, were also exposed to public contempt, and cast into the flames at Cambridge.9 John à Lasco was first silenced, then ordered to depart the kingdom with his congregation. The greater part of the foreign protestants forsook the kingdom, and the nation lost many useful hands for arts and manufactures. Several English protestants also took shelter in foreign parts; and every thing bore a dismal aspect for the Reformation.

26th Oct. During this revolution of the court, no parlament protection was expected by protestants from the parliament, which was summoned to assemble. A zealous reformer pretends, that great violence and iniquity were used in the elections; but besides that the authority of the queen was required to pass the necessaries of government, there is no part of the proceedings of the last parliament which is not confirmed by the queen's personal authority. If every thing in the queen's right was able to give such candidates the preference in most elections; and all those who hesitated to comply with the court religion, rather declined taking a seat, which while it rendered them obnoxious to the queen, could afterwards afford them no protection against the violence of prerogative. It soon appeared, therefore, that a majority of the Commons would be obsequious to Mary's designs; and as the peers were mostly attached to the court, a committee of twenty, little opposition was expected from that quarter.

In opening the parliament, the court showed a contempt of the laws, by celebrating, before the two Houses, a mass of the Holy Sacrament in the Latin tongue, attended with all the ancient rites and ceremonies, though abolished by act of parliament.10 Taylor, Bishop of Lincoln, having refused to kneel at this service, was severely handled, and was violently thrust out of the House. The queen, however, had decreed to all the clergy of England; and it was generally pretended, that the intension of the court was only to restore religion to the same condition in which it had been left by Henry; but that the other abuses of popery, which were the most grievous to the nation, would never be revis'd.

The first bill passed by the parliament was of a popular nature, and abolished every species of treason not contained in the statute of Edward III. and every species of death before the birth of Edward IV.11

The parliament next declared the queen to be legitimate, ratified the marriage of Henry with Catherine of Arragon, and annulled the divorce pronounced by Cranmer,12 whom she greatly blamed. This act is a breach of the office made by her, however, is made of the Pope's authority, as any ground of the marriage. All the statutes of King Edward, with regard to religion, were repealed by one vote.13

The attainder of the Duke of Norfolk was reversed; and this act of justice was more reasonable than the declaration of that attainder invalid, without further authority. Many charges of the riot act, passed in the late reign, were revived: a step which, though in a great measure, the popular statute enacted at the first meeting of parliament.

Notwithstanding the compliance of the two Houses with the queen's inclinations, they had still a reserve in certain articles; and her choice of a husband, in particular, was the most important; for though they were determined not to submit tamely, in that respect, to her will and pleasure. There were three marriages,14 concerning which it was supposed that Mary had determined after the accession. The first to her was Courtenay, Earl of Devonshire, who being an Englishman, nearly allied to the crown, could not fail of being acceptable to the nation; and as he was of an engaging person and address, he had visibly gained on the queen's affections,15 and hints were dropped him of his favourite dispositions towards him.16 But that nobleman neglected these overtures, and seemed rather to attach himself to the Lady Elizabeth, whose youth and agreeable conversation he found more to his taste than the caprice of her sister. This choice occasioned a great coldness in Mary towards Devonshire; and made her break out in a declared animosity against Elizabeth. The ancient quartet between the queen and her sisters, the grand heart of the queen; and after the declaration made by parliament in favour of Catherine's marriage, she wanted not a pretence for representing the birth of her sister as illegitimate. The attachment of Elizabeth to the reformed religion, offended Mary's bigotry; and as the young princess had made some difficulty in disguising her sentiments, violent menaces had been employed to bring her to compliance.17 But when the queen found that Elizabeth had received no arts, and had given no hopes, touched her still more nearly, her resentment, excited by pride, no longer knew any bounds; and the princess was visibly exposed to the greatest danger.

Cardinal Pole, who had taken the queen's orders, was another party proposed to the queen; and there appeared many reasons to induce her to make choice of this prelate. The high character of Pole, for virtue and humanity; the great regard paid him by the catholic church, of which he had nearly reached the highest dignity, on the death of Paul III.;18 the queen's affection for the Countess of Salisbury, his mother, who had long been her governess; the violent animosity to which he had been exposed, on account of his attachment to the Romish communion; all these considerations had a powerful influence on Mary. But the cardinal was now in the decline of life; and having contracted habits of study and retirement, he was represented to her as unequalled for the legislature of a court, and the hurry of business.19 The queen, therefore, dropped all thoughts of that alliance: but as she entertained a great regard for Pole's wisdom and virtue, she still intended to reap the benefit of his administration of her government.

She secretly entered into a negotiation with Comendone, an agent of Cardinal that much pains had been taken to prejudice the nation against the Spanish alliance; and if that point were urged, at the same time with further changes in religion, it would hazard a general revolt and insurrection; that the marriage, being once completed, would give authority to the queen's measures, and enable her afterwards to forward the pious work in which she was engaged; and that it was even necessary, previous to the undertaking, to engage the people to the venture, by rendering the conditions extremely favourable to the English, and such as would seem to insure to them their independency, and the entire possession of their ancient privileges.

The emperor, well acquainted with the prudence and experience of Gardiner, assented to all these reasons; and he endeavoured to temper the zeal of Mary, by representing the necessity of proceeding gradually in the great work of conversion; that the undertaking was to be done with an eye to the interest of the nation, and the present advantages offered to the English nation. He also prevailed on her to go in person to Dillingham, a town on the Danube; and he afterwards obtained Mary's consent for this detention. The negotiation for the marriage, nevertheless, was not made; nor was anything but the marriage of espousing Philip became generally known to the nation.

The Commons, who hoped that they had gained the queen by the concessions which they had already made, were alarmed at this, and they thereupon refused to contract a foreign alliance; and they sent a committee to demonstrate in strong terms against that dangerous measure. To prevent further applications of the same kind, she thought proper to dissolve the parliament. A conversation had been summoned at the same time with the parliament; and the majority here also appeared to be of the court religion. An offer was very frankly made by the Romanists, to dispute concerning the points of controversy which had occasioned them to espouse the cause of the emperor; but the queen resolutely refused it, and on the 6th of December, 1553, she gave her consent that the marriage should take place.

His son Philip was a widower; and though he was only twenty-seven years of age, eleven years younger than the queen, this objection, it was thought, would be overlooked, and there was no reason to despair of her still having a husband, and an emperor, and without a successor. The Duke of Guise, who defended Metz, with a garrison composed of the bravest nobles of France, exerted such vigour, conduct, and valour, that the siege was protracted to the depth of winter; and the emperor found it impossible to persevere any longer. He retired, with the remains of his army, into the Low Countries, much dejected with that reverse of fortune which, in his declining years, had so fatally overtaken him.

and the ancient rites. Among other articles, the commissioners were enjoined to forbid the oath of supremacy to be taken by the clergy on their receiving any benefices. It is to be observed, that this oath had been established by the laws of Henry VIII. which were still in force.

This violent and sudden change of religion inspired the protestants with great discontent; and even affected indiffere-tent spectators with concern, by the hardships to which many individuals were on that account exposed. But the Spanish match was a point of more general concern, and diffused universal apprehensions for the liberty and independence of the nation; for, after the articles of marriage were drawn as favourable as possible for the interest and security, and even grandeur, of England. It was agreed, that, though Philip should have the title of king, the administration should be entirely in the queen; that no foreigner should be capable of enjoying any office in the kingdom; that no innovation should be made in the English laws, customs, and privileges; that Philip should not carry the queen abroad without her consent, nor any of her children without the consent of the nobility; that sixty thousand pounds a year should be settled as her pittance; that the male issue of this marriage should inherit, together with England, both Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that of Don Carlos, Philip's son by his former marriage, should die and his line be extinct, the queen's issue, whether male or female, should inherit Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all the other dominions of Philip.

Such was the treaty of marriage signed by Count Egmont and the three other ambassadors sent over to England by the emperor.

These articles, when published, gave no satisfaction to the nation: it was universally said, that the emperor, in order to confirm his possession of England, would verbally agree to any terms; and the greater advantage there appeared in the conditions which he granted, the more certainly might it be concluded that he had no serious intention of obtaining the possessions; that the whole body of that gaged him to break the concert, and to rise in arms before

It was agreed, that, though Philip should have the title of king, the administration should be entirely in the queen; that no foreigner should be capable of enjoying any office in the kingdom; that no innovation should be made in the English laws, customs, and privileges; that Philip should not carry the queen abroad without her consent, nor any of her children without the consent of the nobility; that sixty thousand pounds a year should be settled as her pittance; that the male issue of this marriage should inherit, together with England, both Burgundy and the Low Countries; and that of Don Carlos, Philip's son by his former marriage, should die and his line be extinct, the queen's issue, whether male or female, should inherit Spain, Sicily, Milan, and all the other dominions of Philip. Such was the treaty of marriage signed by Count Egmont and the three other ambassadors sent over to England by the emperor.

These articles, when published, gave no satisfaction to the nation: it was universally said, that the emperor, in order to confirm his possession of England, would verbally agree to any terms; and the greater advantage there appeared in the conditions which he granted, the more certainly might it be concluded that he had no serious intention of obtaining the possessions; that the whole body of that monarch might assure the nation of such a conduct; and his son Philip, while he inherited these views from his father, added to them tyranny, sullenness, pride, and barbary, and other dangerous vices of his own; that England would become a province, and a province to a kingdom which usually exercised the most violent authority over all her dependent dominions; that the Netherlands, Milan, Sicily, Naples, furnished under the burden of Spanish tyranny, with the hope of being delivered from it, and that in Britain, where there had been displayed scenes of unrelenting cruelty, hitherto unknown in the history of mankind: that the inquisition was a tribunal invented by that theological nature, and that its institutions, as far as they were published, and it was at last seized, and the last by Sir Maurice Berkeley. Four hundred persons are said to have suffered for this rebellion:

Four hundred were more conducted before the queen with rungs about their necks; andfty were branded and were executed as traitors, on the scaffold, before the whole people, fully to acquit them of having any share in the rebellion.

The Lady Elizabeth had been, during some time, treated with great harshness by her sister; and many studied instances of discouragement and disrespect had been practised against her. She was ordered to take place at court after the Countess of Lenox and the Duchess of Suffolk, as if she were not legitimate; her friends were banished, if they could not discontinue a correspondence with her; which were now become eminent, drew her to the attendance of all the young nobility, and rendered her the favourite of the nation; the malevolence of the queen still discovered itself every day by fresh symptoms, and obliged the process to retire into the country. Mary seized the opportunity of this rebellion; and hoping to involve her sister to some appearance of guilt, sent for her under a strong guard, committed her to the Tower, and ordered her to be strictly examined by the council. But the public declaration made by Wat rendered it impracticable to employ against her any false evidence which might have offered; and the princess made so good a defence, that the queen found herself under a necessity of releasing her. This was done, and her husband, who had been offered her with the Duke of Savoy; and when she declined the proposal, she was committed to custody under a strong guard at Woodstock. The Earl of Devonshire, her equal in rank, was confined in Fotheringhay castle.

But this rebellion proved still more fatal to the Lady Jane Gray, as well as to her husband: the Duke of Suffolk, who had promised to her father the union of a marriage between Dame Mary, and a misfortune to the Lady Elizabeth and the Earl of Devonshire, the queen, incapable of generosity or clemency, determined to remove every particle of the constitutional and misfortunes, and, united to his wishes, the constable, which he had ordered, was to have immediately suspended, some regard to her eternal welfare. The Lady Jane had been of mind, in those melancholy circumstances, not only to defend her religion by all means, but to procure her release, and to pay due honour to her sister in the Greek language; in which, besides sending her a copy of the Scriptures in that tongue, she exhorted her to maintain, in every fortune, a like steady perseverance.

On the day of the execution, her husband, Lord Guilford, desired permission to see her; but she refused her consent, and informed him by a message, that the tenderness of their Situation would make it a fortune for both to be separated; of which much unbend their minds from that constancy which their approaching end required of them; their separation, she said, would be only for a moment; and they would soon regain each other in a scene where their afflictions would be for ever united, and where danger, persecution, and misfortunes could no longer have access to them, or disturb their eternal felicity.

It had been intended to execute the Lady Jane and Lord Guilford together on the same scaffold at Tower-hill; but the council, dreading the compassion of the people for their youth, beauty, innocence, and noble birth, changed their orders, and gave directions that she should have the preference of both. On the scaffold the Lady Jane Gray.

She saw her husband led to execution; and having given him from the window some token of her remembrance, she waited with tranquillity the event of his own elevation within the verge of the scaffold, where he was released for some time from the executioner; and was not deterred from the moment, in which she appeared to be the most ready to adopt the utility, and not to disturb their eternal felicity. The executioner, her husband, Lord Guilford, desired permission to see her; but she refused her consent, and informed him by a message, that the tenderness of their situation would make it a fortune for both to be separated; of which much unbend their minds from that constancy which their approaching end required of them; their separation, she said, would be only for a moment; and they would soon regain each other in a scene where their afflictions would be for ever united, and where danger, persecution, and misfortunes could no longer have access to them, or disturb their eternal felicity.

The parliament, therefore, aware of their danger, were determined to keep at a distance from the precipice which lay before them. They could not avoid ratifying the arrears of their demands, which had been for so long a time the staple of their agitation; and a bill introduced for that purpose was laid aside after the first reading. The more effectually to cut off Philip's hopes of possessing any authority in England, they passed a law, in which they declared that the sovereign should become a Lutheran, that the crown should solely, and as a sole queen, enjoy the crown and sovereignty of her realms, with all the pre-eminences, dignities, and rights thereto belonging, in as large and unimpaired a degree as by law or usage heretofore she might claim or have laid to the Prince of Spain, either as tenant, by courtesy of the realm, or by any other means. 4

A law passed in this parliament for re-electing the bishop of Gloucester, which had been dissolved by the last parliament of Edward. 5 The queen had already, by an exertion of her power, put tốtental in possession of that see; but though it was usual, at that time, for the crown to assume authority which might seem entirely legislative, it was always deemed more safe and satisfactory to procure the sanction of parliament. Bills were introduced for suppressing heterodox opinions contained in books, and for revising the law of the Six Articles, together with all other legislation, which was going on. The queen, therefore, finding that they would not serve all her purposes, finished the session by dissolving them.

May. Mary's thoughts were now entirely engrossed by Philip, whose arrival she hourly expected. This princess, who had lived so many years in a very reserved and private manner, without any prospect or hope of a husband, was so smitten with love at the first sight of him, that she could not rest till she was married to him. She had that occasion as a pretext to go to her own chamber; and when she found that her subjects had entertained the greatest aversion for the event, to which she directed her fondest wishes, she made the whole English nation the object of her resentment. A squadron, under the command of Lord Effingham, had been fitted out, to convoy Philip from Spain, where he then resided; but the admiral informing her that the discontents ran very high among the seamen, and that it was not safe for Philip to trust himself in their hands, she gave orders to disband them. She then dreaded lest the French fleet, being masters of the sea, might intercept her husband; and every rumour of danger, every blast of wind, threw her into panics and convulsions. She lived, indeed, in a state of continual terror, and her hopes and fears, were visibly hurt by this extreme impatience; and she was struck with a new apprehension, lest her person, impaired by time, and blasted by sickness, should prove disagreeable to her future consort. Her glass discovered to her how haggard she was become; and when she remarked the decay of her beauty, she knew not whether she ought more to desire or apprehend the arrival of Philip. 6

At last came the moment so impatiently awaited, and expected; and news was brought the queen Philip's arrival of Philip's arrival at Southampton. 7 A few days after, they were married in Westminster, and having made a pompous entry into London, where Philip displayed his wealth with great ostentation, she carried him to Windsor, the palace in which they afterwards resided. The prince's behaviour was ill calculated to remove the jealousy entertained by the queen against him. He was distant and reserved in his address; took no notice of the salutes even of the most considerable noblemen; and so entrench himself in form and ceremony, that the greatest authority was vested in him. The circumstance rendered him the more acceptable to the queen, who desired to have no company but her linband's, and who was impatient when she met with any interruption to her fondest wishes. Though they were married to secure her own entertainment; and when he showed civilities to any other woman, she could not conceal her jealousy and resentment.

Mary soon found that Philip's ruling passion was ambition; and the only means he employed for procuring and securing his affections, was to render him master of England. The interest and liberty of her people were considerations of small moment, in comparison of her obtaining the sway of the realm. The queen, in hopes of finding them entirely compliant; and that she might acquire the greater authority over them, she imitated the precedent of the former reign, and wrote circular letters, directing a proper choice of members. 8 The zeal of the catholics, the influence of Spanish gold, the powers of prerogative, the discouragement of the gentry, particularly of the protestants; all these causes, seconding the intrigues of Gardiner, had procured him a House of Commons, which were entirely at his command, in hopes of finding them entirely compliant; and that she might acquire the greater authority over them, she imitated the precedent of the former reign, and wrote circular letters, directing a proper choice of members. 8 them to do what he ought to give them thanks for performing.

Notwithstanding the extreme zeal of those times for and against popery, the object always uppermost with the nobility and gentry was their money and estates, and they were not backward to make those concessions in favour of Rome, till they had received repeated assurances from the Pope, as well as the queen, that the plunders which they had made on the ecclesiastics should never be inquired into; and that the abbey and church lands should remain with the present possessors. But not trusting altogether to these promises, the parliament took care in the law itself, by which they repealed the former statutes enacted against the Pope, into an act, to insert a clause, in which, besides bestowing validity on all marriages celebrated during the schism, and fixing the right of incumbents to their benefices, they gave security to the possessors of church lands, and freed them from all danger of ecclesiastical censures.

The convocation also, in order to remove apprehensions on that head, were induced to present a petition to the same purpose; and the legate, in his humble name, ratified all these transactions. It now appeared that notwithstanding the efforts of the queen and king, the power of the papacy was effectually suppressed in England, and invincible barriers fixed against its return. For, as to the ecclesiastics, the remaining ecclesiastics were for the present restored, their property, on which their power much depended, was irretrievably lost, and no hopes remained of recovering it. Even these aristocrats, powerful, and buoyed princes, while the transaction was yet recent, could not pretend to the church properties so lately ravaged from her; and no expediency were left to the clergy for enriching themselves, but those which they had at first practised, and which had reappeared to the people, ignorance, hatred, and superstition, to produce their effect on mankind.

The parliament, having secured their own possessions, were more indifferent with regard to religion, or even to the supremacy, than those to whom they had observed the due, sanctuaries laws against heretics, which had been restored in the former parliament: they also enacted several statutes against sedition words and romours; and they made it treason to imagine or attempt the death of Philip, during his marriage with the queen. Each parliament lurthero had been induced to go a step further than their predecessors; but none of them had entirely lost all regard to nation's interest. He had hatred against the Spaniards, as well as their suspicion of Philip's pretensions, still prevailed; and though the queen attempted to get her husband declared presumptive heir to the crown, and to have the administration put into his hands, she failed in all her endeavours, and could not so much as procure the parliament's consent to his coronation. All attempts likewise to obtain subsidies from the Commons in order to support the emperor in his war against France, proved fruitless: the usual anarchy and jealousy of the English against that kingdom, s. emed to have given place, for the present, to like passions against Spain. Philip, sensible of the presuppositions entangled against him, endeavoured to acquire popularity by procuring the release of several prisoners of distinction: Lord Henry Dudley, Sir George Harper, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, Sir Edmund Warner, Sir William St. Lo, Sir Nicholas Arnold, Harrington, Tremaine, who had been confined from the suspicious or resentment of the court. But nothing was more agreeable to the nation, than his protecting the Lady Elizabeth from the spite and malice of the queen, and restoring her to liberty. This measure was not the effect of any generosity in Philip of sentiment of which he was wholly destitute: but of a refined policy, which made him foresee, that if that princess were put to death, the next lawful heir was the Queen of Scots, whose succession would for ever annex England to the crown of France.

The Earl of Devonshire also received some benefit from Philip's affectation of popularity, and recovered his liberty; but that nobleman, finding himself exposed to suspicion, begged permission to travel, and he soon after died at Padua. As to some, as is mentioned, given him by the Imperialists. He was the eleventh and last Earl of Devonshire of that noble family, one of the most illustrious in Europe.

The queen's extreme desire of having issue, had made her fondly give credit to any appearance of pregnancy; and when the legate was introduced to her, she fancied she felt the embryo stir in her womb. Her pretenders compared this motion of the infant to that of John the Baptist, who leaped in his mother's belly at the salutation of the Virgin. Despatches were immediately sent to inform foreign courts of this event: orders were issued to give the queen the necessary assurance of the family of the young prince was already settled; for the catholics held themselves assured that the child was to be a male: and Bonner, Bishop of London, made public prayers, he said, that Heaven would please to render him beneficial to the young prince, before the nation still remained somewhat incredulous; and men were persuaded that the queen laboured under infirmities which rendered her incapable of having children. Her infant proved to be a girl; and the blessing of the MCCII, and superstitious, to produce their effect on mankind.

The parliament, having secured their own possessions, were more indifferent with regard to religion, or even to the supremacy, than those to whom they had observed the due, sanctuaries laws against heretics, which had been restored in the former parliament: they also enacted several statutes against sedition words and romours; and they made it treason to imagine or attempt the death of Philip, during his marriage with the queen.

Reasons for and against toleration—Persecutions.—A parliament—the queen's extortions; the emperor indignant; his crown: Execution of Casimire, the son of Charles of Hungary.—Battle of St. Quintin.—Calais four years.—French—Alburns of Scotland—Marriage of the dauphin and the Queen of Scots.—A parliament.—Death of the queen.

A. D. 1555.

The success which Gardiner, from his cautious and prudent conduct, had met with in governing the parliament, and engaging them to concur both in the Spanish match, and the re-establishment of the ancient religion, two points to which, it was believed, they bore an extreme aversion, had so raised his character for wisdom and policy, that his opinion was received as an oracle in the council; and his authority, as it was always great in his own party, no longer suffered any opposition or control. Cardinal Pole himself, though more beloved on account of his virtue and candour, and though superior in birth and station, had not equal weight in public deliberations; and while his learning, piety, and humanity were extremely respected, he was represented more as a good man than as a great minister. A very important question was frequently debated before the queen and council by these two ecclesiastics; whether the laws lately revived against heretics should be put in execution, or should only be employed to check the freebold attempts of these zealots? Pole was very sincere in his religious principles; and though his moderation had made him be suspected at Rome of a tendency towards Lutheranism, he was seriously concerned for the safety of the church, and never thought that no consideration of human policy ought ever to come in competition with such important interests. Gardiner, on the contrary, had always made his religion subservient to his schemes of safety or advancement; and by his unlimited complaisance to Henry, he had shown that he had not been pushed to extremities under the late minority, he was sufficiently disposed to make a sacrifice of his principles to the established. This was the well-known character of these two great counsellors; yet such is the prevalence of temper above system, that the benevolent disposition of Pole led him to advise a toleration of the heretical tenets which he highly blamed; while the severe manners of Gardiner inclined him to support by persecution that religion which, at the bottom, he regarded with great indifference.* This circumstance of public conduct was of the highest importance; and from being the means of dissolving the inclination of the people, it came the subject of discourse throughout the nation. We shall relate, in a few words, the topics by which each side supported, or might have supported, their scheme of policy; and shall display the opposite reasons, which have been urged for and against it, and find that what ever has been, and ever will be, so much canvassed.

Reasons for and against toleration—Dealers of Pole's opinion, is the scandal of all religions; and the theological animosity so fierce and violent, far from being an argument of men's conviction in their opposite sects, is a certain proof that they have never respected any serious persuasion with regard to these remote and sublimine subjects. Even those who are the most impatients of contradiction in other controversies, are mild and moderate in comparison of polemical divines; and whoever a man's knowledge and experience give him a perfect assurance in his own opinion, he regards with contempt, rather than anger, the opposition and mistakes of others. But while men zealously maintain what they neither clearly comprehend nor entirely believe, they are shaken in their imagined faith by the opposite persuasion, or even doubts, of other men; and vent on their antagonists that impatience which is the natural result of so disagreable a state of the understanding. They then easily embrace any pretence for representing opponents as more or less capable of infamy, and can also find colour for connecting this violence with the interests of civil government, they can no longer be restrained from giving uncontrolled scope to vengeance and resentment. But surely, never extenuate was more unfortunate than that of founding persecution upon policy, or endeavouring, for the sake of peace, to settle an entire uniformity of opinion in questions, which of all others are least subjected to the criterion of human reason. The universal and uncontradicted preconception of one opinion by religious subjects can be owing at first to the stupid ignorance and barbarism of the people, who never indulge themselves in any speculation or inquiry; and there is no expedient for maintaining that uniformity, so stubbornly sought after, but by banishing for ever from every country the least sparks of science and cultivation. It may not, indeed, appear difficult to check, by a steady severity, the first beginnings of controversy; but besides that this policy exposes for ever the people to all the abject terrors of superstition, and the magistrate to the endless encroachments of ecclesiastics, it also renders men so delicate, that they can never endure to hear of opposition; and they will some time pay dearly for that false tranquillity in which they have been so long indulged. As healthful bodies are ruined by too nice a regimen, and are thereby rendered incapable of bearing the unavoidable incidents of human life; a people who never were allowed in time that their principles could be contested, fly out into the most outrageous viole where any event (and such events are common) produces a faction among their clergy, and gives rise to any differences in tenet or opinion. But whatever may be said in favour of persecution, the cases in which it can be admitted, and the errors to which it can be applied, are so few, and the extreme barbarity of such an attempt, it commonly proves ineffectual to the purpose intended; and serves only to make men more obstinate in their persuasion, and to increase the number of their professed enemies. The melancholy with which the fear of defeat, torture, and persecution, inspires the sectaries, is the proper disposition for fostering religious zeal; the prospect of eternal rewards, when brought near, overpowers the dread of temporal punishments; the glory of martyrdom stimulates all the most furious zealots, especially the leaders and preachers: where a violent animosity is excited by oppression, men naturally pass from hating the persons of their tyrants, to a more violent adherence of their doctrines: and the spectators, moved with pity towards the supposed martyrs, are easily seduced to embrace those principles which can inspire men with a constancy that appears almost superhuman. Open the door to toleration, men can and will relaxes among the sectaries; their attachment to their particular modes of religion decays; the common occupations and pleasures of life succeed to the armoury of disputation, and the same man who, in other circumstances, would have been a crier and certain to change his sect from the smallest prospect of favour and advancement, or even from the frivolous hope of becoming more fashionable in his principles. If any exception can be admitted to this maxim of toleration, it will only be where a theology altogether new, nowise connected with the ancient religion of the state, is imported from foreign countries, and may easily, at one blow, be extirpated without leaving the seeds of future innovation. But as this exception would imply some apology for the ancient pagan persecutions, or for the extirpation of Christianity in China and Japan; it ought surely, on account of this detested consequence, to be rather buried in eternal silence and oblivion.

Though these arguments appear entirely satisfactory, yet such is the subtilty of human wit, that Gardiner and the other enemies to toleration were not reduced to silence; and they still found topics on which to maintain the controversy. The doctrine, said they, of liberty of conscience, is founded on the most flagrant imperty, and supposes such an indifference among all religions, such an obscurity in the intellectual distinctions of church and state, that it is not only impossible to distinguish between the sectaries of Heaven from the mere figments of human imagination. If the Divinity reveals principles to mankind, he will surely give a criterion by which they may be ascertained; and a prince, who knowingly allows these principles to be perverted or adulterated, is infinitely more criminal than if he gave permission for the vending of poison, under a pretense of food, to all his subjects. Persecution may, indeed, seem better calculated to make hypocrites than converts; but experience teaches us, that the habits of hypocrisy often turn into reality; and the children, at least, ignorant of the dissimulation of their parents, would be educated in the orthodox tenets of their religion.

It is absurd, in opposition to considerations of such unspreakable importance, to plead the temporal and frivolous interests of civil society; and if matters be thoroughly examined, every appeal to this topic will appear so universal, so certain in favour of toleration as by some it is represented. Where sects arise, whose fundamental principle on all sides is to execute, and abhor, and damn, and exterminate each other; what choice has the magistrate left, but to take part, and by rendering one sect entirely prevalent, restore, at least for a time, the public tranquility? The political body, being here sickly, must not be treated as if it were in a state of sound health; and an affected neutrality in the prince, or even a covert preference, may serve only to encourage the hopes of all the sects, and keep alive their animosity. The protestants, far from tolerating the religion of their ancestors, regard it as an impious and degrading heresy, and for the same minutes, which they were entirely masters, they enacted very severe, though not capital, punishments against all exercise of the catholic worship, and even against such as barely abstained from it. To these laws and examining officers are instances wanting of their endeavours to secure an imagined orthodoxy by the most rigorous executions; Calvin has burned Servetus at Geneva: Cranmer brought Arians and anabaptists to the stake; and if persecution of any kind be admitted, the most bloody and violent will surely be allowed the most justifiable, as the most effective. Imprisonments, fines, confiscations, whippings, severe, only to irritate the sects, without disabling them from resistance: but the most inhuman, the most cruel, and the gibbet, must soon terminate in the extermination or banishment of all the heretics inclined to give disturbance, and in the entire silence and submission of the rest.

The arguments of Gardiner, being more agreeable to the cruel bigotry of Mary and Philip, were better received; and though Pole pleaded, as is affirmed, the advice of the emperor, who recommended it to his daughter-in-law not to execute violence against the protestants, and desired her to consider his own example, who, after endeavouring through his whole life to exterminate hersy, had, in the end, repented nothing but confusion and disappointment, the schism was then there reigned, as it was determined to let loose the laws in their full vigour against the reformed religion; and England was soon filled with scenes of horror, which have ever since rendered the catholic religion the object of general detestation, and which prove, that no human depravity can equal revenge and cruelty covered with the mantle of religion.

The persecutors began with Rogers, prebendary of St. Paul's, a man eminent in his party for virtue as well as for learning. Gardiner's plan was first to attack men of that character, whom, he hoped, terror would bend to submission, and whose example, either of punishment or reformation, would naturally have influence on the multitude; but he found a perseverance and courage in Rogers, which it may seem strange to find in human nature, and of which all ages and all sects do nevertheless furnish many examples. Rogers, besides his own preservation, lay under other powerful temptations to compliance: he had a wife whom he tenderly loved, and ten children; yet such was his sincerity after his condemnation, that the pokers, it is said, waked him from a sound sleep when the hour of his execution was come. He had desired to see his wife before he died; but Gardiner told him, that he was a priest, and could not possibly have a wife; thus joining insult to cruelty. Rogers was burnt in Smithfield.\(^a\)

Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, had been tried at the same time with Rogers; but was sent to his own diocese to be executed. This circumstance was contrived to strike the greater terror to all his subjects. Persuaded, perhaps, that a sentence of condemnation to Hooper, who rejoiced in giving testimony, by his death, to that doctrine which he had formerly preached among them. When he was tied to the stake, a stool was set before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it: but, before he could rest his head upon it, the king, to merit by a recantation what he had done before, did not hold thus easily: all his lower parts were consumed before his vitals were attacked: one of his hands dropped off; with the other he continued to beat his breast: he was heard to pray and to exhort the people; till his tongue, swoln with the violence of his agony, could no longer permit him utterance. He was three quarters of an hour in torture, which he bore with inflexible constancy.\(^b\)

Sanders was burned at Coventry: a pardon was also offered him; but he rejected it, and embraced the stake, saying, "Welcome the cross of Christ! I welcome everlasting life!" Taylor, parson of Hadleigh, was punished by fire and sword, that he might致敬 his religious exertions and perseverance. When tied to the stake, he rehearsed a psalm in English: one of his guards struck him in the mouth, and bade him speak Latin: another, in a rage, gave him a strong blow only upon the head, which happily put an end to his torments.

There was one Philpot, Archdeacon of Winchester, inflamed with such zeal for orthodoxy, that having been engaged in dispute with an Arab, he spitted in his adversary's face to show the great detestation which he had entertained against that heresy. He afterwards wrote a treatise to justify this unmanly expression of zeal: he said, that he was led to it in order to reform the infidels, and remove the concurrence of that horrid blasphemy, and to signify how unworthy such a miscreant was of being admitted into the society of any christian.\(^c\) Philpot was a protestant; and falling now into the hands of people as zealous as himself, but more powerful, he was condemned to the flames, and suffered at Smithfield. It seems to be almost a general rule, that in all religions, except the true, no man will suffer martyrdom who would not also inflict it willingly on all that differ from him. To such zeal for speculative opinions, is the cause of both.

The crime, for which almost all the protestants were condemned, was their refusal to acknowledge the real presence of the body and blood of Christ in the sacrament: this was the first of the accusations which these examples would strike into the reformers, finding the work daily multiply upon him, devoted the invidious office on others, chiefly on Bonner, a man of prophetic manners, and of a brutal character, who seemed to rejoice in the torments of the unhappy sufferers.\(^d\) He sometimes whipped the prisoners with his own hands, till he was tired with the violence of the exercise: he tore out the beard of a weaver who refused to renounce his religion; and that he might give him a specimen of burning, he held his hand to the candle till the sinews and veins shrunk and burst.\(^e\)

It is needless to be particular in enumerating the cruelties practised in England; for during the course of three years that these persecutions lasted: the savage barbarity on the one hand, and the patient constancy on the other, are so similar in all those martyrdoms, that the narrative of the greater terror in our flock; but it was a source of consolation to Hooper, who rejoiced in giving testimony, by his death, to that doctrine which he had formerly preached among them. When he was tied to the stake, a stool was set before him, and the queen's pardon laid upon it: but, before he could rest his head upon it, the king, to merit by a recantation what he had done before, did not hold thus easily: all his lower parts were consumed before his vitals were attacked: one of his hands dropped off; with the other he continued to beat his breast: he was heard to pray and to exhort the people; till his tongue, swoln with the violence of his agony, could no longer permit him utterance. diocese; and his appeal to Cardinal Pole was not atten-tended to. Ridley, Bishop of London, and Latimer, formerly Bishop of Worcester, two prelates celebrated for learning and virtue, perished together in the same flames at Oxford, and supported each other's constancy, which was the mutual exhortations. Latimer, when tied to the stake, called to his companion, "Be of good cheer, brother; we shall this day kindle such a torch in England, as, I trust in God, shall not be extinguished." The executioner, who had been so merciful, (for that clemency may more natu-really be ascribed to them than to the religious zealots,) as to tie bags of gunpowder about these prelates, in order to put a speedy period to their tortures: the explosion made the flames leap up in the face of the executioner, who was in his old age; Ridley continued alive during some time in the midst of the flames.

One Hunter, a young man of nineteen, an apprentice, having been seduced by a priest into a dispute, had unwisely desired the real presence. Suspected of his danger, he immediately absconded; but Bonner, laying hold of his father, threatened him with the greatest severities if he did not produce the young man to stand his trial. Hunter, hearing of the vexations to which his father was exposed, voluntarily surrendered himself to Bonner, and was condemned to the flames by that barbarous prelate.

The execution of him and his friends, though it was an example, with many others of like constancy, encouraged multitudes not only to suffer, but even to court and aspire to martyrdom.

We tender sex. itself, as they have commonly greater propensity to religion, produced many examples of the most inflexible courage in supporting the profession of it against all the fury of the persecutors. One execution, in particular, was remarkable; an oxidume, even at that time, excited astonishment by reason of their unusual barbarity. A woman in Guernsey being near the time of her labour when brought to the stake, was thrown into such agitation by the torture, that her belly burst, and she was delivered in the midst of the flames. One of the guards immediately snatched the infant from the fire, and attempted to save it; but a magistrate, who stood by, ordered it to be thrown back, being determined, he said, that the child should share the disgrace which sprung from so obstinate and heretical a parent.

The persons condemned to these punishments were not convicted of teaching, or dogmatizing contrary to the establishment of the church, or such persons as were suspected of heresies, or other crimes; but letters and articles being offered to them to subscribe, they were immediately, upon their refusal, condemned to the flames.

These instances of barbarity, so unusual in the nation, excited horror; constancy of mind was the object of admiration; and as men have a principle of equity engravèd in their minds, which even false religion is not able totally to obliterate, they were shocked to see persons of probity, of honour, of pius dispositions, exposed to punishments more severe than were inflicted on the greatest ruffians for crimes subservive of civil society.

To exterminate the whole protestant party, was known to be impossible; and nothing could appear more iniquitous, than to subject to tortures, which were the object of admiration; and as men have a principle of equity engravèd in their minds, which even false religion was not able totally to obliterate, they were shocked to see persons of probity, of honour, of pius dispositions, ex-burn them, without reading them, or showing them to any other person, should be esteemed rebels: and, without any further delay, be executed by martial law. From the state of the English government during that period, it is not so much the illegality of these proceedings, as their violence and their pernicious tendency, which ought to be the object of our censure.

We have thrown together almost all the proceedings against the Wight, though committed on during a course of three years: that we may be obliged, as little as possible, to return to such shocking violations and bar: arises. It is computed, that in that time two hundred and seventy-five persons were brought to the scaffold; besides those who were punished by imprisonments, fines, and confiscations. Among those who suffered by fire were five bishops, twenty-one clergy, eight lay gentlemen, eighty-four tradesmen, one hundred husbands, servants, and labourers, fifty-five women, and four children. This persevering cruelty appears astonishing; yet it is much inferior to what has been practised in other countries. A great author* computes, that in the Netherlands alone, from the time that the edict of Charles V. was promulgated against the reformers, there had been fifty thousand persons hanged, beheaded, burned alive, or burnt, an account of religion: and that in France the number had also been considerable. In both countries, in both ancient and modern times, the progress of the new opinions, instead of being checked, was rather forwarded, by these persecutions.The burning of heretics was a very natural method of recovering the public credit, and maintaining the Hierarchy, and little solicitation was requisite to engage the Pope to receive the strayed flock, from which he reaped such considerable profit: yet was there a solemn embassy sent to Rome, consisting of Sir Anthony Brown, created Viscount Montacute, the Bishop of Ely, and Sir Edward Carne; in order to carry the submissions of England, and beg to be re-admitted into the bosom of the catholic church! Paul V. had now brought to the stage those of the most haughty pontiffs that during several ages had been elevated to that dignity. He was offended that Mary still retained among her titles that of Queen of Ireland; and he affirmed, that it belonged to him alone, as he saw cause, either to erect new kingdoms or abolish the old: but to avoid all disputes with the new converts, he thought proper to erect Ireland into a kingdom, and he then admitted the title, as if it had been assumed from his concession. This was a usual artifice of the Popes, to give allowance to what they could not prevent,* and afterwards pretend that princes, while they exercised their own powers, were only acting by authority from the papacy. And though Pope Paul thought that by his submission, the English would be induced to come to the see before he would bestow it upon her, he found it prudent to proceed in a less haughty manner. Another point in discussion between the Pope and the English ambassadors was not so easily terminated. Paul insisted, that the property and possessions of the church should be restored to the utmost power: that whatever belonged to God could never by any law be converted to profane uses, and every person who detained such possessions was in a state of eternal damnation: that he would willingly, in consideration of the humble submissions of the English, make them a present of these ecclesiastical revenues; but such a concession exceeded his power, and the people might be certain that so great a patronage of holy things would be a perpetual anathema upon them, and would blast all their future felicity: that if they would truly show their filial piety, they must restore all the privileges of the Romish church, and Petrus had risen against the price among the rest; nor could they expect that this apostle would open to them the gates of paradise, while they detainted from him his patrimony on earth. These causes of contention were, he believed, removed to England, though they had little influence on the nation, operated powerfully on the queen; who was determined, in order to ease her conscience, to restore all the church lands which were still in the possession of the crown: and the more to display her zeal, she erected anew some convents and monasteries, notwithstanding the low condition of the exchequer. When this measure was debated in council, some members objected, that if such a considerable part of the revenue were deserted, the dignity of the crown would fall to decay; but the queen replied, that she preferred the salvation of her soul to ten such kingdoms as England. These imprudent measures would not probably have taken place so easily, had it not been for the death of Gardiner, which happened about this time: the great seal was given to Heathie, Archbishop of York; that an ecclesiastical might still be possessed of that high office, and be better able to wield authority, to forward the persecutions against the reformed.

These persecutions were now become extremely odious to the nation; and the effects of the public discontent appeared in the new parliament, summoned to meet at Westminster. A bill was passed, restoring to the church the tents and first fruits, and all the impropriations which remained in the hands of the crown; but though this matter directly concerned none but the queen herself, great opposition was made to the bill in the House of Commons. An application being made for a subsidy, during two years, and far two fifths, the latter was refused by the Commons; and many represented that the same authority, which computed the value of its revenue, was in vain to bestow riches upon it. The parliament rejected a bill for obliging the exiles to return, under certain penalties, and another for expunging from the public records the names of persons from being justices of the peace. The queen, finding the intractable humour of the Commons, thought proper to dissolve the parliament.

The spirit of opposition which began to prevail in parliament was the more likely to be vexatious to Mary, as she was otherwise in very bad humour, on account of her husband's favours, who, tired of her importunities, had grown jealous, and finding his authority extremely limited in England, had laid hold of the first opportunity to leave her, and had gone over, last summer, to the emperor in Flanders. The indifference and neglect of Philip, added to the disappointment in her imagined progamy, threw her into deep melancholy; and she gave vent to her spleen, by daily enforcing the persecutions against the protestants, and even by expressions of rage against all her subjects; by whom she knew herself to be hated, and whose opposition, in refusing an entire compliance with Philip, was the cause, she believed, why he had neglected his attentions to her, and afforded her so little of his love. This extraordinary increase of her resentment was the occasion of her being of the session of her council, and the queen was represented as having a son: Philip, who, for love and affection, and thesının of Mary, my God, that I have even spoken of the matter to thee. The queen, considerably distressed, was so far from being jealous of her, that she knew herself to be hated, and whose opposition, in refusing an entire compliance with Philip, was the cause, she believed, why he had neglected his attentions to her, and afforded her so little of his love. This extraordinary increase of her resentment was the occasion of her being of the session of her council, and the queen was represented as having a son: Philip, who, for love and affection, and the engage some Londoners to comply more willingly with her multiplied extortions, she passed an edict, prohibiting, for four months, the exporting of any English cloth or kerseys to the Netherlands; an expedition which procured a good market for such as had already sent any quantity of cloth thither. Her rapaciousness engaged her to give ends of sections of the woof, which he had entirely abandoned. The fencing against the pains and infirmities under which she laboured, occupied a great part of his time; and during the intervals, he employed his leisure either in examining the controversies of theology, which he had so much agitated, and to which he had hitherto considered only in a political light, or in imitating the works of renowned artists, particularly in mechanics, of which he had always been a great admirer and encourager. He is said to have been so much pleased with the construction of clocks and watches, he thence remarked, how impracticable the art was in which he had so much employed himself during his grandeur; and how impossible that he, who never could frame two machines that would go exactly alike, could ever be able to make all mankind concur in the same belief and opinion.

He survived his retreat two years.

The Emperor Charles had, very early in the beginning of his reign, found the difficulty of governing such distant dominions; and he had made his eldest son to be elected King of the Romans; with a view to his inheriting the imperial dignity, as well as his German dominions. But having afterwards enlarged his schemes, and formed plans of aggrandizing his family, he regretted that he must dismember such extensive states as he had acquired; and he showed himself entirely indifferent about her interests.

Philip was now become master of all the wealth of the new world, and of the richest and most extensive empire in Europe, by the voluntary resignation of the Emperor Charles V., who, though still in the vigour of his age, had taken a disgust to the world, and was determined to seek, in the tranquillity of retreat, for the most austere and laborious sorts of life. The emperor, he was eldest in the imperial succession, in the case of a resignation, the right devolved to the holy see, and it belonged to the Pope alone to appoint an emperor. The conduct of Paul was, in every thing, conformable to these lofty pretensions. He thundered always in the ears of all ambassadors, that he stood in no need of the assistance of any prince; that he was above all potenates of the earth; that he would not accept monarchical or temporal crowns, to pretend to a familiarity or equality with him; that it belonged to him to elect kings and emperors; and that, rather than submit to any thing below his dignity, he would set fire to the four corners of the world. He went so far as to say, in the presence of many persons, and even openly, in a public consistory, to say, that he would not admit any kings for his companions; they were all his subjects, and he would hold them under those feet: so saying, he stamped on the ground with his old and infirm limbs: for he was now past fourscore years of age.

The world could not forbear making a comparison between Charles V., a prince who, though educated amidst wars and intrigues of state, had prevented the decline of age, and had descended from the throne, in order to set apart an interval for thought and reflection, and a priest who, in the extremity of old age, exulted in his dominion; he was successor of those who had deposed kings and emperors; and that, rather than submit to any thing below his dignity, he would set fire to the four corners of the world. He went so far as to say, in the presence of many persons, and even openly, in a public consistory, that he would not admit any kings for his companions; they were all his subjects, and he would hold them under those feet: so saying, he stamped on the ground with his old and infirm limbs: for he was now past fourscore years of age.

between the two crowns seemed almost inevitable. Philip, though less warlike than his father, was no less ambitious; and he trusted to the intrigues of the cabinet, where he believed his caution and secrecy and prudence gave him the superiority, he should be able to subdue all his enemies, and extend his authority and dominion. For that purpose, as from the desire of settling his own empire, he wished to maintain peace with France; but when he found, that without sacrificing his honour it was impossible for him to overlook the hostile attempts of Henry, he prepared for war with such industry. In order to give himself the more advantage, he was desirous of embarking England in the quarrel; and though the queen was of herself extremely averse to that measure, he thought the declared fondness, which, notwithstanding repeated instances of his indifference, she still bore to him, would effectually second his applications. Had the matter indeed depended solely on her, she was incapable of resisting her husband's commands; but she had little weight with her council, still less with her husband, which was every day becoming more odious, seemed unable to maintain itself even during the most profound tranquillity, much more if a war were kindled with Spain. For her, as was the case in the same kind of thing, the government extremely unpopular. Crammer had long been retained prisoner; but the queen now determined to bring him to punishment; and in order the more fully to satisfy her ministers, she resolved to punish him for heresy, rather than for treason. He was cited by the Pope to stand his trial at Rome; and though he was known to be kept in close custody at Oxford, he was, upon his not apprizing the Pope of his removal, broached and burnt. Hence, Bishop of London, and Thurlby of Ely, were sent to degrate him; and the former executed the melancholy ceremony with all the joy and exultation which suited his savage nature. The implacable spirit of the queen, not satisfied with the eternal damnation of Crammer, which she believed inevitable, and with the execution of that dreadful sentence to which he was condemned, prompted her also to seek the ruin of his honour, and the injury of his name. Persons were employed to attack him, and to secure the government, against which he was sufficiently armed; but by flattery, insinuation, and address; by representing the dignities to which his character still entitled him, if he were driven to them, by a recommendation of the advantages and long enjoying those powerful friends whom his beneficent disposition had attached to him during the course of his prosperity. Overcome by the false love of life, terrified by the craft, and craft of those tortures which awaited him, he allowed, in an unguarded hour, the sentiments of nature to prevail over his resolution, and he agreed to subscribe the doctrines of the papal supremacy, and of the real presence, without any condition or reserve, which determined that this recantation should avail him nothing; and they sent orders that he should be required to acknowledge his errors in church before the whole people.

Carried to execution. Cranmer, whether that he had received a secret intimation of their design, or had repented of his weakness, surprised the audience by a contrary example, and, what seemed, the desire well approved of the obedience which he owed to his sovereign and the law; but this duty extended no further than to submit patiently to their commands, and to bear, without resistance, the expatriations they proposed upon him: that is, a superior duty, the duty which he owed to his country, to the Maker, obliged him to speak truth on all occasions, and not to relinquish, by a base denial, the holy doctrine which the Supreme Being had revealed to mankind; that there was one discourse in his life, of which, above all others, he severely repented; the insinuate declaration of faith to which he had the weakness to consent, and which the fear of death alone had extorted from him; that he took this opportunity of atoning for his error, by a sincere and open recantation; and was willing to seal, with his blood, that doctrine which he firmly believed to be communicated from Heaven: and that, as his hand had erred, by bringing his heart, it should first be punished, by a severe but just doom, and should first pay the forfeit of its own crime, amidst the insults of the catholics; and having now summoned up all the force of his mind, he bore their scorn, as well as the torture of his punishment, with singular fortitude. He gave himself up to his fate, and by the meekness of his countenance or motions, the least sign of weakness, or even of feeling, he held it in the flames till it was entirely consumed. His thoughts seemed wholly occupied with reflections on his former fault, and he called aloud several times, This hand has offended. Satisfied, to reduce that stone, he then discovered a serenity in his countenance; and when the fire attacked his body, he seemed to be quite insensible of his outward sufferings, and by the force of his sufferings, of his own guilt, and the strokes from his execution, which, by the meekness of his countenance or motions, the least sign of weakness, or even of feeling, he held it in the flames till it was entirely consumed. 300,000 pounds. Any considerable supplies could scarcely be expected from parliament, considering the present disposition of the nation; and as the war would sensibly diminish that branch arising from the customs, the finances, it was foreseen, would fall short even of the ordinary charges of government; and must still more prove unequal to the expenses of war. But though the queen and others pressed for the loans extorted from her subjects, these considerations had no influence with her; and in order to support her war-like preparations, she continued to levy money in the same manner, and only in the manner that had been practised. She obliged the city of London to supply her with 60,000 pounds on her husband's entry; she levied before the legal time the second year's subsidy voted by parliament; she issued anew many pernicious seals, by which she procured loans from her people; and having equipped a fleet, which she could not vitally by reason of the dearth of provisions, she seized all the corn she could find in Suffolk and Norfolk, without paying any price to the owners. By all these expedients, assisted by the power of pressing, she levied an army of ten thousand men, which she sent over to the Low Countries, under the command of the Earl of Pembroke. Meanwhile, in order to prevent any disturbances in the most considerable gentry were thrown into the Tower; and lest they should be known, the Spanish practice was followed; they either were carried thither in the night-time, or were hoodwinked and muffled by the guards who conducted them.

The King of Spain had assembled an army which, after the junction of the English, amounted to above sixty thousand men, conducted by Don Alberich, Duke of Savoy, one of the greatest captains of the age. The constable, Montmorency, who commanded the French army, had not half the number to oppose to him. The Duke of Savoy, after being bloodily repulsed, suddenly sat down before St. Quentin; as the place was weak and ill provided with a garrison, he expected in a few days to become master of it. But Admiral Coligny, governor of the province, thinking his honour interested to save so important a fortress, threw himself into St. Quentin, with some troops of French and Scottish gendarmes; and by his exhortations and example animated the soldiers to a vigorous defence. He could not obtain such favourably conditions, and were obliged to surrender at discretion.

The Duke of Guise, now holding Calais blockaded by sea and land, thought himself secure of succeeding in his enterprise, which France, during her greatest successes, had always regarded as impracticable, and had never thought of undertaking. Calais was in that age deemed an impregnable fortress; and as it was known to be the favourite of the English nation, by whom it could easily be succoured, the recovery of that place by France was considered as totally desperate. But Coligny had remarked that as the town of Calais was surrounded with marshes, which, during the winter, were impassable, except over a dyke guarded by two castles, St. Agatha and Newnann bridge, the English were not late accustomed, by the weakness of their finances, to dismiss a great part of the garrison at the end of autumns, and to recall them in the spring, at which time alone they judged their attendance necessary. On this circumstance he had founded the design of making a sudden attack on Calais: he had caused the place to be secretly viewed by some engineers, and a plan of the whole enterprise being found among his papers, it served, though he himself was made prisoner on the taking of St. Quentin, to suggest the project of that undertaking, and to direct the measures of the Duke of Guise.

Several bodies of troops defiled towards the frontiers on various pretences; and the whole being suddenly assembled, formed an army, with which Guise made an unexpected march towards Calais. At the same time a great number of French ships being ordered into the coast, were armed under colour of quietly providing the English, composed a fleet which made an attack by sea on the fortifications. The French assaulted St. Agatha with three thousand harquebusiers; and the garrison, though they made a vigorous defence, were soon obliged to abandon the place, and retreat to Newnann bridge.

The siege of this latter place was immediately undertaken, and at the same time the fleet battered the ravelin, which guarded the entrance of the harbour, by means of which the castles seemed entirely to become secure. The governor, Lord Wentworth, was a brave officer; but finding that the greater part of his weak garrison was enclosed in the castle of Newnann bridge and the ravelin, he ordered them to capitulate, and to join him in Calais, which, without their assistance, he was utterly unable to defend. The garrison of Newnann bridge was so happy as to effect the purpose; but that of the ravelin could not obtain such favourable conditions, and were obliged to surrender at discretion.

The Duke of Guise, now holding Calais blockaded by sea and land, thought himself secure of succeeding in his enterprise, but in order to prevent all accident, he delayed not a moment the attack of the place. He planted his batteries against the castle, where he made a large breach, and having ordered Amleot, Coligny's brother, to draw the fosse, he continued two months a violent assault, which succeeded; and the French made a lodgment in the castle. On the night following, Wentworth attempted to recover this post; but having lost two hundred men in a furious attack which he made upon it, he found his garrison so weak, that he was obliged to capitulate. Ham and Guernes fell soon after; and thus the Duke of Guise in eight days, during the depth of winter, made himself master of this strong fortress, that had cost Edward III. a siege of eleven months, at the head of a numerous army, which had that very year been victorious in the battle of Cressy. The English had held it above two hundred years; and as it gave them an easy entrance into France, it was regarded as the most important possession belonging to the crown. The joy of the French was extreme, as well as the glory acquired by Guise, who, at the time when all Europe imagined France to be sunk by the unfortunate battle of St. Quentin, had an impregnable fortress; and as it was, their allies the Spaniards, acquired possession of a place which no former King of France, even during the distractions of the civil wars between the houses of York and Lancaster, had most important possessions belonging to the crown. On the other hand, bereaved of this valuable fortress, murmured loudly against the imprudence of the queen and her council; who, after engaging in a fruitless war, for the sake of foreign interests, had thus exposed the nation to so severe a disgrace. A treasury exhausted by expenses, and burdened with debts, and people divided and debased; a sovereign negligent of her people’s welfare; were circumstances which, notwithstanding the fair offers and promises of Philip, gave them small hopes of receiving a change. And as the Scots, instigated by French councils, began to move on the borders, they were now necessitated rather to look to their defence at home, than to think of foreign conquests.

Thus, to pursue the peace which, in consequence of Scotland, King Edward’s treaty with Henry, took place between Scotland and England, the queen-dowager, on pretence of visiting her daughter and her relations, made a journey to France, and she carried along with her the Earl of Huntley, Sutherland, Marshall, and many of the principal nobility. Her secret design was to take measures for engaging the Earl of Arran to resign to her the government of the kingdom; and as her brothers, the Duke of Aumale, had uncontrolled influence in the court of France, she easily persuaded Henry, and by his authority the Scottish nobles, to enter into her measures. Having also gained Camery of Kinnard, Panler, Bishop of Ross, and Gavin Hamilton, commendator of Kilwinning, three creatures of the governor’s, she persuaded them, by their means, to consent to this resolution; and when every thing was prepared for her purpose, she took a young man to Scotland, and passed through England in her way thither. Edward received her with great respect and civility; though he could not forbear attempting to renew the old treaty for his marriage with her daughter: a written answer, he said, so happily calculated for the tranquillity, interest, and security of both kingdoms, and the only means of insuring a durable peace between them. For his part, the queen-dowager, he never could think of marrying a princess of a family so full of aristocracy, and great offices, the proper means of gaining a young princess, had had recourse to arms and violence, and had constrained the Scottish nobility to send their sovereign into the kingdom; and in order to induce this kingdom in protecting their liberty and independence.

When the queen-dowager arrived in Scotland, she found the governor very unwilling to fulfill his engagements; and after many delays and disputes she, at last, persuaded him to resign his authority. But finding that the majority of the young princess was approaching, and that the queen-dowager had gained the affections of all the principal nobility, he thought it meet to submit to her bargain and having stipulated that he should be declared next heir to the crown, and should be freed from giving any account of his past administration, he placed her in possession of the power; and she thenceforth assumed the title of Regent. It was a usual saying of this princess, that provided she could render her friends happy, and could insure to herself a good reputation, she was entirely indifferent what befell her; and though this sentiment is generally purposely held in contempt, when it is extended to the whole and exclusively and wholly on secular motives, it discovers a mind well calculated for the government of kingdoms. D’Ozel, a Frenchman, celebrated for capacity, had attended her as ambassador from France, but in reality served her with his counsels in so delicate an undertaking as the administration of Scotland; and this man had formed a scheme for laying a general tax on the kingdom, in order to support a standing military force, which might at once repel the invasions of foreign enemies, and check the turbulence of the Scottish nobles. But though some of the courtiers were gained over to this project, it gave great and general discontent to the people, and some circular letters, after ingenuously confessing, that it would prove pernicious to the kingdom, had the prudence to desist from it, and to trust entirely for her security to the good-will and affections of her subjects. This laudable purpose seemed to be the chief object of her administration; yet she was sometimes drawn from that, by the same mischievous advice which her brothers had acquired over her. When Mary commenced hostilities against that kingdom, Henry required the queen-regent to take part in the quarrel; and she sought to involve the convention of an act between himself and which she had acquired over her. When Mary commenced hostilities against that kingdom, Henry required the queen-regent to take part in the quarrel; and she sought to involve the convention of an act between herself and King Edward in de jure in de facto, which the sovereign was bound to ratify; and had her deputies sent to the Scottish parliament to assent at the ceremony, and to settle the terms of the contract.

The close alliance between France and Scotland threatened to become more closely connected with France, and to increase the influence of the latter kingdom, it was thought proper by Henry to celebrate the marriage between the young prince and the daughter of Mary; a deposition was sent to the Scottish parliament to assent at the ceremony, and to settle the terms of the contract.

The queen, therefore, found it necessary to summon a parliament, and to demand of them some supplies to her exhausted exchequer. And such an emergency usually gives great advantage in undertakings to the people, and as the parliament during this reign had shown, that where the liberty and independence of the kingdom was menaced with imminent danger, they were prone to entirely overawe the court; we shall naturally expect, that the late arbitrary methods of extorting money should at least be censured, and, perhaps, some remedy be for the future provided against them. The Commons were for the second time dissatisfied with the past, voted, besides a fifteenth, a subsidy of four shillings in the pound on land, and two shillings and eight-pence on goods. The clergy granted eight shillings in the pound, and also the subsidy of the laity, in four years, by equal portions.

The parliament also passed an act, confirming all the sales and grants of crown lands, which either were already made by the queen, or could be made during the seven ensuing years. It was easy to foresee, that in Mary’s present disposition and situation, this power would be followed by a great alienation of the royal demesnes; and nothing could be more contrary to the principles of good government, than to bestow an extensive authority, yet permit him to be reduced to beggary. This act met with opposition in the House of Commons. One Copley expressed his fears lest the queen, under colour of the power therein, might alter the succession, and alienate the crown from the lawful heir; but his words were thought irrelevant to her majesty: he was committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms; and though he had been allowed to offer his defence, he was not released till the queen was applied to for his pardon.

The English nation, during that whole reign, were under a sensible change, with regard only to the succession, but the life of the Lady Elizabeth. The violent hurt she by the queen bore to her broke out on every occasion; and it required all the authority of Philip, as well as her own great prudence, to prevent the fatal effects of it. The princess retired into the country; and knowing that she was surrounded with spies, she passed her time wholly in reading and study, undisturbed in no business, and saw very little company. While she remained in this situation, which for the present was melancholy, but which, under the circumstances, was the best which her life was afterwards so much distinguished, proposals of marriage were made to her by the Swedish ambassador, in his master's name. As her first question was, whether he was informed of these proposals? the ambassador told her, that his master thought, as he was a gentleman, it was his duty first to make his addresses to herself; and having obtained her consent, he would next, as a king, apply to her sister. But the princess would allow him to proceed no further; and the queen, after thanking her for this instance of duty, desired to know how she stood affected to the Swedish proposals.
Elizabeth, though exposed to many present dangers and mortalities, had the magnanimity to reserve herself for better fortune; and she covered her refusal with professions of a passionate attachment to a single life, which, she said, she infinitely preferred before any other.3 The princess showed like prudence in concealing her sentiments of religion, in complying with the present modes of worship, and in eluding all questions with regard to that delicate subject.

The marriage granted by parliament, enabled the queen to fit out a fleet of a hundred and forty sail, which being joined by thirty Flemish ships, and carrying six thousand land forces on board, was sent to make an attempt on the cost of France. ALady Jane, to whom the command was entrusted by the States General; Count de Clion; the lands forces by the Earls of Huntington and Rutland. But the equipment of the fleet and army was so dilatory, that the French got intelligence of the design, and were speedily in readiness for it. They had not the preparations so well guarded, as to render an attempt on that place impracticable; but finding at Conquest, they plundered and burnt the town, with some adjacent villages, and were proceeding to commit greater disorders, when Hermon, a Breton gentleman, at the head of some militia, fell upon them, put them to rout, and drove them to their ships with considerable loss. But a small squadron of ten English ships had an opportunity of amply revenging the loss they had sustained by Marloa and Thermes; Marshal de Clion, governor of Calais, had made an irruption into Flanders, with an army of fourteen thousand men; and having forced a passage over the river An, had taken Dunkirk and other towns; and now prepared to attack the port, but Count Elingmont coming suddenly upon him with superior forces, he was obliged to retreat; and being overtaken by the Spaniards near Gravelines, and finding a battle inevitable, he chose very skilfully his ground for the engagement. He fortified his left wing with all the precautions possible; and posted his right along the river An, which he reasonably thought gave him full security from that quarter. But the English ships, which were accidentally on the coast, being drawn by the noise of the firing, sailed up the river, and thanking the French, did such excursion by their artillery, that they put them to flight; and they made a complete victory.

Meanwhile the principal army of France, under the Duke of Guise, and that of Spain, under the Duke of Savoy, approached each other on the frontiers of Picardy, and as the two kings had come into their respective camps attended by the flower of their nobility, it was expected that some great and important event would follow from the emulation of these warlike nations. But Philip, though actuated by the ambition, possessed not the enterprising genius of a conqueror; and he was willing, not withstanding the superiority of his numbers, and the two great victories which he had gained at St. Quentin and Gravelues, to put a period to the war by treaty. Negociations were entered into for that purpose; and as the terms proposed by the two monarchs were somewhat wide of each other, the armies were put into winter-quarters till the princes could come to better agreement. Among other conditions, Henry demanded the restitution of Navarre to its lawful owners, Philip, that of Calais, and its territory to England; but in the midst of these negotiations, news arrived of the death of Mary; and Philip, no longer con-ected with England, began to relax in his firmness on that capital event. This was the only circumstance that could have made the death of that princess be regretted by the nation.

Mary had long been in a declining state of health; and having mistaken her dropy for a pregnancy, she had made use of an improper regimen, and her malady daily augmented. Every reflection now tormented her. The consciousness of being hated by her subjects, the prospect of Elizabeth's succession, apprehensions of the danger to which the catholic religion stood exposed, detection for the loss of Calais, concern for the ill state of her affairs, and, above all, anxiety for the absence of her husband, who she knew intended soon to depart for Spain, and to settle there during the remainder of his life: all these melancholy reflections preyed upon her mind, and threw her into a lingering fever, of which she died, after a short and unfortunate reign of five years, four months, and eleven days.

It is not necessary to employ many words in drawing the character of this princess. She possessed few qualities either estimable or amiable; and her person was as little engaging as her behaviour and address. Obstinate, bigotry, violence, rapacity, malignity, were the banes of every circumstance of her character took a tincture from her had temper and narrow understanding. And amidst that complication of vices which entered into her composition, we shall scarcely find any virtue but sincerity, a quality which she seems to have maintained through her whole life; except in the beginning of her reign, when the necessity of her affairs obliged her to make some promises to the protestants, which she certainly never intended to perform. But in these cases a weak bigotted woman, under the government of priests, easily finds casuistry sufficient to justify to herself the violation of a promise. She appears also, as well as her father, to have been susceptible of friendships and enmities, too capricious and inconstant which were so remarkable in the conduct of that monarch. To which we may add, that in many circumstances of her life she gave indications of resolution and vigour of mind. A quality which seems to have been inherent in her family.

Cardinal Pole had long been sickly, from an intermitting fever; and he died the same day with the queen, about sixteen hours after her. The benign character of this prelate, the modesty and humanity of his deportment, made him be universally beloved; insomuch, that in a nation where the most furious persecution was carried on, and where the most violent religious factions prevailed, entire justice, even by most of the reformers, has been done to his merit. The haughty pontiff, Paul IV., had entertained some prejudices against him; and when England declared war against Henry, he availed this as the opportunity of revenge; and revoking Pole's legatine commission, appointed in his room Cardinal Peyp, an Observantine friar, and confessor to the queen. But Mary would never permit the new legate to act upon the com-mision; and Pole was afterwards obliged to restore Cardinal Pole to his authority.

There occur a few general remarks, besides what have already been made in the course of our narration, with regard to the general state of the kingdom during the reign. The naval power of England was then so inconsiderable, that fourteen thousand pounds being ordered to be applied to the fleet, both for repairing and victualing it, it was computed that ten thousand pounds a year would leave a profit to bear all necessary charges.\(^5\) No arbitrary proceedings of the queen above mentioned, joined to many monopolies granted by this process, as well as by her father, checked the growth of commerce; and though all other successes in Europe, they were either not permitted, or did not find it necessary, to proceed in so tyrannical a manner. Acts of parliament, both in the last reign and in the beginning of the present, had laid the same impositions on the merchants of the still-undefined colonies; yet it was not till immediately after her marriage, complied with the solicitations of the emperor, and, by her prerogative, suspended those laws.\(^6\) Nobody in that age pretended to question this exercise of power, and it is only by the collection of public papers that it is handed down to us.

An absurd law had been made in the preceding reign, that the man of one making could not alter his will, unless he had served an apprenticeship of seven years. The law was repealed in the first year of the queen; and this plain reason given, that it had occasioned the decay of manufactures, and had found the trade and several towns.

It is strange that Edward's law should have been revived during the reign of Elizabeth; and still more strange that it should still subsist.

The passage to the exchange had been discovered by the English during the last reign; and a beneficial trade with Muscovy had been established. A solemn embassy was sent by the Czar to Queen Mary. The ambassadors were shipped over on the coast of Scotland; but being hospitably entertained there, they proceeded on the journey, and were received at London with great pomp and solemnity.\(^7\) This seems to have been the first intercourse which that empire had with any of the western potentates of Europe.

A law was passed in this reign,\(^8\) by which the number of horses, arms, and furniture was fixed, which each person, according to the extent of his property, should be provided with for the defence of the kingdom. A man of a thousand pounds a year, for instance, was obliged to maintain at his own charge six horses fit for demi-lances, of which three at least to be furnished with sufficient harness, saddle, and other weapons proper for the demi-lances; and ten horses fit for light horsemen; with furniture and weapons proper for them: he was obliged to have forty corslets furnished; fifty alman revets, or, in summer, coats of plate or bucklers; forty pikes, thirty long bows, thirty shafts of arrows, thirty steel caps or skulls, twenty black hussards, and twenty morons or sallets.

joy, that the sceptre had passed into the land of Eliza-Queen's popu- beth. That princess had discovered great prudence in her conduct, during the reign of her sister; and as men were notable of the unmita-danger to which she was every moment exposed, compassion towards her situation, and concern for her safety, rendered her, to an uncommon degree, the favourite of the people of England, for a few days before Mary's death; and when he came, Archbishop of York, then chancellor, notified to them that event, scarcely an interval of regret appeared; and the two Houses immediately resounded, with the piercing note of joy, with which they expressed the gladness and glory which, during its whole course, so uniformly attended it.

Elizabeth was at Hatfield when she heard of her sister's death; and after a few days, she went thence to London, through crowds of people, who strove with each other in giving her the strongest testimony of their affection. On her entrance into the Tower, she could not forbear reflecting on the happy situation in which she found herself, and that which a few years before had attended her, when she was conducted to that place as a prisoner, and lay there exposed to all the bigoted malignity of her enemies. She must not forget the gratitude she seemed to have for the deliverance which the Almighty had granted her from her bloody persecutors; a deliverance, she said, no less miraculous than that which Daniel had received from the lion's den. A frequent visit to the Tower, and the prospect which she enjoyed of the present grandeur seems to have been the last circumstance in which she remembered any past hardships and injuries. With a prudence and magnanimity truly laudable, she buried all offences in oblivion, and received with affability even those who had acted against her. Her present state and situation, led Sir Harry Bemmell himself, to whose custody she had been committed, and who had treated her with severity, never did, during the whole course of her reign, any effects of resentment. Yet was not that gratitude reason which she gave to the messenger and undistinguishing. When the bishops came in a body to make their obsequies to her,
She expressed to all of them sentiments of regard; except to Donner, from whom she turned aside, as from a man polluted with blood, who was a just object of horror to every heart susceptible of humanity.

After employing a few days in ordering her domestic affairs, Elizabeth was now ready to attend a public service;
its nature and import were that Her Royal Highness, the wife of Henry VIII., must be called, in the name of the king, to the queen's court, and to attend the coronation of the Duke of Ferrara, his ambassador at London, to make proposals of marriage to the queen; and she offered to procure from Rome a dispensation for that purpose. But Elizabeth soon came to the resolution of declining the proposal. She saw that the nation had entertained an extreme avenue to the Spanish alliance, during her sister's reign; and that one great cause of the popularity which she herself enjoyed, was the friendship which had so happily com<snip>
on protestants all preterest in civil offices and the militia, the church and the universities, both to secure her own authority, and to render her religion entirely predominant.

The education of Elizabeth, as well as her interest, led her to favour the Reformation; and she remained not long in suspense with regard to the party which she should espouse. During the struggle she resolved to proceed by gradual and sure steps, and not to imitate the example of Mary, in encouraging the bigotry of her party to make immediately a violent invasion on the established religion. She thought it requisite, however, to discover such symptoms of her intentions, as might give encouragement to the protestants, so much depressed by the late violent persecutions. She immediately recalled all the exiles, and gave liberty to the prisoners who were confined on account of religion. We are told of a pleasure of one Ramsford on this occasion, who said to the queen, that he had a petition to present her, in behalf of other prisoners, called Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John: she readily replied, that it was her pleasure to consult the prisoners themselves, and to learn of them whether they desired that liberty which he demanded for them.

Elizabeth also proceeded to exert, in favour of the remnants of some acts of power, which were authorized by the extent of royal prerogative during that age. Finding that the protestant teachers, irritated by persecution, broke out in a furious attack on the ancient superstition, and that they were supported by armed and armed men, she published a proclamation, by which she inhibited all preaching without a special licence, and though she dispensed with these orders in favour of some preachers of the new sect, she took care that those should see to the most calm and moderate of the party. She also suspended the laws, so far as to order a great part of the service, the litany, the Lord's prayer, the creed, and the gospels, to be read in English, having first published injunctions that all the churches should conform themselves to the practice of her own chapel, she forbade the hoste to be any more elevated in her presence; an innovation which, however frivolous it may appear, implied the most material consequences.

These declarations of her intentions, concouring with preceding suspicions, made the bishops foresees, with certainty, a revolution in religion. They therefore refused to officiate at her coronation; and it was with some difficulty that the Bishop of Carlisle was at last prevailed on to perform the ceremony. When she was conducted through London, amidst the joyful acclamations of her subjects, she concealed her person by the eagle, on one of the triumphal arches, and presented to her a copy of the Bible. She received the book with the most gracious deportment, placed it next her bosom, and declared to the assembled clergy in which the clergy had that day given her of their attachment, that present was by far the most precious and most acceptable. Such were the innocent artifices by which Elizabeth insinuated herself into the affections of her subjects. Open in her address, gracious and affable in all public appearances, she rejoiced in the concourse of her subjects, entered into all their pleasures and amusements, and without departing from her dignity, which she knew well how to preserve, she acquired a popularity beyond what any of her predecessors or successors ever could attain. Her own sex exulted, to see a woman hold the reins of empire with such prudence and fortitude: and while a young princess of the first rate, (for that was her age at her accession,) who possessed all the graces and insinuation, not only all the beauty, of her sex, courted the affections of individuals by her civilities, of the public by her services, her authority was confirmed by the real bands of law and religion, appeared to be derived entirely from the choice and inclination of the people.

A sovereign of this disposition was not likely to offend her subjects by any useless or violent exertions of power; and Elizabeth, though she threw out such hints as encouraged the protestants, delayed the entire change of religion till the meeting of the parliament which was summoned to assemble. The elections had gone entirely against the catholics, who seem not indeed to have availed themselves of their great stronghold of superiority, and the Houses met, in a disposition of gratifying the queen in every particular which she could desire of them. They began the session with a unanimous declaration, that the queen was so much moved with her regard to the word of God, as the common and statute laws of the realm, the calm, the undoubted, and true heir to the crown, lawfully descended from the blood-royal, according to the order of succession settled in the 35th of Henry VIII.

This act of recognition was probably dictated by her zeal herself and her ministers; and she showed her magnanimity, as well as moderation, in the terms which she employed on that occasion. She followed not Mary's practice in declaring the validity of her mother's marriage; or in expressly repealing the act formerly made against her own legitimacy; she knew that this attempt must be attended with reflections on her father's memory, and on his conduct as well as the hers. She might have thought it sensible, that Henry's divorce from Anne Boleyn was merely the effect of his usual violence and cuprice, she scorned to found her title on any act of an assembly which had been dissolved for a cause which would involve variable, servile, and inquietious decisions. Satisfied, therefore, in the general opinion entreated with regard to this fact, which appeared the more undisguised, the less a difficulty to her anxiety, she found no occasion to acquire; she took possession of the throne, both as her birthright, and as insured to her by former acts of parliament; and she never appeared anxious to distinguish the succession.

The first bill brought into parliament, with a view of trying their disposition on the head of religion, was that for suppressing the monasteries lately erected, and for restoring the tithes and first-fruits to the queen. This point being brought without much debate, by bills then introduced, annexing the supremacy to the crown; and though the queen was there denounced as heresy, not lead, of the church, it conveyed the same extensive power, as the crown for the suppression of heresy. She had the power acquired; she took possession of the throne, both as her birthright, and as insured to her by former acts of parliament; and she never appeared anxious to distinguish the succession.

Such were the innocent artifices by which Elizabeth insinuated herself into the affections of her subjects. Open in her address, gracious and affable in all public appearances, she rejoiced in the concourse of her subjects, entered into all their pleasures and amusements, and without departing from her dignity, which she knew well how to preserve, she acquired a popularity beyond what any of her predecessors or successors ever could attain. Her own sex exulted, to see a woman hold the reins of empire with such prudence and fortitude: and while a young princess of the first rate, (for that was her age at her accession,) who possessed all the graces and insinuation, not only all the beauty, of her sex, courted the affections of individuals by her civilities, of the public by her services, her authority was confirmed by the real bands of law and religion, appeared to be derived entirely from the choice and inclination of the people.

HISTORY OF ENGLAND. [Chap. XXXVIII. A.D. 1558.} once gave the crown alone all the power which had formerly been claimed by the Popes, but which even these urging prelates had never been able fully to exercise, was now recognized by the nation as the situation.

Whoever refused to take an oath, acknowledging the queen's supremacy, was incapacitated from holding any office; whoever denied the supremacy, or attempted to deprive the queen of that prerogative, forfeited, for the first time, all his goods and lands, and for the second, was subjected to the penalty of a preunium; but the third offence was declared treason. These punishments, however severe, were less rigorous than those which were formerly inflicted against kings of this reign of her father and brother.

in liked cases.

A law was passed, confirming all the statutes enacted in King Edward's time with regard to religion: the nomination of bishops was given to the crown without any election of the chapters: the queen was empowered, on the vacancy of any see, to seize all the temporalities, and to bestow on the bishop elect an equivalent in the impropriations belonging to the crown. This determined privilege was common in much inferior value, thus the queen, amidst all her concern for religion, followed the example of the preceding reformers, in committing depredations on the ecclesiastical revenues.

The bishops were prohibited from alienating their revenues, and from letting leases longer than twenty-one years or three lives. This law seemed to be meant for securing the property of the church; but as an example of the real and principal objects of church are not the revenues, but the duties.

This method of pillaging the church was not remedied till the beginning of James I. The present depression of the clergy exposed them to all injuries; and the latter never stopped till they had reduced the church to such poverty, that her plunders was no longer a compensation for the odium incurred by it.

A solemn public disputation was held during this session, in presence of Lord Keeper Bacon, between the divines of the protestant and those of the catholic commun. The champions appointed to defend the religion of the sovereign, were, as in all former instances, entirely triumphant; and the popish disputants, being pronounced refractory and obstinate, were even punished by imprison-
t. Imboldened by this victory, the protagonists were therefore the last and most important step, and brought into parliament a bill for abolishing the mass, and re-establishing the charge of the fifteenth of a pound on all estates, as well as against those who departed from this mode of worship, as against those who absented themselves from the church and the sacraments. And thus in one session, the denomination, tumult, or clamour, was the whole system of religion altered, on the very commencement of a reign, and by the will of a young woman, whose title to the crown was by many thought liable to great objections; an event which, though it may appear surprising to men in the present age, was every where expected, on the first intelligence of Elizabeth's accession.

The Commons also made a sacrifice to the queen, more difficult to obtain than that of any of articles of faith: they voted a subsidy, during her pleasure, on the land, the pound and shilling and eight pence on moveables, together with two fifteenths.* The House, in no instance, departed from the most respectful deference and complaisance towards her Majesty; for though she had been accustomed to order them, on her conclusion of the session, to fix her choice of a husband, could not, they supposed, be very disagreeable to one of her sex and age. The address was ouched in the most respectful expressions; yet met with a refusal from the queen. She told the speaker, that as this application was made in the House of Commons in the terms, only recommending marriage, without pretending to direct her choice of a husband, she could not take offence at the address, or regard it otherwise than as a new instance of their affectionate attachment to her: that any further interposition on their part would be considered as an encumbrance; much more, at present, would she persevere in this sentiment, when the charge of a great kingdom was committed to her, and her life ought to be entirely dedicated to the interests of religion, and the happiness of her subjects: that as England was her husband, wedded to her by this pledge, (and here she showed her finger with the same gold ring upon it with which she had solemnly betrothed herself to the kingdom at her inauguration,) so all Englishmen were her children; and while she was employed in rearing or governing such a family, she could not deem herself burdened, or her life useless and unprofitable: that if she ever entertained any thoughts of choosing her subjects, the care of her subjects' welfare would still be uppermost in her thoughts; but she would live and die a virgin, she doubted not but Divine Providence, seconded by her laws, and measures, would effectually prevent her from all dispute with regard to the succession, and secure them a sovereign, who, perhaps, better than her own issue, would imitate her example, in loving and cherishing her people; and that, for her part, she desired that no higher character, or fairer remembrance of her, should be transmitted to posterity, than to have this inscription engraved on her tombstone, when she should pay the last debt to nature: * Here lies Elizabeth, who lived and died a marden queen.4

After the prorogation of the parliament,8 the laws enacted with regard to religion were put in execution, and met with little opposition from any quarter. The liturgy was again introduced in the vulgar version, and the oath of supremacy was tendered to the clergy. The number of bishops had been reduced to fourteen by a sickly season which preceded; and all these, except the Bishop of Landaff, having refused compliance, were degraded from their sees: but of the inferior clergy throughout all England, where there are near 10,000 parishes, only eighty rectors and vicars, fifty prebendaries, were deprived of their incomes: the church, to their and the temporal losses, sacrificed their livings to their religious principles.8

Those in high ecclesiastical stations, being exposed to the eyes of the public, seem chiefly to have placed a point of honour in their independence; whereas, in the lower estates, in the former change introduced by Mary, appear to have been much more rigid and conscientious. Though the catholic religion, adapting itself to the senses, and enjoying observances which enter into the common train of life, does at present lay faster hold on the mind than the reformed, which, being chiefly spiritual, resembles more a system of metaphysics; yet was the proportion of real, as well as of knowledge, during the first ages after the Reformation, much greater on the side of the protestants. The catholics continued, ignorantly and supinely, in their ancient belief, or rather their ancient practices;
but the reformers, obliged to dispute on every occasion, and inflamed to a tenaciousness, long as they did not be persecution, had strongly attached themselves to their tenets; and were ready to sacrifice their fortunes, and 4 This parliament also granted a sum of £12,000 for the deities of tonnage and poundage: but this concession was at that time regarded only as a matter of convenience, and without any intention to confirm the principle. But there was another exertion of power which she practised, and which must be a source of grief to every good subject. In the published laws, and in the publicacts, many acts, may be apt to think a little extraordinary.

Her sister, after the conclusion of the war with Spain, imposed four marques on each ton of wine imported,
and increased the poundage on all moveables.
In Elizabeth continued these impositions as long as she thought proper ever. The parliament, who had as paid an opposition of resentment in this, when they had voted the tonnage and poundage, thought proper to make any mention of them. They knew that the sovereign, during that age, pretended to have the laws and regulations of foreign trade, and that their interfering with that prerogative would have been on their part a hostility, not dissimulable. See Echols, vol. i. p. 137, 138. We know certainly from the statutes and from royal proclamations, that no

even their lives, in support of their speculative and abstract principles.

The forms and ceremonies still preserved in the English liturgy, as they bore some resemblance to the ancient service, tended further to reconcile the Catholics to the established religion; and as the queen permitted no other mode of worship, and at the same time struck out every thing that could be offensive to them in the new liturgy, even those who were adherent to the Roman communion made no scruple of attending the established church. Had Elizabeth gratified her own inclinations, the exterior appearance, which is the chief circumstance with the people, would still have been more agreeable between the new and the ancient form of worship. Her love of state and magnificence, which she affected in every thing, inspired her with an inclination towards the pomp of the Catholic religion; and it was merely in compliance with the prejudices of her party, that she gave up either images or the addresses to saints, or prayers for the dead. Some foreign princes interposed, to procure the Romanists the privilege of separate assemblies in particular cases, but the queen would not comply with their request; and she represented the manifested danger of disturbing the national peace by a toleration of different religions.

Peace with France While the queen and parliament were considering the terms of settling the public religion, the negotiations for a peace were still conducted, first at Cercacamp, then at Chatea-Cambresis, between the ministers of France, Spain, and England; and Elizabeth, though anxious to have reason not equally to sacrifice one side in the transactions. Philip employed his utmost efforts to procure the restitution of Calais, both as bound in honour to indemnity England, which, merely on his account, had been drawn into the war, and as engaged in interest to remove France to a distance from his frontiers in the Low Countries. So long as he entertained hopes of espousing the queen, he delayed concluding a peace with Henry; and now, when the change of religion in England deprived him of all such hopes, his ministers hastened to offer a proposal, which may be regarded as reasonable and honourable. Though all his own terms with France were settled, he deemed willing to continue the war till she should obtain satisfaction; provided she would stipulate to adhere to the Spanish alliance, and continue hostilities against Henry during the course of six years; but Elizabeth, after consulting with her ministers, wisely rejected that proposal. She was sensible of the low state of her finances; the great debts contracted by her father, brother, and sister; the disorders introduced into every part of the administration; the divisions by which her people were divided, and that nothing could restore tranquillity during some years could bring the kingdom into a flourishing condition, or enable her to act with dignity and vigour in her transactions with foreign nations. She, therefore, communicated the true solution, to Henry put upon Calais, and the impossibility, during the present emergency, of recovering it by treaty; she was willing rather to suffer that loss, than submit to such a dependence on Spain, as she must expect to fall into, if she continued pertinaciously in her present demand. She ordered, therefore, her ambassadors, Lord Effingham, the Bishop of Ely, and Dr. Wotton, to conclude the negotiation, and to settle a peace with Henry, on any reasonable terms. Henry offered to stipulate a marriage between the eldest daughter of the dauphin, and the eldest son of Elizabeth; and to engage for the restitution of Calais as the dowry of that princess; but as the queen was sensible that this treaty would be unfavorable to the world a misled upon more equitable, at least more plausible, conditions. It was at last agreed, that Henry should restore Calais at the expiration of eight years; that in case of failure, he should be compelled to take a perpetual resolution, of no more with longer. Henry acquiesced in the terms which were proposed to him, and the negotiation was brought to a conclusion. The queen's title to Calais still remain; but he should find the security of seven or eight foreign merchants, not natives of France, for the payment of this sum; that he should, even in the event of hostages till that security were provided; that if Elizabeth should make the pretended peace with France, the Scotland during the interval, she should forfeit all title to Calais; but if Henry made war on Elizabeth, he should be obliged immediately to restore that fortress. All men of penetration easily saw that these stipulations were but a colourable pretence for abandoning Calais; but they excused the queen's conduct, out of the necessity of her affairs; and they even extolled her prudence in submitting, without further struggle, to that necessity. A peace with Scotland was a necessary consequence of that with France.

Philip and Henry terminated hostilities by a mutual restitution of all places taken during the course of the war; and Philip espoused the Princess Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the brother of the youngest of Henry's children. The Duke of Savoy married Margaret, Henry's sister, and obtained a restitution of all his dominions of Savoy and Piedmont, except a few towns retained by France. And thus general tranquillity seemed to be restored to Europe.

But though peace was concluded between France and England, there soon appeared a queen and ground of quarrel, of the most serious nature; Mary, Queen of Scots, and which was afterwards attended with the most important consequences. The two marriages of Henry VII. that with Catherine of Aragon, and that with Anne Boleyn, were incompatible with each other; and it was a mighty point in the negotiations that both were regarded as valid and legal: but still the birth of Elizabeth lay under some disadvantages, to which that of her sister Mary was not exposed. Henry's first marriage had obtained her a crown of great, if not of ecclesiastical, which were then acknowledged in England; and it was natural for Protestants, as well as Romanists, to allow, on account of the sincere intention of the parties, that their issue ought to be regarded as legitimate. But his divorce and second marriage had been concluded in direct opposition to the see of Rome; and though they had been ratified by the authority both of the English parliament and convocation, and convention, were strongly attached to the catholic communion, and who reasoned with great strictness, were led to regard them as entirely invalid, and to deny altogether the queen's right of succession. The next heir of blood was the Queen of Scots, now married to the dauphin; and the great power of that princess, joined to her plausible title, rendered her a formidable rival to Elizabeth. The King of France had secretly been soliciting at Rome a bull of excommunication against the queen; and she had been beholden to the good offices of Philip, who, from interest more than either friendship or generosity, had negociated in her favour, and had successfully opposed the pretensions of Henry. But the French ambassador, finding with this repulse: the Duke of Guise, and his brothers, thinking that it would much augment their credit, if their niece should bring an accession of England, as she had already done to the crown of France, engaged the king not to neglect the claim, and by their persuasion, he ordered his son and daughter-in-law to assume openly the arms as well as title of England, and to quarter these arms on all their equipages, furniture, and liveries. When the English ambassador complained of this injury, he could obtain nothing but an evasive answer; that as the Queen of Scots was descended from the blood royal of England, she was entitled, by the example of many princes, to assume the arms of England, and it was strongly argued by the French minister, that this practice had ever prevailed without permission being first obtained, and without making a visible difference between the arms, Elizabeth plainly saw, that this pretence was of the most specious kind, and that the rest of her sister Mary; and that therefore the King of France intended, on the first opportunity, to dispute her legitimacy and her title to the crown. Alarmed at the danger, she sent her ambassador to the court of France, to conclude the marriage of Mary and the Duke of Savoy, altered not her views. Being informed that his successor Francis II. still continued to assume, without reserve, the title of King of England, she began to consider him and her queen as her mortal enemies; and the present situation of affairs in Scotland afforded her a favourable opportunity, both of recovering the injury, and providing for her own safety. The murder of the cardinal primate at St. Andrews had deprived the Scottish catholics of a head, whose severity, courage, and capacity, had rendered him a safe and formidable opponent to any incursion into his kingdom; and the execution of the laws against heresy began thereupon to be more remiss. The queen-regent governed the kingdom by prudent and moderate counsels; and as she was not disposed to sacrifice the civil interests of the church to the demands of her bishops, her enemies, she deemed it more expedient to temporize, and to consort at the progress of a doctrine which she had not power entirely to repress. When informed of the death of Edward, and the accession of Mary to the crown of England, she entertained hopes, that the Scottish reformers, deprived of the countenance which they received from that powerful kingdom, would lose their ather with their prospect of success, and would gradually return to the faith of their ancestors. But the progress and revolutions of religion are little governed by the usual maxims of civil policy; and the event much disappointed the expectations of the regent. Many of the English clergy removed to France, and Holland, and Mary's government, took shelter in Scotland, where they found more protection, and a milder administration, and while they propagated their theological tenets, they filled the whole kingdom with a just horror against the cruelties of the Presbyterian form of government. They showed their disciples the fate which they must expect, if ever their adversaries should obtain an uncontrolled authority over them.

A harrily, moderate in its acquisitions of power and riches, was enabled to grant a toleration to sectaries, and the more it soiled the zeal of innovators by lenity and liberty, the more securely will it possess those advantages which the legal establishments bestow upon it. But where superstition has obtained, it must ever continue in the same height as that of Rome, persecution is less the result of bigotry in the priests, than of a necessary policy; and the rigour of law is the only method of repelling the attacks of innovators, besides religious zeal, have so many other motives, derived both from public and private interests, to engage them on the side of innovation. But though such overgrown hierarchies may long support themselves by these violent expedients, the time comes when severities tend to pass into despicableness, and make the breach more and more manifest through all bounds of reason and moderation. This crisis was now visibly approaching in Scotland; and whoever considers merely the transactions resulting from it, will be inclined to pronounce it fatal, while the additional and ever enlarges his view, and reflects on the situations, will remark the necessary progress of human affairs, and the operation of those principles which are inherent in human nature.

Reformation in Scotland.

Some heads of the reformers in Scotland, such as the Earl of Argyile, his son Lord Lorne, the Earls of Morton and Glencairne, Erskine of Dun, and others, observing the danger to which they were exposed, and desirous to propagate their principles, entered privately into a bond or association; and called themselves the Congregations of the Lord, in contumclusion to the established church, which they denounced the Congregation of Satan. The terror of the bond was as follows: 2 We, perceiving how Satan, in his members, the Antichrist of our time, do cruelly rage, seeking to overthrow and to destroy the gospel of Christ and his congregation, on that account, according to our whole duty, and in our Master's cause, even unto the death, being certain of the victory in him. We do therefore promise, before the Majesty of God and his congregation, that we, by his grace shall zealfully and diligently pummel our whole power, substance, and our very lives, to maintain, set forward, and establish the most blessed word of God and his congregation; and shall labour, by all possible means, to have faithful ministers, true and purely to minister Christ's gospel and sacraments to his people: we shall maintain them, nourish them, and defend them, the whole congregation of Christ, and every member thereof, by our whole power, and at the hazard of our lives, against Satan, and all wicked power, who are arrayed against the said congregation: unto which holy word and congregation we do join ourselves; and we forsake and renounce the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitions about it, and shall declare ourselves manifestly enemies thereto, by this faithful promise before God, testified to this congregation by our subscriptions. At Edinburgh, the third of December, 1557. 3

Had the subscribers of this zealous league been content only to demand a toleration of the new opinions; however incompatible their pretensions might have been with the policy of the church of Rome, they would have had the praise of opposing tyrannical laws, enacted to support an establishment prejudicial to civil society; but it is plain that they carried their views much further; and their practice immediately discovered the spirit by which they were actuated. Supported by the authority which they thought belonged to them as the congregation of the Lord, they ordained, that prayers in the vulgar tongue should be used in all the parish churches of the kingdom; and that all public prayers, that were scarcely practiced in private houses, till God should move the prince to grant public preaching by faithful and true ministers. Some bonds of association are always the forerunners of rebellion; and this violent invasion of the established religion was the actual commencement of it.

Before this league was publicly known or avowed, the clergy, alarmed with the progress of the Reformation, attempted to recover their lost authority by a violent exercise of power, which they were enabled to do, by the zeal and number of their enemies. Hamilton the primate seized Walter Mill, a priest of irreproachable life, who had embraced the new doctrines; and having tried him at St. Andrews, condemned him to the flames for heresy. Such general aversion was entertained against this barbarity, that it was some time before the bishops could prevail upon any one to act as a part of a civil judge, and pronounce sentence upon Mill; and even after the sentence had been pronounced, all the shops of St. Andrews being shut, no one would sell a rope to tie him to the stake, and the primate himself was obliged to furnish this implement. The man bore the torture with that courage, which, though usual on such occasions, is not always sufficient to arrest the ardour of the multitude. The people, to express their abhorrence against the cruelty of the priests, raised a monument of stones on the place of his execution; and as fast as the stones were removed by order of the clergy, they were again supplied from the voluntary zeal of the populace. It is in vain for men to oppose the severest punishment to the united motives of religion and public applause; and this was the last barbarity of the kind which the catholics had the power to exercise in Scotland.

Some time after, the people discovered their sentiments in such a manner as was sufficient to prognosticate to the priests the fate which was awaiting them. It was usual on the festival of St. Giles, the tutelar saint of Edinburgh, to carry in procession the image of that saint; but the protestants, in order to prevent the ceremony, found means, on the eve of the festival, to purloin the statue from the church; and the procession of the clergy, always appears supernatural and astonishing to the multitude. The people, to express their abhorrence against the cruelty of the priests, raised a monument of stones on the place of his execution; and as fast as the stones were removed by order of the clergy, they were again supplied from the voluntary zeal of the populace. It is in vain for men to oppose the severest punishment to the united motives of religion and public applause; and this was the last barbarity of the kind which the catholics had the power to exercise in Scotland.

proceeded with alacrity in openly soliciting subscriptions to their league; and the death of Mary of England, with the accession of Elizabeth, which happened about this time, contributed to increase their hopes of final success in their undertaking. They ventured to present a petition to the regent, craving a reformation of the church, and of the worship, sanctioning, and detectable lives of the prelates and ecclesiastics. They framed a petition, which they induced her to sign, and, in short, after persuading that they could not communicate with the damnable idolatry and intolerable abuses of the papistical church, they desired that the laws against heretics should be executed by the civil magistrate alone, and that the Scripture should be made use of, and their opinions examined. The regent petitioned the convocation, and insisted that prayers should be said in the vulgar tongue, and that bishops should be chosen with the consent of the clergy of the diocese, and priests with the consent of the parochians. The regent prudently temporized between these parties; and as she aimed at procuring a matrimonial crown for her son-in-law, the dauphin, she was, on that as well as other accounts, unwilling to come to extremities with either of them.

But after this concession was obtained, she received orders from France, probably dictated by the violent spirit of her brothers, to proceed against the reformers, and to restore the royal authority by some signal act of power. She made the more eminent of the protestant teachers to be cited to appear before the council at Paris; they were called the following and other ministers in thither in great multitudes, in order to protect and counter- tend them, she entertained apprehensions of an insurrection, and, it is said, dissipated the people by a promise, that nothing should be done to the prejudice of the ministers of religion, whereas, however, she was pleased, by the execrable pronouncing rebels, on account of their not appearing: a measure which enraged the people, and made them resolve to oppose the regent's authority by force. They proceeded to extort from the clergy of the established religion.

In this critical time, John Knox arrived from Geneva, where he had passed some years in banishment, and where he had laboured, from his commence with Calvin, the highest fanatics of his sect, augmented by the native ferocity of his own character. He had been invited back to Scotland by the leaders of the Reformation; and mounting the pulpit at Perth, during the present ferment of men's minds, he declaimed with his usual vehemence against the idolatry and other abominations of the church of Rome, and incited his audience to extort their utmost zeal for its subversion. A priest was so incensed at his discourses, as to destroy in his rectory his images and relics, and prepare himself to say mass. The audience, exalted to a disposition for any furious enterprise, were as much enraged as if the spectacle had not been quite familiar to them: they attacked the priest with fury, broke the images in pieces, tore the pictures, overthrew the altars, scattered about the sacred vases; and left no implement of idolatrous worship, as they termed it, entire or undefended. They thence proceeded, with additional numbers and augmented rage, to the monasteries of the grey and black frars, which they pillaged in an instant: the Carthusians underwent the same fate: and the populace, not content with robbing and expelling the monks, vented their fury on the buildings which had been the receptacles of such abomination; and in a little time nothing but the walls of these edifices were left standing. The inhabitants of Coupar, in Fife, soon after initiated the example.

1 Knox, p. 127. 2 ibid. p. 127. 3b. 38. 42. 38. 46. 6. 7, etc. 4 These sanguinary acts afterwards moved the people to the utmost extremity, alarmed all the ministers of the regular establishment, but did not reprihend her with this breach of promise. If she had received it as the result of a similar spirit, they would probably have nothing but a remonstrance abroad to call the popes. If the people have sometimes maintained, that no law was to be kept with heretics, she probably thought she was not in the habit of speaking thus, and that no form of any kind, when applied to the regular establishment, did not cherish all the discontents of the regular establishment, do not reprihend her with this breach of promise. It the late violences; and some companies of Scotch soldiers, supposed to be in French pay, were quartered in the town: which the officers, as an imposition, and in addition to their pay, loudly complained against by the Congregation. It is asserted, that the regent, to justify these measures, declared that princes ought not to have their promises too strictly urged upon them; nor was any faith to be kept with heretics, that, if previous to the change ofRGB colour, she would willingly receive all these men of their lives and fortunes. But it is nowise likely that such expressions ever dropped from this prudent and virtuous prince. On the contrary, he had sounded to these violences disagreeable to her; that she was in this particular overruled by the authority of the French counsellors placed about her; and that she often thought, if the management of those affairs had been intrusted wholly to herself, she could easily, without force, have accommodated all differences. The Congregation, inflamed with their own zeal, and enraged by these disappointments, remained long in tranquillity. Even before they left Perth, and whilst they had no colour to complain of any violation of treaty, they had signed a new covenant, in which, besides their engagements to mutual defence, they vowed, in the name of God, to employ their whole power in destroying every thing that dishonoured his holy name; and this covenant was subscribed, among others, by Argyile, and the Prior of St. Andrew. These two leaders now deprived the Queen of Scotland, the author of this new violence, and openly joining their associates, than the complained, however doubtful, or rather false, of her breach of promise. The Congregation also, encouraged by this accession of force, gave themselves up entirely to the furious zeal of Knox, and renewed at Crail, Anstruther, and other places in Fifes, like depredations on the churches and monasteries with those formerly committed at Perth and Cupar. The regent, with matchless agility, having sent his army, finding their power so much increased, was glad to conclude a truce for a few days, and to pass over with her forces to the Lothians. The reformers besieged and took Perth; proceeded thence to Stirling, where they exercised their usual fury; and finding nothing able to resist them, they went their march to Dunbar, where she fortified herself, in expectation of a reinforcement from France. And as the Queen employed her partisans in representing to the people the dangerous consequences of this open rebellion; and she endeavoured to convince them, that the Lord James, under pretence of religion, had formed their destruction as a branch of the declaration of the title of the sovereign. By these considerations many were engaged to desert the army of the Congregation; but much more by the want of pay or any means of subsistence: and the regent, observing the malcontents to be much weakened, ventured to march to Edinburgh, with a design of suppressing them. On the interposition of the Duke of Chatelet, who still adhered to her, she agreed to a capitulation, in which she granted them a toleration of their faith, and they engaged to commit no further depredations on the churches. Soon after they evacuated the city; and before they left it, they proclaimed the articles of agreement; but they took care to publish only the articles favourable to themselves, and they were guilty of an imposture in addition to their number, namely, that idolatry should not again be erected in any place where it was at that time suppressed. An agreement, concluded while men were in this disposition, could not be durable; and both sides esteemed it necessary to strengthen themseves against the ensuing rupture, which appeared inevitable. The regent, having got a reinforcement of one thousand men from France, began to fortify Leith; and the Congregation seduced in the county the Duke of Ulster, who had long appeared inclined to join them, and who was at last determined by the arrival of his son, the Earl of Arran, from France, where he had escaped many dangers, from the jealousy, as well as bigotry, of Henry and the Duke of Guise. More French troops soon after disembarked, under the command of La Brosse, who was followed by the Bishop of Amiens, and three doctors of the Sorbonne. These last were supplied with a store of syllogisms, authorities, citations, and scholastic arguments, which they intended to oppose to the Scottish preachers, and which they justly presumed would acquire force, and produce conviction, by the influence of the French arms and artillery. The constable Montmorency had always opposed the marriage of the dauphin with the Queen of Scots, and had foretold, that by forming such close connexions with France, they would be the instruments of the subversion of that kingdom, jealous of a foreign yoke, would soon become, instead of allies attached by interest and inclination, the most inveterate enemies to the French government. But though the event seemed now to have justified the prudence of that aged minister, it is not improbable, considering the violent counsels by which France was governed, that the insurrection was deemed a favourable event; and a firmer pretence for sending out armies, for entirely subduing the enemies of the reigning house, and for preparing means to invade England, and support Mary's title to the crown of that kingdom. The leaders of the Congregation, well acquainted with these views, were not insensible of their danger, and saw that their only safety consisted in the vigour and success of their measures. They were encouraged by the intelligence received of the sudden death of Henry II.; and having passed an act from their own authority, depriving the queen-dowager of the regency, and ordering all the French troops to evacuate the kingdom, they collected forces to put their edict in execution against them. They again became the name masters of Edinburgh, but found it impossible to keep long possession of that city. Their tumultuary armies, assembled in haste, and supported by no pay, soon separated upon the least disaster, or even any delay of the success of the enterprise, and were incapable of resisting the attempts of the French, who were also supported by some of the Scottish nobility, among whom, the Earl of Bothwell distinguished himself. Hearing that the Marquis of Elbrouf, brother to the regent, was levyng an army against them in Germany, they thought themselves excus'd for applying, in this extremity, to the assistance of England; and the sympathy of religion, as well as regard to national liberty, had now counterbalanced the ancient animosity against that kingdom. This measure was inexcusable, and in the true sense furnishing a just occasion of guilt. It is impossible to form no less than of interest. MaTh of Lidington, therefore, and Robert Melvil, were secretly were at that time ravaging the county of Fife; and obliged them to make a circuit by Stirling, in order to reach Leith, where they prepared themselves for defence. The English army, reinforced by five thousand Scots, sat down before the place; and after two skirmishes, in the former of which the English had the advantage, in the latter the French, they began to batter the town; and though resisted with considerable loss to a rash and ill-conducted assault, they reduced the garrison to great difficulties. Their distress was augmented by two events; the dispersion of the garrison, and the appearance of a powerful dis¬ abled by the orders of Elizabeth. Authoritative and unpremeditated, in agreeing to this request, which con¬ ccurred so well with the views and interests of their mistress. Cecil, in particular, represented to the queen, that the union of the crowds of Scotland and France, both of them the hereditary enemies of England, was ever regarded as a pernicious event; and her father, as well as Protector Somerset, had employed every expedient, both of war and negotiation, to prevent it; that the claim which Mary advanced to the crown, ren¬ dered the present situation of England still more danger¬ ous, and demanded, on the part of the queen, the greatest vigilance and precaution; that the capacity, ambition, and exalted views of the family of Guise, which governed the French counsels, were sufficiently known; and they themselves made no secret of their design to place their niece on the throne of England: that deeming themselves secure of success, they had already, somewhat imprudently and prematurely, taken off the mask; and Throgmorton, the English ambassador at Paris, sent over, by every courier, incontrovertible proofs of their hostile inten¬ tions; 1 that they only waited till Scotland should be en¬ tirely subdued; and having thus deprived the English of the advantages resulting from their situation and naval power, they prepared means for subverting the queen's au¬ thority: that the zealotous catholics in England, discontented with the present government, and satisfied in the legality of Mary's title, would bring them considerable reinforce¬ ment; and would disturb every measure of defence against that formidable power: that the only expedient for prevent¬ ing these designs was to seize the moment, to take advantage of a like zeal in the protestants of Scot¬ land; nor could any doubt be entertained with regard to the justice of a measure, founded on such evident neces¬ sity, and possible only to the end of preventing what though a French war, attended with great expense, seemed the necessary consequence of supporting the mal¬ contents in Scotland, that power, if removed to the con¬ tinent, might in a short time be turned against England, and small disturbance at present would, in the end, be found the greatest frivolity: and that the domestic dissen¬ sions of France, which every day augmented, together with the alliance of Philip, who, not only founding his bigotry and hypocrisy, would never permit the entire conquest of England, were sufficient to secure the queen against the dangerous ambition and resentment of the house of Guise.

Elizabeth's propensity to caution and economy was, though with some difficulty, overcome by these powerful motives; and she prepared herself to support, by arms and money, the declining affairs of the Congregation in Scotland: for she had prepared a fleet, which consisted of thirteen ships of war; and giving the command of it to Winter, she sent it to the frith of Firth: she appointed the young Duke of Norfolk her lieutenant in the northern counties, and she assembled at Berwick an army of eight thousand men, under the command of Lord Gray, warden of the east and middle marches. Though the court of France, sensible of the danger, offered her to make immediate restitution of Calais, provided she would not interpose in the affairs of Scotland; she resolutely replied, that she never would put an inconsiderable fishing-town in competition with the safety of her dominions; 2 and she still kept up her preparation. Nor did she conclude a treaty of mutual defence with the Congregation, whereas it was to last during the marriage of the Queen of Scots with France, and a year after; and she promised never to desert till the French had entirely evacuated Scotland. 3 And having thus taken all proper precautions for success, and received from the Scots six hostages for the appear¬ ance of the articles, she ordered her fleet and army to begin their operations.

foot disconcerted the French army, who

to this assembly, in which they were not contented with desiring the establishment of their doctrine; they also applied for the punishment of the catholics, whom they called vassals to the Roman bartlet; and they asserted, that among all the rabble of the clergy, such is their expression, there was not one lawful minister; but that they were, all of them, thieves and murderers; yes, rebels and traitors to civil authority. and others of the clergy, some cold, some hot, some lukewarm, and some grossly wicked, had an union, and a compact, of their several interest, and a view of their pernicious designs. The parliament seem to have been actuated by the same spirit of rage and persecution. After ratifying a confession of faith agreeable to the new doctrine, they passed a statute against the mass, and by it only abolished the church of Rome, and declared, that whoever, any where, either officiated in it, or was present at it, should be excommunicated, for the first offence, with confiscation of goods and corporal punishment, at the discretion of the magistrates; for the second, with banishment; and for the third, with loss of life. A law was also voted for abolishing the papal jurisdiction in Scotland; the presbyterian form of discipline was settled, leaving only at first some shadow of authority to certain ecclesiastics whom they called superintendents. The prelates of the ancient faith appeared, in order to complain of great injustice committed on them by the invasion of their property, but the parliament took no notice of them, all their exclamations, and desire of their ecclesiastics, tired with fruitless attendance, departed the town. They were then cited to appear; and as nobody presented himself, it was voted by the parliament, that the ecclesiastics were entirely satisfied, and found no reason of complaint.

Sir James Sandilands, Prior of St. John, was sent over to France to obtain the ratification of these acts; but was very ill received by Mary, who denied the validity of a parliament not established by her authority, and refused her sanction to those statutes. But the protestants gave themselves little concern about their queen's refusal. They immediately put the statutes in execution; they abolished the mass; they committed every one where furious devotions on the monasteries, and even on the churches, which they thought profaned by idolatry; and deeming the property of the clergy lawful prize, they took possession, without cognisance, of the greater part of the ecclesiastical revenues. Their new preachers, who had authority sufficient to incite them to war and insurrection, could not restrain their passion; and factions concerning with avarice, an incurable wound was given to the papal authority in that country. The protestant nobility and gentry, united by the consciousness of such unpardonable guilt, alarmed for their new possessions, well acquainted with the impetuous character of their queen, who guarded herself but in the protection of England; and they despatched Morton, Glencarne, and Lindsay, to express their sincere gratitude to the queen for her past favours, and to represent to the English council their reasonable petition. Elizabeth, on her part, had equal reason for French affairs to maintain a union with the Scottish protestants; and soon found that the house of Guise, notwithstanding their former dispositions, had not laid aside the design of contesting her title, and subverting her authority. Francis and Mary, whose counsels were wholly directed by them, refused to ratify the treaty of Edin- burgh; and showed no disposition to give her any satisfaction for that mortal affront which they had put upon her, by their openly assuming the title and arms of England. She was sensible of the danger attending such pretensions; and it was with pleasure she heard of the violent factions which prevailed in the French government, and of the opposition which had arisen against the measures of the Duke of Guise. That ambitious prince, supported by his four brothers, the Cardinal of Lorraine, the Duke of Anjou, and the Duke of Orleans, and from the pretensions of so powerful a prince as Francis; no less ambitious than himself, had engaged all the authority of the crown; and as he was possessed of every quality which could command the esteem or seduce the affections of nations, he could, by his intrigues, and the passions and pretensions. The constable, Montmorency, who had long balanced his credit, was deprived of all power:

| Peter, vol. i. p. 211. | Thurgood, about this time, annulling to the princes of the blood, the King of Navarre, and his brother, the Prince of Condé, were entirely excluded from offices and favour; the queen-mother herself, Catherine de Medicis, found her influence every day declining; and as Francis, a young prince, inborn both in mind and body, was wholly governed by his consort, who knew no law but the pleasure of her uncles, men despised of ever obtaining the crown, and were named by them, with contempt, Medici. It was the contests of religion which first inspired the French with courage openly to oppose their unlimited authority. The theological disputes first started in the north of Germany, next in Switzerland, countries at that time wholly illiterate, had long ago penetrated into France; and as they were assisted by the general discontent against the court and church of Rome, and by the zealous spirit of the age, the protestants were secretly increased in every province. Henry I., in imitation of his father Francis, had opposed the progress of the reformers; and though a prince addicted to pleasure and society, he was transported by a vehemence, as well as bigotry, which had little place in the conduct of his predecessor. Rigorous punishments had been inflicted on the most eminent of the protestant party; and a point of honour seemed to have been declared, whether the one sect could exercise, or the other, a greater degree of barbarity. The death of Henry put some stop to the persecutions; and the people, who had admired the constancy of the new preachers, now heard with favour their doctrines and lives. The Duke of Guise, as well as his brothers, who were possessed of the legal authority, thought it their interest to support the established religion; and when they revived the execution of the penal statutes, they necessarily drove the malcontents to secret places. The prince and his adherents sought obedience; the ambassadresses, which Elizabeth had probably some intelligence, every place was full of distribution, and matters hastened to an open rupture between the parties. But the house of Guise, though these factions had obliged them to remit their efforts to Scotland, the Scotch affairs being in their own hands; and when the Duke of Guise's success, were determined not to relinquish their authority in France, or yield to the violence of their enemies. They found an opportunity of seizing the King of Navarre and the Prince of Condé; they threw the former into prison; they obtained sentence of death against the latter; and they were proceeding to put the sentence in execution, when the king's sudden death saved the noble prisoner, and interrupted the prosperity of the Duke of Guise. The queen-mother was appointed regent to her son, Charles IX., now in his minority: the King of Navarre was named lieutenant-general of the kingdom; the sentence against Condé was annulled; the constable was recalled to court; and the family of Guise, though they still enjoyed great offices and great power, found a counterpoise to their authority. Elizabeth was determined to make advantage of these events against the Queen of Scots, whom she still regarded as a dangerous rival. She saw herself free from the peril attending a union of Scotland with France, and from the pretensions of so powerful a prince as Francis; but she considered, at the same time, that the English catholics, who were numerous, and who were generally prejudiced in favour of Mary's title, would now adhere to that princess with greater avidity; and as she saw that her succession no longer endangered the liberties of the kingdom, and was rather advanced with the advancetage of effecting an entire union with Scotland. She gave orders, therefore, to her ambassador, Throgmorton, a vig}lant and able minister, to renew his applications to the Queen of Scots, and to require her ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh. But though Mary had desisted, after her husband's death, from bearing the arms and title of Queen of England, she still declaimed against Elizabeth in the most unmeasured article; and being seized with the ambitious suggestions of her uncles, she refused to make any formal renewance of her pretensions.

Meanwhile, the queen-mother of France, who impeded to the amicable negotiations which she had not with during Francis's life-time, took care to retaliate on her by like injuries; and the Queen of Scots, finding her abode in France disagreeable, began to think of returning to her ancestral dominions. She had been sent in 1555, by petition from the States, to invite her over, seconded these intentions; and she applied to Elizabeth, by D'Orsæl, for a safe-conduct, in case she should be obliged to pass through England; but she received for answer, that, till she had given satisfaction, by ratifying the treaty of Edinburgh, she could expect no favour from a person whom she had so much injured. This denial excited her indignation; and she made no scruple of expressing her sentiments to Throgmorton, when he reiterated his applications to gratify her mistress in a demand which he represented as so reasonable. Having cleared the room of her attendants, she said to him, "How weak I may prove, or how far a woman could be divested of her rights, to transport me, if I am resolved not to have so many witnesses of my infringement as your mistress had at her audience of my ambassador, D'Orsæl. There is nothing disturbs me so much, as all these small. I see by this, with so much more, a sagacity, a firmness, a finesse, in which it was of no consequence for me to obtain. I can, with God's leave, return to my own country, without her leave; as I came to France, in spite of all the opposition of her brother, King Edward; neither do I want means for both able and willing to conduct me home, as they have brought me hither; though I was desirous rather to make an experiment of your mistress's friendship, than of the assistance of any old enemies. I have been sent in by you, that a good correspondence between her and myself would conduce much to the security and happiness of both our kingdoms: were she well convinced of this truth, she would hardly have denied me so small a request. But, perhaps, she bears a better inclination to my rebellious subjects than to me, their sovereign, her equal in royal dignity, her near relation, and the undoubted her of her kingdoms. Besides her friendship, I ask nothing at her hands, but to be restored to the dominions she has left me in affair of her state: not that I am ignorant, that there are now in England a great many malcontents, who are not friends to the present establishment. She is pleased to up-haul an opinion of me, and little experienced in the world; I freely own it; but age will cure that defect. However, I am already old enough to acquit myself honestly and courteously to my friends and relations, and to encourage no reports of your mistress, which would make become a queen and her kinswoman. I should also say, by her leave, that I am queen as well as she, and not altogether friendless: and, perhaps, I have as great a soul too: so that methinks we should be upon a level in my treatment of each other.
As soon as I have consulted the states of my kingdom,
I shall be ready to give her a reasonable answer; and I am the more intent on my journey, in order to make the quicker dispatch in this affair. But she, it seems, intends to stop my journey; so that either she will not give her satisfaction, or is resolved not to be satisfied; perhaps on purpose to keep up the disagreement between us. She has often reproached me with my young being; and I must say that, if she is indeed, and as it were, matters of such great concern and importance without the advice of my parliament. I have not been wanting in all friendly offices to her; but she disbelieves or overlooks thoroughly, what I have done nearly all my life to her in affection as in blood: for that, indeed, would be the most valuable alliance."

Such a spirited reply, notwithstanding the obliging terms interpersed in it, was but ill fitted to conciliate friendship between these rival princesses, or cure those mutual jealousies which had already taken place. Elizabeth equipped a fleet, on pretense of pursuing pirates, but probably with an intention of intercepting the Queen of Scots in her return homewards. Mary embarked her in Calais; and charged the pilot, that if in the morning the land were still in sight, he should awake her, and afford her one parting view of that country, in which all her affections were centred. The weather proved calm, so that the ship made little way in the night-time; and Mary had not a scruple to tell: however, I am resolved not to have so many witnesses of my infringement as your mistress had at her audience of my ambassador, D'Orsæl. There is nothing disturbs me so much, as all these small. I see by this, with so much more, a

papists; and though she published, soon after her arrival, a proclamation, enjoining every one to submit to the established religion, the preachers and their adherents could neither be reconciled to a person polluted with so great an abomination, nor lay aside the jealousies of her future conduct. It was with great difficulty she could obtain permission to enter a Marcher in her chapel; and was, by no means, the people appeased, that, if she had here met with a refusal, she would instantly have returned to France, the zealots never would have granted her even that small indulgence. Though she once more attempted to be again erected within the realm! It was asserted in the pulpit, that one mass was more terrible than ten thousand armed men landed to invade the kingdom. Lord Lindsey, the lieutenant-governor, exclaimed, "That the idoler should die the death," such was their expression. One that carried tapers for the ceremony of that worship, was arrested and insulted in the court of the palace: and if Lord James, and some popular leaders, had not interposed, the most dangerous uproar was justly apprehended from the unbounded fury of the multitude.

The usual prayers in the churches were to this purpose: that God would turn the queen's heart, which was obdurate against him and his truth; or if his holy will be otherwise, that he would strengthen the hearts and hands of the elect, stoutly to oppose the rage of all tyrants.

Nay, it was openly called in question, whether that prince's power, and the wealth he possessed, was entitled to any authority, even in civil matters.

The helpless queen was every moment exposed to contumely, which she bore with benignity and patience. Soon after the event above detailed, it was discovered that it was there contrived, that a boy, six years of age, should be let down from the roof, and should present her with a hibere, a psalter, and the keys of the castle. Lest she should be at a loss to understand this insult on her as a papist, all the instruments expressing the honour of Corde, Thuh, and Abram, and other punishments inflicted by God upon idolatry. The town council of Edinburgh had the assurance, from their own authority, to issue a proclamation, banishing from their district "all the wicked rabble of antichrist, the Pope, such as priests, monks, friars, together with adulterers and fornicators." And because the privy council suspended the magistrates for their insolent speech, the passionate historians of that age have inferred, that the queen was engaged, by a sympathy of manners, to take adulterers and fornicators under her protection. It appears probable, that the magistrates were afterwards recalled to their office, and that their proclamation was confirmed.

But all the insolence of the people was inconsiderable, in comparison of that which was exercised by the clergy and preachers, who took a pride in vilifying, even to her face, this harmless queen. The first of these churchmen framed an address, in which, after telling her that her mass was a bastard service of God, the fountain of all impiety, and the source of every evil which abounded in the realm; they expressed their hopes that she would, ere this time, have preferred truth to her own pre-conceived opinion, and have renounced her religion, which, they assured her, was nothing but abomination and vanity. They said, that the present abuses of government were so enormous, that, if a speedy remedy were not provided, God would not fail, in his anger, to strike the head and the tail, the disobedient prince and sinful people. They reproached and upbraided her, and her unprotected adulterers and fornicators. And they concluded with demanding for themselves some addition both of power and property.

The point-elder in all these insults on majesty was John Knox; who possessed an uncontrollable authority in the church, and even in the civil affairs of the nation, and who triumphed in the contemptuous usage of his sovereign. His usual appellation for the queen was Jezebel; and though some idea of her situation, which he had a con- tectiun, to win his favour, all her insinuations could gain nothing on his obdurate heart. She promised him access to her whenever she demanded it; and she even desired him, if he found her blamable in any thing, to reprove her freely in private, rather than viliy her in the pulpit before the whole people: but he plainly told her, that he had a public ministry intrusted to him; that if she would come to church, she should there hear the gospel of truth; and for saying, that it was not his business to apply to every individual, nor had he leisure for that occupation.

The political principles of the man, which he communicated to his brethren, were as full of sedition as his theological was of rage and bigotry. Though he once so far as to tell the queen, that he would submit to her, in the same manner as Paul did to Nero; he remained not long in this dutiful strain. He said to her, that "Samuel feared none but slaves."

Knox, who was the real Elias Jezebel's false prophets, and Baal's priests, though King Abah was present. Phineas," added he, "was no magistrate; yet feared he not to strike Cohhi and Zimri in the very act of filthy fornication. And so, madam, your Grace may see, that others than chief magistrates may lawfully inflict punishment on such crimes as are condemned by the law of God."

Knox had formerly, during the reign of Mary of England, written a book against female succession to the crown: the title of it is, The first blast of the trumpet against the monstrous regi- men of women. He was too proud ever to recant the sentiments of this book, and even to apologize for himself if the conduct showed, that he thought no more civility than loyalty due to any of the female sex. The whole life of Mary was, from the demonstration of her masses and superstitions, and the apostle scruples not, in his history, to inform us, that he once treated her with such severity, that she lost all command of temper, and dissolved in tears before him; yet, so far from being moved with youth, and beauty, and royal dignity reduced to that condition, he furnishes us with his insolent reproofs; and when he relates this incident, he discovers a visible pride and satisfaction in his own conduct. The pulpit had become mere scenes of rai- ling against the vices of the court; among which were always noted, as the principal, feasting, finery, dancing, balls, and whoredom, their necessary attendant. Some ornaments, which these ladies at that time wore upon their pectorits, excited mightily the indignation of the preachers; and they affirmed, that such vanity would provoke God's vengeance, not only against these foolish women, but against the whole realm.

Mary, whose acquaintance, and education, invited her to liberty and cheerfulness, was curbed in all amuse- ments, by the absurd severity of these reformers; and she found, every moment, reason to regret her leaving that country, from whose manners she had, in her early youth, derived that beauty, and that royal dignity reduced to that condition, the Duke of Aumale, and the Grand Prior, with the other French nobility, soon took leave of her: the Marquis of Elbeuf remained some time longer; but after his departure, she was left to the society of her own sub- jects; men unacquainted with the pleasures of conversa- tion, ignorant of arts and civility, and corrupted beyond their usual rusticity, by a dismal fanaticism, which rendered them incapable of all humanity or improvement. Though Mary had made no attempt to restore the ancient religion, her popery was a sufficient crime: though her behaviour was atheistical irreproachable, and her manners tender and engaging, she was regarded as signs of absolute vanity. And to the harsh and post- pesterable usage, which this princess met with, may, in part, be ascribed those errors of her subsequent conduct, which seemed so little of a piece with the general tenor of her character.

There happened to the Marquis of Elbeuf, before his departure, an adventure, which, though frivolous, might enable him to give Mary's friends in France a melancholy idea of her situation, which though he had not the means of conveying to her, Bothwell, and some other young courtiers, had been en- gaged, after a debauch, to pay a visit to a woman, called

Alison Craig, who was known to be liberal of her favours; and because they were denied admittance, they broke the windows, thrust up their heads, and deliberately committed some disorders in the street for the damask. It happened, that the assembly of the church was sitting at that time, and they immediately took the matter under their cognizance. In conjunction with several of the nobility, they presented an address to the king, praying that these acts, which were produced with the most awful preamble: "To the Queen's Majesty, and to her secret and great council, her Grace's faithful and obedient subjects, the professors of Christ Jesus's holy evangel, with humble petition," etc. The sense of this petition was, that the fear of God, the duty which they owed her Grace, and the terrible threatenings denounced by God against every city or country where horrible crimes were committed, compelled them, with just and reasonable sense, to act in this case; that if severe punishment of such as had done what in them lay to kindle the wrath of God against the whole realm; that the iniquity of which they complained was so heinous and so horrible, that they should esteem themselves accomplices in it, if they had been engaged by worldly fear, or servile compliance, to pass it over in silence, or bury it in oblivion; that as they owed her Grace obedience in the administration of justice, so were they equally entitled to require of her, in return, the sharp and condign punishment of this enormity, which, they repeated it, might draw down the vengeance of God on the whole kingdom; and that they maintained it to be her duty to lay aside all private affection, and let the action of the actors in so base a crime, and enormously a villainy, and without delay bring them to a trial, and inflict the severest penalties upon them. The queen gave a gracious reception to this peremptory address, and lastly accepted the of her thought, that breaking through the windows of a brothel meant not such severe reprehension, she only replied, that her uncle was a stranger, and that he was attended by a young company; but that she was determined in order to him, and all others, that her edicts, and subjects should henceforth have no reason to complain. Her passing over this incident so slightly, was the source of great discontent, and was regarded as a proof of the most unpardonable malice. It is not to be omitted, that Alison Craig, the cause of all the uproar, was known to entertain a commerce with the Earl of Arran, who, on account of his great zeal for the Reformation, was, without scruple, indulged in that faculty.

Some of the populace of Edinburgh broke into the queen's chapel during her absence, and committed outrages; for which two of them were indicted, and it was intended to bring them to trial. Knox wrote circular letters to the king, of considerable magnitude of the party, and charged them to appear in town, and protect their brethren. The holy sacraments, he there said, are abused by profane papists; the mass has been said; and in withholding the same, the priests have not only nullified the law, but even the conjuring of their accursed water, that had ever been practised in the time of the greatest blindness. These violent measures for opposing justice were little short of rebellion; and Knox was summoned before the council to answer for his offence. The courage of the man was equal to his insolence. He scrupled not to tell the queen, that the pestilent papists, who had inflamed her against these holy men, were the sons of the devil; and must therefore obey the directions of their father, who had been a liar and a manseer from the beginning. The matter ended with a full acquittal of Knox. Randolph, the Edinburgh chancellor, had reason to write to Cecil, speaking of the Scottish nation: "I think marvellously the wisdom of God, that gave this unruly, most unconstable, and cumbersome people, no more power nor subjection, than the very subregions of the world."

We have related these incidents at greater length than the necessity of our subject may seem to require; but even trivial circumstances, which show the manners of the age, are often more instructive, as well as entertaining, than the great transactions of years and nations; even, which are nearly similar in all periods and in all countries of the world.

The reformed clergy in Scotland, had, at that time, a very natural reason for their ill humour; namely, the poverty, or rather beggary, to which they were reduced. The nobility and gentry had laid their hands on all the property of the regular clergy, without making any provision for the friars and nuns, whom they turned out of their possessions. The secular clergy of the catholic communion, though they lost all ecclesiastical fiefs, still kept in possession of the temporalities of their benefices; and either became laymen themselves, and converted them into private property, or made conveyance of them at low prices to the nobility, who thus enriched themselves by the plunder of the church. The greater part of the society was thus subverted chiefly by the voluntary obligations of the faithful; and in a poor country, divided in religious sentiments, this establishment was regarded as very saucy and very wrongful proceeding. It had this tendency to the subversion of the established order, and to demand the establishment of a new order; and though almost everything in the kingdom was governed by their zeal and caprice, it was with difficulty that their request was at last complied with. The fanatical spirit, which they indulged, and their industry in decreeing the principles and practices of the Romish communion, which placed such merit in enriching the clergy, proved now a very sensible obstacle to their acquisition. The conversion, however, passed a vote, by which they divided all the ecclesiastical benefices into twenty-one shares: they assigned fourteen to the ancient possessors; of the remaining seven they granted three to the crown; and if that were found insufficient to public expenses, they imposed the overplus on the religious and ministers. The queen was empowered to levy all the seven; and it was ordained that she should afterwards pay the clergy what should be judged to suffice for their maintenance; though the king was still lord of the greater part of the courtyards, and the small affliction which Mary bore to the protestant ecclesiastics, rendered their revenues contemptible as well as uncertain; and the preachers, finding that the crown could not take their names or their goods, and that rank of men, in opulence and plenty, were necessitated to betake themselves to other expedients for supporting their authority. They affected a furious zeal for religion, monastic manners, and the semblance of order, and though the liberality of subsequent princes put them afterwards on a better footing with regard to revenue, and thereby corrected, in some degree, those bad habits; it must be confessed, that while many other advantages attend presbyterian government, these inconveniences are not easily separated from the genius of that ecclesiastical polity.

The Queen of Scots, destitute of all force, possessing a narrow revenue, surrounded with a factious turbulent nobility, a bigoted people, and insolent ecclesiastics, soon found, that her only expedient for maintaining tranquillity was to preserve a good correspondence with Elizabeth, who, in the name of God, and her service, had acquired such authority over all these ranks of men. Soon after her arrival in Scotland, secretary Lindsay was sent to London, in order to pay her compliments to the queen, and express her desire of friendship and a good correspondence; and he received a commission from her, as well as from the nobility of Scotland, to demand, as a means of cementing this friendship, that Mary should, by act of parliament or by proclamation, (for the difference between these securities was not then deemed very considerable,) be declared successor to the crown. No request could be more unreasonable, or made at a more improper juncture.

The queen, therefore, was informed of her intention not to wait for the succession, but to come, without ceremony or reservation, illumined by the title of Queen of England, and had pretended a superior right to her crown; and all through her whole life, on all those of her husband, the French king, had signed a treaty, in which they renounced that claim, and promised satisfaction for so great an indignity, she was so intoxicated with this imaginary right, that she had rejected the most important consolations which her husband could persuade her, had incurred some danger in crossing the seas, rather than to ratify that equitable treaty: that her partisans every where had still the assurance to insist on her... title, and had presumed to talk of her own birth as illegitimate; that while affairs were on this footing; while a claim thus openly made, so far from being openly recognized as a serious pretension, was the subject of all who were ready to acknowledge her pretensions it would be in her be the most egregious imprudence to fortify the hands of a pretender to her crown, by declaring her the successor; that no expedient could be worse imagined for cementing friendship than such a declaration; and kings were often found to bear no good-will to their successors, even though their own children; much more when the connexion was less intimate, and when such an enterprise might indeed be a cause of disgust and jealousy, or had already been given, and which was still continued, on the part of Mary: that she through that she was willing from the amity which she bore her kinswoman, to ascribe her former pretensions to the advice of others, by whose direction she was then governed; her present refusal to relinquish them could proceed only from her own prepossessions, and was a proof that she still harboured some dangerous designs against her; that it was the nature of all men to be disgusted with the present, to entertain flattering views of futurity, to think that services ill rewarded, to expect a better recompence from the successor; and that she should esteem herself scarcely a sovereign over the English, if they saw her declare herself a successor in the present divisions in religion; that she was ignorant that the same party which exceeded her to impeach her by these accusations in the general good of the state, might imagine that the title of that princess was superior to her own; that for her part whatever claims were advanced, she was determined to live and die the Queen of England; and that she did not, on this account, that she would be thought on that account, better entitled to succeed in his addresses. Eric, King of Sweden, and Adolph, Duke of Holstein, were encouraged, by the same views, to become suitors to the Earl of Pembroke, heir to the crown of Scotland, was, by the states of that kingdom, recommended to her as a suitable marriage. Even some of her own subjects, though they did not openly declare their pretensions, had private hopes of success. The Earl of Arundel, a person declining in years, but descended from an ancient and noble family, as well as possessed of great riches, flattered himself with this prospect; as did also Sir William Pickering, a man much esteemed for his personal merit. But the person most likely to succeed, was a younger son of the late Duke of Northumberland, Lord Robert Dudley, who, by means of his exterior qualities, joined to address and flattery, had become, in a manner, her declared favorite, and had great influence in all her counsels. The less worthy he appeared of this distinction, the more was he her great favour ascribed to some violeat affection, which could thus seduce the judgment of the penetrating minds of her enemies; and he might even have thought that he would obtain the preference above so many princes and monarchs. But the queen gave all these suitors a gentle refusal, which still encouraged their pursuit; and she thought that she should leave it to the persons who had the most interest in her affairs, if they were still allowed to entertain hopes of succeeding in their pretensions. It is also probable that this policy was not entirely free from a mixture of female coquetry; and that, though she was determined in her own mind never to share her power with any man, she was not displeased with the courtship, solicitation, and professions of love, which the desire of acquiring so valuable a prize procured her from all quarters.

What is most singular in the conduct and character of Elizabeth is, that though she determined never to have any heir of her own body, she was not only very averse to fix any successor as a matter of law, which had been much debated by her predecessors; she furnished them with no evidence of any pretensions on her part to the crown of Scotland, and other places: engaged her nobility and gentry to imitate her example in this particular; introduced into the kingdom the art of making gunpowder and brass cannon; fortified her frontiers; and the whole of the sea; encouraged agriculture, by allowing a free exportation of corn; promoted trade and navigation; and so much increased the shipping of her kingdom, both by building vessels of force herself, and suggesting like undertakings to the merchants, that she was justly styled the Restorer of Naval Glory, and the Queen of the Northern Seas. The natural frugality of her temper, so far from incapacitating her from these great enterprises, only enabled her to execute them with greater certainty and success; and all the world saw in her conduct the happy effects of a vigorous perseverance in judicious and well-concerted projects.

She made some progress in paying those great debts which lay upon the crown; she regulated the coin, which had been much debased by her predecessors; she furnished them with no evidence of any pretensions on her part to the crown of Scotland, and other places; engaged her nobility and gentry to imitate her example in this particular; introduced into the kingdom the art of making gunpowder and brass cannon; fortified her frontiers; and the whole of the sea; encouraged agriculture, by allowing a free exportation of corn; promoted trade and navigation; and so much increased the shipping of her kingdom, both by building vessels of force herself, and suggesting like undertakings to the merchants, that she was justly styled the Restorer of Naval Glory, and the Queen of the Northern Seas. The natural frugality of her temper, so far from incapacitating her from these great enterprises, only enabled her to execute them with greater certainty and success; and all the world saw in her conduct the happy effects of a vigorous perseverance in judicious and well-concerted projects.

Wine gens only of her interposition, Mary was sufficiently depressed by the numerous spirit of her own subjects; and instead of going Scotland, for the present, any inquietude or disturbance, she employed herself, more usefully and laudably, in regulating the affairs of her own kingdom, and promoting the happiness of her people.

husband, soon after consummation, travelled into France. In a little time she appeared to be pregnant, which so enraged Elizabeth, that she threw her into the Tower, and summoned Hertford to appear, in order to answer for his misdeeds, and made him no scruple of acknowledging the marriage, which, though concluded without the queen's consent, was entirely suitable to both parties; and for this offence he was also committed to the Tower. Elizabeth's severe measures on this occasion shewed the necessity of a prompt conference into the matter; and as Hertford could not, within the time limited, prove the nuptials by witnesses, the commerce between him and his consort was declared unlawful, and their purity illegitimate. They were still detained in custody; but by bridling their keepers, they found means to have further intercourse; and another child appeared to be the fruit of their cohabitation. This was more unexpected than the irregular marriage, the queen, of fifteen thousand pounds be set on Hertford by the star-chamber, and ordered his confinement to be thenceforth more rigid and severe. He lay in this condition for nine years, till the death of his wife, by freeing Elizabeth from all fears, procured him his liberty. This extreme severity must be accounted for, either by the unrelenting jealousy of the queen, who was afraid lest a pretender to the succession should acquire credit by having issue; or by her malignity, which, with all her great qualities, made one ingredient in her character, and which led her to envy, in others, those natural pleasures of love and posterity, of which her own ambition and desire of dominion made her renounced, as a suit of herself for perfection.

There happened, about this time, some other events in the royal family, where the queen's conduct was more laudable. Arthur Pole, and his brother, nephews to the late cardinal, and desisted from the Duke of Clarence, together with Anthony Fortescue, who had married a sister of these gentlemen, and some other persons, were brought to their trial for intending to withdraw into France, with a view of soliciting succours from the Duke of Guise, of returning thence into Wales, and of proclaiming Mary, Queen of England, and Arthur Pole, Duke of Clarence. They confessed the indictment, but asserted, that they never meant or expected these projects, during the queen's life-time; they had only deemed such precautions requisite in case of her demise, which some pretendors to judicial astrology had assured them, they might with certainty look for before the year expired. They were accordingly demed by the jury, but received a pardon from the queen's clemency.9

State of Europe—Civil wars of France—Mary Stuart considered that fiancée.—Pope and Isaac—Mary sent to France—Mary and Francis meet at York—Hague Conference—Mary's death.

After the commencement of the religious struggles in France, which rendered that fiancée, of every European nation, a matter of doubt, and danger, to the existence of the church of Rome, a question of grave importance between the sovereigns of those countries, which were so near to each other in interest, and faith into partisans of Spanish greatness; and by employing the powerful allurement of religion, he seduced, every where, the subjects from that allegiance which they owed to their own sovereigns, as well as to the church of Rome. The course of events, guiding and concourting with choice, had placed Elizabeth in a situation diametrically opposite; and had raised her to be the glory, the bulwark, and the support of the Protestant cause. But her easiness in negotiation, and the meekness with which she encountered the attacks of her adversaries, had been more suited to those of the ancient octogenarians, than to the subtle intrigues of the fanatic and impatient Protestants, throughout Europe. More moderate in her temper than Philip, she found, with pleasure, that the principles of her sect required not such extreme severity maxims which governed his counsels, excited the most violent agitation among his own people, engaged him in acts of the most enormous cruelty, and threw all Europe into confusion. After Philip had concluded peace at Chateau-Cambresis, and had remained some time to the Netherlands, in order to settle the affairs of that country, he embarked for Spain; and at the time of his departure all his subjects were vested with his clemency, and obedience to his project, had appeared more agreeable to him than the, more likely and practicable plans of the French government. This being the case, for the future, M. d'Arcy, the intendant of the French crown, was apprised of all his extensive dominions by Spanish ministers and Spanish counsels. Having met with a violent tempest on his voyage, he no sooner arrived in harbour than he fell on his knees; and, after giving thanks for his deliverance, he laid before his subjects, the state of the church, as well as of his own kingdom.

Philip, though a profound hypocrite, and extremely governed by self-interest, seems also to have been himself actuated by an impassioned bigotry; and, as he employed great reflection in all his conduct, he could easily palliate the gratification of his natural temper under the colour of wisdom, and find, in this system, no less advantage to his foreign than to his domestic policy. By placing himself at the head of the Catholic party, he contributed to the growth of the ancient prejudices, and the applause of the emperors, the emperors of the world, and of the inveterate enemies of the reformers. The course of events, guiding and concourting with choice, had placed Elizabeth in a situation diametrically opposite; and had raised her to be the glory, the bulwark, and the support of the Protestant cause. But her easiness in negotiation, and the meekness with which she encountered the attacks of her adversaries, had been more suited to those of the ancient octogenarians, than to the subtle intrigues of the fanatic and impatient Protestants, throughout Europe. More moderate in her temper than Philip, she found, with pleasure, that the principles of her sect required not such extreme severity in her domestic government as was exercised by that monarch; and having no object but self-preservation, she united her interests in all foreign negotiations with those who were every where struggling under oppression, and goring the unimportant mountain. This noble and virtuous sovereign was thus happily thrown into the more favourable cause; and fortune, in this instance, concurred with policy and nature.

The two monarchs of the continent, France and Spain; being possessed of nearly equal force, were naturally divided against each other; yet the situation, was entitled to support its own dignity, as well as tranquillity, by withholding the balance between them. Whatever incident, therefore, tended too much to depress one of these rival powers, as it left the other without control, might be deemed contrary to the interests of England; yet so much were these great maxims of policy overlooked, during that age, by the disputes of theology, that Philip's wishes and good-will towards the established government and religion of France; and Elizabeth in protecting faction and innovation.

The Queen regent of France, when reinvested with the authority by the death of her son Francis, had formed a plan of administration more subtle than judicious; and, balancing the Catholics with the hugonots, the Duke of Guise with the Prince of Condé, she endeavoured to render herself necessary to both, and to establish her own dominion on their constrained obedience. But the equal counterpoise of power, which, among foreign nations, is the source of tranquillity, proves always the footing of domestic tranquillity; and if the annuity of religion be engrossed with those occasions which present themselves of mutual injury, it is impossible, during any time, to preserve a firm concord in so delicate an situation. The constable, Montmorency, moved by zeal for the regent's interests, joined in the attack on the Duke of Guise: the King of Navarre, from his inconstant temper, and his jealousy of the superior genius of his brother, embraced the same party; and Catharine, finding herself depressed by this combination, had recourse to Condé, and the hugonots, who gladly embraced the opportunity of fortifying themselves by her countenance and protection. An edict had been published, granting a toleration to the protestants; but the interested views of the Duke of Guise, covered with the pretence of religious zeal, broke through this agreement; and the two parties, after the fallacious tranquillity of a moment, renewed their amusements and internal injuries. Condé, Cognon, and Andelot, assembled their friends, and flew to arms: Guise and Montmorency possessed the king's person, and constrained the queen regent to embrace their party: fourteen armies were levied and put in motion in different parts of France: each province, each city, each family, was agitated with intestine rage and animosity. The father was divided against the son; brother against brother; and their mutual insulutions and injuries. carrying it at last by assault, put the whole garrison to the sword. The Earl of Warwick, eldest son of the late Duke of Northumberland, arrived soon after at Havre, with another body of three thousand English, and took on him the command of the place.

It was expected that the French catholics, flushed with their success at Rouen, would immediately have formed the siege of Havre, which was not as yet in any condition of defense, but the intelligent and good dispositions of the English diverted their attention to another enterprise. Andelot, seconded by the negotiations of Elizabeth, had levied a considerable body of protestants in Germany; and having arrived at the seat of the huguenots' power, he enabled the Prince of Condé and the admiral to take the field, and oppose the progress of their enemies. After threatening Paris during some time, they took their march towards Normandy, with a view of engaging the English to act in conjunction with them, and of fortifying themselves by the further assistance which they expected from the zeal and vigour of Elizabeth. The catholics, commanded by the constable, and under him by the Duke of Guise, followed on their rear; and, overtaking them at Dreux, obliged them to give battle. The field was fought with great obstinacy on both sides: and the action was distinguished by this singular event, that Condé and Mary, on the appearance of the common arms of the remnant of both of them prisoners into the hands of their enemies. The appearances of victory remained with Guise; but the admiral, whose fate it ever was to be defeated, and set on fire to the miserable enterprises of his companions, in the remains of the army; and inspiring his own unconquerable courage and constancy into every heart, kept them in a body, and subdued some considerable places in Normandy. Elizabeth, the better to support his cause, sent him a new supply of a hundred thousand crowns; and offered, if he could find merchants to lend him the money, to give her bond for another sum of equal amount.

A.D. 1563.

The queen's exchequer; and, in order to obtain supply, she found herself under a necessity of summoning a parliament: an expedient to which she never willingly had recourse. A little before the meeting of this assembly she had fallen into a dangerous illness, the small-pox: and as her life, during some time, was despaired of, the people became the more sensible of their perilous situation, derived from the uncertainty which, in case of her death, attended the succession of the crown. The partisans of the Queen of Scots, and those of the house of Suffolk, already divided the nation into factions; and every one foresaw that it might be possible to determine the controversy by law, yet, if the throne were vacant, nothing but the sword would be able to fix a successor. The Commons, therefore, on the opening of the session, voted an address to the queen; in which, after enumerating the dangers attending a broken and doubtful succession, and mentioning the evils which their fathers had experienced from the contending titles of York and Lancaster, they entreated the queen to put an end to their apprehensions, by choosing some husband, whom they promised, whoever he were, gratefully to receive, and faithfully to serve, honour, and obey; or, if she had entertained any reluctance to the married state, they desired that the lawful successor might be named, and as at least approved, by act of parliament. They remarked that, during all the reigns which had passed since the conquest, the nation had never before been so unhappy as not to know the person to whom the crown should descend. It was, therefore, entitled to fill the vacant throne. And they observed, that the fixed order which took place in inheriting the French monarchy, was one chief source of the usual tranquillity, as well as of the support of that kingdom.

This subject, though extremely interesting to the nation, was very little agreeable to the queen; and she was sensible that great difficulties would attend every decision. A declaration of the title of the Queen of Scots would form a settlement perfectly legal, because that princess was commonly allowed to possess the right of blood; and the exclusion given by Henry's will, deriving its weight chiefly from an act of parliament, would lose all authority, whenever the queen and parliament had made a new settlement, and requested the Scottish line to ascend the succession, that she dreaded giving encouragement to the catholics, her secret enemies, by this declaration. She was sensible that every heir was, in some degree, a rival; much more one who was suspected of the kingdom secretly present, for being the crown, and who had already advanced, in a very open manner, these dangerous pretensions. The great power of Mary, both from the favour of the catholic princes, and her commission to the Duke, not to mention the force and situation of Scotland, was well known to her; and she saw no security that this princess, if fortified by a sure prospect of succession, would not revive claims which she could never yet be prevailed on formally to relinquish. On the other hand, the title of the house of Suffolk was supported by the more zealous protestants only; and it was very doubtful, whether even a parliamentary declaration, in its favour would be of such a security as to give satisfaction to the people. The republican part of the constitution had not yet acquired such an ascendancy as to control, in any degree, the ideas of hereditary right; and as the legality of Henry's will was still doubted, and hereditary right was the usual rule by which a parliament could confer; who could be assured that a more recent act would be acknowledged to have greater validity? In the frequent revolutions which had of late taken place, the people had not yet been accustomed over religious prejudices; and the nation had ever shown itself disposed rather to change its faith than the order of succession. Even many protestants declared themselves in favour of Mary's claim; and if the debates on this subject would occasion more general disgust, than to see the queen, openly and without reserve, take part against it.

The Scottish princes also, finding herself injured in so sensible a point by the acquiescence of the nation, was not disposed to give up her enemies; and uniting together her foreign and domestic friends, the partisans of her present title and of her eventual succession, would soon bring matters to extremities against the present establishment. The queen, weighing all these inconveniences, which were great and rising, was determined to keep both parties in awe, by maintaining still an ambiguous conduct; and she rather chose that the people should run the hazard of contingent events, than that she herself should immediately endanger her throne, by employing expedients, which, at best, would not bestow entire security on the nation. She gave, therefore, an evasive answer to the applications of the Commons; and when she could not address at present her whole mouth of their speaker, further satisfaction on that head, she could not be prevailed on to make her reply more explicit. She only told them, contrary to her declarations in the first instance of her reign, that she had fixed no absolute resolution against marriage; and she added, that the difficulties attending the question of the succession were so great, that she would be contented for the sake of her people, to remain some time longer in this wise, and never should depart life with satisfaction till she had laid some solid foundation for their future security.

The most remarkable law passed this session, was that which bore the title of Annuity of the Queen's royal power and dignity, in case of marriage [238]. By this act, the asserting twice, by writing, word, or deed, the Pope's authority, was subjected to the penalties of treason. All persons in holy orders were bound to take the oath of supremacy as soon after the queen, or, in case of the queen's death, was legally entitled to fill the vacant throne. And they observed, that the fixed order which took place in inheriting the French monarchy, was one chief source of the usual tranquillity, as well as of the support of that kingdom.

This subject, though extremely interesting to the nation, was very little agreeable to the queen; and she was sensible that great difficulties would attend every decision. A declaration of the title of the Queen of Scots would form a settlement perfectly legal, because that princess was bill; and asserted, in favour of the catholics, that they disputed not, they preached not, they disobeyed not the queen, they caused no trouble, no tumults among the people. It is however probable that some suspicions of their secret conspiracies had made the queen and parliament increase their rigour against them; though it is also more than probable that their party was mistaken in the remedy. There was likewise another point, in which the parliament, this session, showed more the goodness of their intention, than the soundness of their judgment. They passed a law against fond and fantastical prophecies, which might be prejudicial to the tranquility of the kingdom. This law was actually successful in reducing the towns of Normandy which held for the king; but he frequently complained, that the numerous Garrison of Havre remained totally inactive, and was not employed in making any operations against the conspirators of this party. The queen, in taking possession of that place, had published a manifesto, in which she pretended that her concern for the interests of the French king had engaged her in that measure, and that her sole intention was to oppose her enemies of the house of Guise, who held their prince in captivity, and employed his power to the destruction of his best and most faithful subjects. It was chiefly her desire that military operations against the constant and powerful enemy of her temper, which made her, at this critical juncture, keep her soldiers in garrison; and restrain them from committing further hostilities upon the enemy. The Duke of Guise, meanwhile, was aiming, with mortal blow, at the power of the hugonots; and had commenced the siege of Orleans, of which Andelot was governor, and where the constable was detained prisoner. He had the prospect of speedy success in this undertaking; when he was assassinated. 5

This was at the beginning of June. He was instigated (as is pretended, though without any certain foundaton) by the admiral and Beza, a famous preacher, led him to attempt that criminal enterprise. The death of the admiral, and his son having been committed to the Tower, and though the Cardinal of Lorraine, his brother, still sup-sported the interests of the family, the danger of their progress appeared not so imminent either to Elizabeth or to the French protestors. The union, therefore, between these allies, which had been cemented by their common fears, began therefrom to be less intimate; and the leaders of the hugonots were persuaded to hearken to terms of a separate accommodation. Condé and Montmorency held conferences for settling the peace; and as they were both of them insufficient to relieve themselves from captivity, they soon came to an agreement with regard to the conditions of the queen-regent, whose enmity were always violent, but who endeavoured, by subtlety and policy, rather than force, to attain them, led her to embrace any plausible terms; and, in spite of the protestations they caused no trouble in the progress of the measures in favour of the country, the articles of agreement were finally settled between the parties. A Toleration, under some restrictions, was anew granted to the protestors; a general amnesty was published; Condé was reinstated in his offices and governments; and after money was advanced for the payment of annuities due to the German troops, they were dismissed the kingdom.

By the agreement between Elizabeth and the Prince of Condé it had been stipulated, 6 that neither party should conclude peace without the consent of the other; but this article was at present but little regarded by the queen and the ambassadors of the French protestors. They only comprehended her so far in the treaty, as to obtain a promise, that, on her relinquishing Havre, her charges, and the money which she had advanced towards their expedition should be restored. Havre, and that Calais, on the expiration of the term, should be restored to her. But she disdained to accept of these conditions; and thinking the possessors of Havre a much better pledge for defection than her purpose, among Warwick orders to prepare himself against an attack from the new united power of the French monarchy.

The Earl of Warwick, who commanded a garrison of six thousand men, besides seven hundred ponders, had no sooner got possession of Havre, than he employed every means for putting it in a posture of defence; and after expelling the French from the town, he encouraged his soldiers to make the most desperate defence against the enemy. The constable commanded the French army; the queen-regent herself, and the king, were present in the camp; even the Prince of Condé joined the king's forces, and gave countenance to this enterprise; the admiral and Andelot alone, were employed to prevent everything against the queen; Elizabeth, kept at a distance, and prudently refused to join their ancient enemies in an attack upon their allies.

From the force, and dispositions, and situations of both sides, it was expected that the siege would be attended with some memorable event; yet did France make a much easier acquisition of this important place, than was at first apprehended. The plague crept in among the English soldiers; and being augmented by the bad and dirty, (for they were both ill supplied with provisisions,) it made such ravages that sometimes a hundred men a-day died of it, and there remained not at least fifteen hundred in a camp, to which the French were not equal, and which with such feeble resistance, carried on their attacks successfully; and having made two breaches, each of them sixty feet wide, they prepared for a general assault, which must have terminated in the slaughter of the whole garrison. 8 Warwick, who had frequently warned the English council of the danger, and who had loudly demanded a supply of men and provisions, 9 was unsuccessful. He found himself obliged to capitulate, and to consent himself with the liberty of his person by his guards, and his son. The garrison was surrendered, and the crown of France, as was no sooner signed, than Lord Clifton, the admiral, who had been detained by contrary winds, appeared off the harbour with a reinforcement of three thousand men, and found the place inadequately supplied. In the event, the misfortune, the infected army brought the plague with them into England, where it swept off great multitudes, particularly in the city of London. About twenty thousand persons there died of it in one year. 9

Elizabeth, whose usual vigour and foresight had not appeared in this transaction, was now glad to compound matters; and as the queen-regent desired to obtain honour, in order to prepare measures for the extermination of the hugonots, she readily hearkened to any reasonable terms of accommodation with England. 10 It was agreed that the hostages, which the French had given for the restitution of Calais, should be delivered for 220,000 crowns; and that both sides should retain all their claims and pretensions. The peace still continued with Scotland; and even a conduit was acted that the Scotch affairs had been cemented between Elizabeth and Mary. These

The peace still continued with Scotland; and even a conduit was acted that the Scotch affairs had been cemented between Elizabeth and Mary. These princesses made profession of the most entire affection; wrote amicable letters every week to each other; and had... adopted, in all appearance, the sentiments as well as style of sisters. Elizabeth punished one Halas, who had published against her, by sending her, as Mary's Letter Keeper, Bacon, was thought to have encouraged Halas in this undertaking, he fell under her displeasure, and it was with some difficulty he was able to give her satisfaction, and to retract his words. A remonstrance had agreed in the foregoing summer to an interview at York, in order to remove all difficulties with regard to Mary's ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh, and to consider of the proper means of settling the succession for England: but of Elizabeth carefully avoided touching on this delicate subject, she employed a pretence of the wars in France, which, she said, would detain her in London; and she declared not till the next year that she would attend her Majesty. It is also very probable, that, being well acquainted with the beauty and address and accomplishments of Mary, she did not choose to stand the comparison with regard to those exterior qualities, in which she was eclipsed by her rival, and was unwilling that a princess, who had already made great progress in the esteem and affections of the English, should have a further opportunity of increasing the number of her partisans.

Mary's close connexions with the house of Gaule, and her constant wish to re-establish, to which she had been early educated and constantly protected, was the ground of just and insurmountable jealousy to Elizabeth, who regarded them as her mortal and declared enemies, and who, in the conduct of Elizabeth, had agreed in her masquerading schemes, and ambitious projects. They had made offer of their niece to Don Carlos, Philip's son; to the King of Sweden, the King of Navarre, the Archduke Charles, the Duke of Ferriero, the Cardinal of Bourbon, who had only taken her orders, from which he might easily be freed by a dispensation; and they were ready to marry her to any one who could strengthen their interests, or give inquietude and disturbance to the house of Elizabeth. On her part, she was equally vigilant to prevent the execution of their schemes, and was particularly anxious, lest Mary should form any powerful foreign alliance, which might tempt her to the renewal of the former treaty of marriage. She always told the Queen of Scots, that no one would satisfy her but her espousing some English nobleman, who would remove all grounds of jealousy, and cement the union between the kingdoms; and she offered one of her sons to have her title extinguished, and to declare her successor to the crown. After keeping the matter in these general terms during a twelvemonth, she at last named Lord Robert Dudley, now created Earl of Leicester, as the person on whom she desired that Mary's choice should fall.

The Earl of Leicester, the great and powerful favourite of Elizabeth, possessed all those exterior qualities which are naturally alluring to the fair sex; a handsome person, a polite address, and insinuating behaviour; and by means of these accomplishments, he had been able to blind even the penetration of Elizabeth, and conceal from her the great defect of her rather odious vices, which attended this character. He was proud, insolent, interested, ambitious; without honour, without generosity, without humanity; and stoned not for these bad qualities, by such abilities or connections as could fit him for that high and confidential station, with which she always honoured him. Her constant and declared attachment to him had naturally imbioned him to aspire to her bed; and in order to make way for these nuptials, he was universally believed to have murdered, in a barbarous manner, her husband, the heeress of one Rob-Derbec. The proposal of espousing Mary was also as agreeable to him; and he was aspersed it to the contrivance of Cecil, his enemy; who, he thought, intended by that artifice to make him lose the friendship of Mary from the interest and influence she possessed as the Lady of the household, and jealousy of his attachments to another woman. The queen herself had not any serious intention of effecting this marriage; but as she was desirous that the Queen of Scots should have a husband, as she always wished, and who, she believed, was not likely to be accepted of; and she boded, by that means, to gain time, and elude the project of any other alliance. The Earl of Leicester was too great a favourite to be trusted; and when Mary, allured by the prospect of being declared successor to the crown, seemed at last to hearken to Elizabeth's proposal, this princess receded from her offers, and withdrew the bait she had thrown out to her rival, and was only now some time interrupted. In order to make up the breach, the Queen of Scots despatched Sir James Melvil to London, who had given us, in his Memoirs, a particular account of his negotiation.

Melvil was an agreeable courtier, a man of address and conversation, with whom she had been familiarly acquainted, to whom she had been often educated, and who, by the manners with which he possessed the youngest and most frivolous of her sex, he talked to her of his travels, and forgot not to mention the different dresses of the ladies in different countries, and the modes of their pursuance, and of the styles which possess the most beauty of beauty. She often had been in the French, sometimes in the Italian; and with him, he asked her which of them she liked best. She answered the Italian; a reply that he knew would be agreeable to her, because that was the woman's mode of garb, sometimes in the French, sometimes in the Italian; and she asked him, which of them became her best? He answered the Italian; a reply that he knew would be very advantageous her flowing locks, which he remarked, though they were more red than yellow, she fancied to be the finest in the world. She desired to know of him what was reputed the best colour of hair; so he asked her which of them he thought the finest hair: she even inquired which of them he esteemed the fairest person; a very delicate question, and which he prudently eluded, by saying, that her majesty was the fairest person of any English, and of any part of England. She next demanded which of them was tallest; he replied, his queen: then is she too tall, said Elizabeth; for I myself am of a just stature. Having learned from him, that his mistress sometimes receded herself by playing on the harpsichord, an instrument on which she herself excelled, she gave orders to Lord Hunsdon, that he should lead the ambassador, as it was customary, into an apartment where he might hear her perform; and when Melvil, as ravished with the harmony, broke into the queen's apartment, she pretended to be displeased with his intrusion; but still took care to ask him, whether he thought Mary or her the best performer on that instrument? From the whole of her behaviour, Melvil thought he might, on his return, assure his mistress, that she had no reason ever to expect any cordial friendship from the Queen Elizabeth, and that all her professions of amity were full of falsehood and dissimulation.

After tw~ years had been spent in evasions and artifices, Mary's subjects and counsellors, and probably herself, began to think it full time that some marriage was concluded; and Lord Darnley, son of the Earl of Lenox, was the person in whom most men's opinions and wishes centred. He was Mary's cousin-ereman, by the Lady

Margaret Douglas, niece to Henry VIII, and daughter of the Earl of Angus, by Margaret, Queen of Scotland. He had been born and educated in England, where the Earl of Lenox had constantly resided, since he had been born by the surviving partner of Dalarny and, as Dalarny was now in his twentieth year, and was a very comely person, tall, and delicately shaped, it was hoped that he might soon render himself agreeable to the crown in order to preserve the franchise of the Hamiltons of the same family with herself; and would, in espousing her, preserve the royal dignity in the house of Stuart: he was, after her, next heir to the crown of England; and the great interest presented to exclude him by his father, or to make him a foreigner, had endeavoured to recommend his title, and give it the preference. It seemed no incon siderable advantage, that she could, by marrying, unite both their claims; and as he was by birth an Englishman, and could not, by his power or alliances, give any ground of suspicion to Elizabeth, it was hoped that the proposal of this marriage would not be unacceptable to that jealous princess.

There was a secret informed of these intentions; 1 and was secretly dis pleased with the projected marriage between Dalarny and the Queen of Scots. 2 She would rather have wished that Mary had continued for ever in a single family, and in the hands of her friends. The scheme effectual, she was satisfied with a choice which freed her at once from the dread of a foreign alliance, and from the necessity of parting with Leicester, her favourite. In her New Year's Day speech the year before, she had secretly desired Mary to invite Lenox into Scotland, to reverse his attitude, and to restore him to his honours and fortune. 3 And when her request was complied with, she openly courted, and would preserve the blood of her father into Scotland; but no sooner did she learn that the Queen of Scots was taken with his figure and person, and that all measures were fixed for espousing him, than she exclaimed against the marriage; sent Throgmorton to order Dalarny immediately, upon his allegiance, to return to England; threw the Countess of Lenox and her second son into the Tower, where they suffered a rigorous confinement; seized all Lenox's English estate; and though it was impossible for her to assign one single reason for her displeasure, 4 she menaced, and protested, and complained, as if she had suffered the most grievous wrongs in the world.

The politics of Elizabeth, through judicious, were usually full of duplicity and artifice; but never more so than in her transactions with the Queen of Scots, where there entered so many little passions and narrow jealousies, that she durst not give to the world the reasons of her conduct, scarcely to her ministers, and scarcely even to herself. But besides a womanish rivalry and envy against the marriage of this princess, she had some motives of interest for feigning a displeasure on the present occasion. It served her as a pretence for refusing to acknowledge Mary's title to the succession of England; a point to which, for good reasons, she was determined never to consent. It was also useful to her, for a purpose still more unfriendly and dangerous, for encouraging the discontent and rebellion of the Scottish nobility and ecclesiastics.

Nothing can be more unhappy for a people than to be governed by a sovereign attached to a religion different from the established; and it is scarcely possible that mutual confidence can ever, in such a situation, have place between the prince and his subjects. Mary's conduct had been hitherto in every respect unexceptionable, and even laudable; yet had she not made such progress in acquiring popularity, as might have been expected from her gracious deportment and agreeable accomplishments. Suspicions every moment prevailed on account of her attachment to the catholic faith, and especially to her uncles, the open and avowed promoters of the scheme for exterminating the professors of the reformed religion throughout all Europe. She still retained the influence of Parliament, and had established the Reformation; she made attempts for restoring to the catholics some part of their civil jurisdiction; 5 and she wrote a letter to the council of Trent, in which, besides professing the most ardent attachment to the catholic faith, she took notice of her title to succeed to the crown of England, and expressed her hopes of being able, in some period, to bring back all her dominions to the bosom of the church. 6 Those hopes of being a foreigner, had endeavoured to recommend his title, and give it the preference. It seemed no incon siderable advantage, that she could, by marrying, unite both their claims; and as he was by birth an Englishman, and could not, by his power or alliances, give any ground of suspicion to Elizabeth, it was hoped that the proposal of this marriage would not be unacceptable to that jealous princess.

of rebellion; and, besides mutual accusations of the former kind, which is difficult to clear up, the malcontent lords, as soon as they saw the queen's marriage entailed, entered into a conspiracy against their sovereign. They met at Stirling; there pretended an anxious concern for the security of religion; framed engagements for mutual defence; and made application for support and protection. The queen, as princess, after publishing the expressions of her displeasure against the marriage, had secretly ordered her ambassadors, Randolph and Throgmorton, to give, in her name, most urgent speculations of support to the English malcontents; to which had even sent them a supply of ten thousand pounds to enable them to begin an insurrection. Mary was no sooner informed of the meeting at Stirling, and the movements of the lords, than she summoned them to appear at court, in order to answer for their conduct; and, having seized some forces to execute the laws, she obliged the rebels to leave the low countries, and take shelter in Argyllshire. That she might more effectually cut off their resources, she proceeded with the king to Glasgow, and forced them from their retreat. They appeared at Paisley, in the neighbourhood, with about a thousand horse; and, passing the queen's army, proceeded to Hamilton, whence they retired to Edinburgh, which they entered without resistance. They expected great reinforcements in this place, from the efforts of Knox and the sedulous preachers; and they beat their drums, desiring all men to enter the towns, and to make war for the defence of God's grace and glory. But the nation was in no disposition for rebellion: Mary was esteemed and beloved: her marriage was not generally disagreeable to the people: and the interested views of the nobles were so well concealed, that their perseverance of zeal for religion had little influence even on the ignorant populace. The king and queen advanced to Edinburgh at the head of their army: the rebels were obliged to retire into the south; and, being pursued by a force, which now amounted to eighteen thousand men, they found themselves under a necessity of abandoning their country, and of taking shelter in England. Elizabeth, when she first heard of this, was much at a loss to disavow her expectations, thought proper to disavow all connexions with the Scottish malcontents, and to declare every where, that she had never given them any encouragement, or any promise of countenance or assistance. She even carried further her disavowal and hypocrisy. Murray had come to London, with the abbot of Kilwinning, agent for Chatelet; and she seduced them, by secret assurances of protection, to declare, before the queen, her credulity and Spanish adherence; they had contributed to their insurrection. No sooner had she extorted this confession from them, than she chased them from her presence, called them unworthy traitors, declared that their rebellion was that of privy councils; and assured them, that she had hitherto given them no encouragement, so should they never sinceforth receive from her any assistance or protection. Throgmorton, alone, whose honour was equal to his abilities, could not be prevailed on to conceal the part which he had acted in the enterprise of the Scottish rebels; and, being well appraised of the usual character and conduct of Elizabeth, he had had the precaution to obtain an order of council to authorize the engagements which he had been obliged to make with them. The banished lords, finding themselves so harshly treated by Elizabeth, had recourse to the clemency of their crown. They had suffered after some solicitation, and some professions of sincere repentance, the Duke of Chandrelur was obtained his pardon, on condition that he should retire into France. Mary was more implacable against the uncrowned King of France for his breaking, and the queen herself was lone of whom she threw the chief blame of the enterprise; but as she was continually pled with applications from their friends, and as some of her most judicious partisans in England thought that nothing would more promote her interests than that kingdom, than the gentle treatment of men of education for the sake of religion, she agreed to give way to her natural temper, which inclined not to severity, and she seemed determined to restore them to favour. In this interval, Rambouillet arrived, which was the second of which Murray complained, in which Mary was so intent, only to call them to order, and prepare the way for their final and absolute destruction. The queen-regent made a pretence of travelling through the kingdom, in order to visit the provinces, and correct all the abuses arising from the late civil war; and, after having held some conferences on the frontiers with the Duke of Lorraine and the Duke of Savoy, she came to Bayeux, where she was met by her daughter, the Queen of Spain, and the Duke of Alva. Nothing was gained in the cause, but new labour and expense; the courts, but gaiety, festivity, love, and joy; and amongst these solemn appearances were secretly fabricated schemes the most bloody, and the most destructive to the hope of mankind, and the peace of nations. As the queen-regent to commence the execution of this project, by the immediate massacre of all the leaders of the hugonots. But that project, though equally harboured against every humane sentiment, was not only approved by the queen, but was already acted into by Alva, who, acting in the name of the queen, in the persons of her own agents, and deputed persons, she had even set to work, and perfected, in order to effect the extermination of the Protestants. The Queen of Scots, whose character bore a greater affinity to that of Alva, was a chief author of this barbarous Conspiracies against the Protestants, and had connected herself with the harvests of the adherents of the Catholic faith; she had understood with those violent councils which were established by the other catholic princes. In consequence of this scheme, when the rigour of the Alva's projects, which she intended to have followed; and made her resolve on the total ruin of the banished lords. A parliament was summoned at Edinburgh for attaining this purpose; an example of paltry and avowed, no doubt was entertained but sentence would be pronounced against them. It was by a sudden and violent event, which, in the issue, brought on the ruin of Mary herself, that they were saved from the rigour of the law.

The marriage of the Queen of Scots with Lord Darnley was so natural, and so inviting in all its circumstances, that it had been precipitately agreed to by that prince and her council; and, while she was allured by his youth, beauty and exterior accomplishments, she had at first overlooked the qualities of his mind, which now corresponded to the excellence of his outward figure. Violent, yet variable in his resolutions; inconstant, yet encredu- lous, and easily governed by flatterers; he was destitute of all gratitude, because he thought no favours equal to his merit; and being addicted to low pleasures, he was equally enterprising and fond of dissipation, pretentious of love and tenderness. The Queen of Scots, in the first effusions of her fondness, had taken a pleasure in exalting him beyond

1 It appears, however, from Randle’s Letter (see Keith, p. 390), that some offers had been made to that minister, of serving Lewis and Darnley, and delivering them into the hands of the Queen of Scots. A manuscript of which states the same story, and says, that the design was acknowledged by the conspireen- tes, and that their express consent was obtained by the queen’s party of the Rose of Hanse, as it is called, See further, Gardiel, vol. ii. p. 183. The motives of which Murray complained, in much uncertainty, are founded on very doubtful evidence. 2 Keith, p. 175, 184, 341.
measure; she had granted him the title of king; she had joined his name with her own in all public acts; she intended to have procured him from the parliament a matrimonial crown; but having leisure afterwards to remark his weakness and vices, she began to see the danger of her profuse liberality, and was resolved thenceforth to proceed with more reserve in the trust which she should confide upon him. His resentment against this policy of his patroness, caused him to passionately desire her death; and the young prince, enraged at her imagined neglects, pointed his vengeance against every one whom he deemed the cause of this change in her measures and behaved towards the court. He searched the cabinets, and found Rizzio,

Morton of Rizzio, who had of late obtained a very extraordinary degree of confidence and favour with the Queen of Scots. He was a Piedmontese, of mean birth, son of a teacher of music, himself a musician; and, finding it difficult to subsist by his art in his own country, he had followed into Scotland an ambassador, whom the Duke of Savoy sent thither to pay his compliments to Mary, some time after her first arrival. He possessed a good ear and a tolerable voice; and as that princess found him useful to complete her band of music, she retained him in her service after the departure of his master. He seemed to enjoy, for some time previous, all the complacencies of his patroness; he incurred her displeasure, she promoted Rizzio to that office, which gave him frequent opportunities of approaching her person and manifesting himself into her favour. He was permitted to rise beyond his rank and education; and he made so good use of the access which fortune had procured him, that he was soon regarded as the chief confidential, and even minister of the queen. He was consulted on all occasions; no favours could be obtained of him by his intercession; all suitors were obliged to gain him by presents and flattery; and the man, insolent from his new exaltation, as well as rapacious in his acquisitions, soon drew on himself the jealousy and hatred of the humble and persecuted subjects of the kingdom. He had at first employed his credit to promote Darnley's marriage; and a firm friendship seemed to be established between them; but on the subsequent change of the queen's sentiments, it was easy for Henry, a friend to persuade him that Rizzio was the real author of her indifference, and even to rouse in his mind jealousies of a more dangerous nature. The favourite was of a disagreeable figure, but was not past his youth; and through the opinion of his criminal correspondence with Mary might seem of itself unreasonable, if not absurd, a suspicious husband could find no other means of accounting for so extraordinary a complacency made during the queen's minority; and even the nobility who had seized the ecclesiastical benefices, began to think themselves less secure in the possession of them: the Earl of Morton, chancellor, was affected by all these considerations, and still more by a rumour spread abroad, that Mary intended to appoint Rizzio chancellor in his place, and to bestow that dignity on a mean and upstart father, ignorant of the laws and language of the court. So indiscreet had this princess been in her kindness to Rizzio, that even that strange report met with credit, and proved a great means of accelerating the ruin of the favourite. Morton, insinuating himself into Henry's confidence, employed all his art to unframe the discontent and jealousy of that prince; and he persuaded him, that the only means of freeing himself from the indignities under which he laboured, was to bring the base stranger to the fite which his father and so worthy men were constantly desired by the whole nation. George Douglas, natural brother to the Countess of Lenox, concurred in the same advice; and the Lords Ruthven and Lindsay, being consulted, offered their assistance in the enterprise; nor was even the Earl of Lenox, the king's father, averse to the design. But as these conspirators were well acquainted with Henry's levity, they engaged him to sign a paper, in which he avowed the undertakings, to tend to the gloire of God and advancement of religion, and promised to protect them against every consequence which might ensue upon the assassination of Rizzio. All these measures being concerted, a messenger was dispatched to the banished lords, who were hovering near the borders; and they were invited by the king to return to their native country.

This design, so atrocious in itself, was rendered still more by the circumstances 9th March. of which it attended its execution. Mary, who was in the sixth month of her pregnancy, was supping in private, and had at table the Countess of Argyle, her natural sister, with Rizzio and others. She was sensible, that any sudden noise might rouse her in her condition; and she had caused the room by a private passage, and stood at the back of Mary's chair: Lord Ruthven, George Douglas, and other conspirators, being all armed, rushed in after him; and the Queen of Scots, terrified with the appearance, demurred at the entrance of them, which they told her, that they intended no violence against her person; but meant only to bring that villain, pointing to Rizzio, to his deserved punishment. Rizzio, aware of the design, fled through the breach left by the breach in the wall, into the garden, and escaped from the house by the back door, with a black mask, and a loaded gun. She immediately sent for the surgeon, whose advice was to follow him, and they accomplished the murder. The queen, unable longer to bear the idea of such a calamity, resolved to fly the court, and named her son as her successor, under the name of James, and the title of Lord Darnley. The queen's escape was concerted with her uncle, who with her, and all her friends, fled to the English borders; where they were received by the king, who was at York; and all the principal nobility of Scotland dispersed themselves as far as they could. The queen, under these circumstances, was not able to retain the sway of the kingdom; and the queen's escape was concerted with her uncle, who with her, and all her friends, fled to the English borders; where they were received by the king, who was at York; and all the principal nobility of Scotland dispersed themselves as far as they could. the confidence of her husband, by her persuasion and patience, and so no sooner were the guards withdrawn, than she engaged him to escape with her in the night time, and take shelter in Dunbar. Many of her subjects here offered her their services: and Mary, having collected an army, which the conspirators had no power to resist, advanced to Edinburgh, and obliged them to fly into England, where they lived in great poverty and distress. They made application, however, to the Earl of Bothwell, a new favourite of Mary's; and that nobleman, desirous of strengthening his party by the accession of their interest, was able to pacify her resentment; and he soon after procured them a return into their own country.

The vengeance of the Queen of Scots was implacable against her husband alone, whose person was before disagreeable to her, and who, by his violation of every tie of gratitude and affection, had placed himself under all her highest resentment. She engaged him to disown all connections with the assassins, to deny any concurrence in their crime, even to publish a proclamation, containing a falsehood so notorious as it was impracticable for him ever to avert the confidence of any party, she threw him off with disdain and indignation. As she had been making an escape from him, she suddenly withdrew to Allow, a seat of the Earl of Mar's; and when Henry followed her thither, she suddenly returned to Edinburgh; and gave him every where the strongest marks of her animosity, and contempt. She encouraged her courtiers in their neglect of him; and she was pleased that his mean equipment and small number of attendants should draw on him the contempt of the rest. She had not been in power four years, when she had fixed her residence in the castle of Edinburgh, which Mary had chosen for the place of her delivery. She there brought forth a son; and as this was very important news to England, as well as to Scotland, she immediately dispatched Sir James Melville to convey intelligence of the happy event to Elizabeth. Melville tells us, that this princess, the evening of her arrival in London, had given a ball to her court at Greenwich, and was dispersed, when a messenger arrived, who implored with an humble air, that his wife, the Queen of Scots was mother of a fair son, while she herself was but a barren stock. Next day, however, at the reception of the ambassador, she resumed her former dissimulation, and in the eyes of Melville, there was no reason to suspect her sincerity. While she was conversing, however, the house had been made in conveying to her the agreeable intelligence, and expressed the utmost cordiality and friendship to her sister.

Some time after, she despatched the young prnce with her Lussaumont, lord of Hunsdon, in order to obtain the consent of the young prince; and she sent by them some magnificent presents to the Queen of Scots.

The birth of a son gave additional zeal to Mary's patriots in England; and even men of the most opposite parties began to cry aloud for some settlement of the succession. These humours broke out with great vehemence in a new train of tumult, held after all provocations. The House of Peers, which had hitherto forebore to touch on this delicate point, here took the lead; and the House of Commons soon after imitated the zeal of the Lords. Molinet opened the matter in the lower House, and proposed that the question of the succession and that of supply should go hand in hand; as if it were intended to constrain the queen to a compliance with the request of her parliament. The council endeavored to quell this agitation; Sir John Suddler told the House, that he had heard the queen positively affirm, that, for the good of her people, she was determined to marry. Secretary Cecil and Sir Francis Knollys, gave their testimony to the same purpose, and they did also Sir Ambrose Cave, chancellor of the duchy, and Sir Edward Rogers, comptroller of the household.

Elizabeth's ambitious and masculine character was so well known, that few members gave any credit to this intelligence; and it was considered merely as an artifice, by which she endeavored to remove that positive declaration, which she had made in the beginning of her reign, that she meant to live and die a virgin. The ministers, therefore, gained nothing further by this piece of policy, than only to engage the House, for the sake of decency, to join in the question of the succession of the crown; and the Commons were proceeding with great earnestness in the debate, and had even appointed a committee to confer with the Lords, when express orders were sent from them, that the business should be put further in the matter. Cecil told them, that she pledged to the House the word of a queen for her sincerity in intentions to marry; that the appointment of a successor would be very acceptable to her, that she herself had had experience, during the reign of her sister, how much court was usually paid to the next heir, and what dangerous sacrifices men were commonly disposed to make in order to remove her, and that she was therefore determined to delay, till a more proper opportunity, the decision of that important question. The House was not satisfied with these reasons, and in general, put off all debate on the subject. Paul Wentworth, a spirited member, went so far as to question whether such a prohibition were not an infringement of the liberties and privileges of the people.

She had already shown an administer of that profound respect which had hitherto been preserved to the queen; and they affirmed that she was bound in duty, not only to provide for the happiness of her subjects during her own life, but also to regard to their future security, by fixing a successor; that she had attended her conduct, she showed herself the step-mother, not the natural parent, of her people, and would seem desirous that England should no longer subsist than she should enjoy the glory and satisfaction of governing it; that none but timorous princes, or tyrants, or faint-hearted women, ever stood in fear of their successors; and that the affections of the people were a firm and impregnable rampart to every sovereign prince, and that the queen, by her wisdom, had courage and magnanimity to put his whole trust in that honourable and sure defence.

The queen, hearing of these debates, sent for the speaker, and after relating her former imprudence, she bade him tell them this: that if any member remained still unsatisfied, he might appear before the privy council, and there give his reasons. As the members showed a disposition, notwithstanding the queen's measures, to continue the question, Elizabeth thought proper, by a message, to revoke them, and to allow the House liberty of debate. They were so mollified by this gracious concession, that they undertook to lay before the House, the smallness of the nation, the want of energy and temper; and they even voted her a supply, to be levied at three payments, of a subsidy and a fifteenth, without annexing any condition to it. The queen soon after dissolved the parliament, and told them, with some sharpness in the conclusion, that their proceedings had contained much dissimulation and artifice; that, under the plausible pretences of marriage and negotiation, many of them concealed the treacherous intentions towards her; but that, however, she reaped this advantage from the attempts of these men, that she could now distinguish her friends from her enemies.

But do you think," added she, "that I am unmindful of your future security, or will be negligent in settling the succession? That is the chief object of my concern; as I know myself to be liable to mortality. Or do you apprehend that I meant to encroach on your liberties? No; it was never my design, I say, to advance to any of you, who was so unwise as to attempt the invasion of your safety. And therefore, henceforward, whether I live to see the like assembly or no, whoever holds the reigns of government, let me warn you to beware of provoking your sovereign's patience, so far as you have done mine. But I shall now conclude, that, notwithstanding the disgust I have received, (for I mean not to part with you among the greater part of you may assure themselves that they go home in their prince's good graces."a

Elizabeth cured further her dignity on this occasion. She had received the subsidy without any condition; but as she thought, being the Comptroller of Mid Territorial, her interest and the gratuity with a view of engaging her to yield to their requests, she thought proper, on her refusal, voluntarily to remit the third payment; and she said, that money in her prerogative purses was as good to her as in her own exchequer.

But though the queen was able to elude, for the present, the applications of parliament, the friends of the Queen of Scots multiplied every day in England; and besides the catholics, many of whom kept a treasurable correspondence with her, and were ready to rise at her command, the court itself of Elizabeth was full of her avowed partizans. The Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Leicester, Pembroke, Bedford, Northumberland, Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and most of the considerable men in England, except Cecil, seemed convinced of the necessity of declaring her the successor. None but the most zealous partisans adored her. The Countess of Devon, her aunt, Eleanor, Countess of Cumberland; and as the marriage of the former seemed liable to some objections, and had been declared invalid, men were alarmed, even on that side of the question, fearing the designs on the succession. Mary's behaviour also, so moderate towards the protestants, and so gracious towards all men, had procured her universal respect; and the public was willing to ascribe any imprudent actions which she had fallen to, to her youth and inexperience. But all these flattering prospects were blasted by the subsequent incidents; where her egregious indiscretions, shall I say, or atrocious crimes, threw her from the height of her prosperity, and involved her in the fatal ruin.

The Earl of Bothwell was of a considerable, able family and power in Scotland; and though not distinguished by any talents either of a civil or military nature, he had made a figure in that party, which opposed the greatness of the Earl of Murray, and the more rigid reformers. He was a man of profligate manners; and involved his opulent fortune in great debts; and even reduced himself to beggary by his profuse expenses; and seemed to have no resource but in desperate counsels and enterprises. He had been accused more than once of an attempt to assassinate Murray; and though that charge had not been brought to a conviction, which had fallen to, to her youth and inexperience. But all these flattering prospects were blasted by the subsequent incidents; where her egregious indiscretions, shall I say, or atrocious crimes, threw her from the height of her prosperity, and involved her in the fatal ruin.

That young prince was reduced to such a state of desperation, by the neglects which he underwent from his queen and the courtiers, that he had once resolved to fly secretly into France or Norway, and had been provided a vessel for that purpose. Some of the most considerable nobility, on the other hand, observing her rooted aversion to him, had proposed some expedients for a divorce; and though Mary's inclination was to continue him her husband, and to have embraced the proposal no further than it should be true and consistent with her own honour and her son's legitimacy, men were inclined to believe that the difficulty of finding proper means for effecting that purpose, was the real cause of laying aside all further thoughts of it. So far were the suspicions against her carried, that when Henry, discouraged with the continual proofs of her hatred, left the court and retired to Glasgow, an illness of an extraordinary nature, with which he was seized immediately on his arrival in that place, was universally ascribed by her enemies to a dose of poison, which, it was pretended, she had administered to him.

While affairs were in this situation, all those who wished well to her championship, and who saw the state to which she was reduced, by her enemies, under the pretence of a poison, were extremely pleased, and somewhat surprised, to hear that a friendship was again conciliated between them, that she had taken a journey to Glasgow on purpose to visit him during his sickness, that she behaved towards him with great tenderness, that she had brought him along with her; and that she appeared thereforth determined to live with him on a footing more suitable to the connections between them. Henry, naturally uxorious, and not distrustting this sudden reconciliation, put himself implicitly into her hands, and attended her to Edinburgh. She lived in the palace of Holywood-house; but as the situation of the palace was low, and the concourse of people about the court was necessarily attended with noise, which might disturb him in his present infirm state of health, these reasons were assigned for fitting up an apartment for him in a solitary house at some distance, called the Kirk of Field. Mary had thereby shown her attachment; she conversed cordially with him; and she lay some nights in a room below his; but on the ninth of February, she told him that she would pass that night in the palace, believing that the apartment, which was there to be celebrated in her presence. About two o'clock in the morning the whole town was much alarmed at hearing a great noise; and was still more astonished, when it was discovered that the noise came from the king's house, which was blown up by guophiders; that his dead body was found at some distance in a neighbouring field; and that no marks either of fire, confusion, or violence, appeared upon it.

No doubt could be entertained of the queen was murdered; and general conjecture soon pointed towards the Earl of Bothwell as the author of the crime. But as his favour with Mary was visible, and his power great, no one ventured to declare openly his sentiments; and all men remained in silence and mute astonishment. Voices, however, were heard in the streets, during the darkness of the night, proclaiming Bothwell, and even Mary herself, to be murderers of the king; bills were secretly affixed on the walls to the same purpose; offers were made that, upon giving proper securities, his guilt should be openly proved. But after one proclamation from the court, offering a reward of five thousand pounds, the author of that villany, greater vigilance was employed in searching out the speakers of the bills and reports against Bothwell and the queen, than in tracing the contrivers of the king's assassination, or detecting the reportists.

The Earl of Lenox, who lived at a distance from court, in poverty and contempt, was roused by the report of his son's murder, and wrote to the queen, imploring speedy justice against the assassins; among whom he named the Earl of Bothwell, Sir James Balfour, and Gilbert Balfour his brother, David Chalmers, and four others of the queen's household; all of them persons who had been mentioned in the bills affixed to the walls at Edinburgh. Mary took his demand of speedy justice in a very literal sense; and allowing only fifteen days for the examination of this important affair, she sent a citation to Lenox, requiring him in answer to charge of the assassination of her husband. This nobleman, meanwhile, and all the other persons accused by Lenox, enjoyed their full liberty; Bothwell himself was continually surrounded with armed men; took his place in council; lived during some time in the house with Mary; and seemed been taxed who had been blown up in ships. to possess all his wonted confidence and familiarity with her. Even the castle of Edinburgh, a place of great consequence in this critical time, was intrusted to him, and under him, to his cousin Sir James, in four, who had himself been publicly charged as an accomplice in the king's murder. 1 Lenox, who had come as far as Stirling, with a view of appearing at the trial, was informed of all those circumstancies which attended him; he began to entertain very just apprehensions from the power, insolence, and temerity of his enemy. He wrote to Mary, desiring that the day of trial might be put off, and required of her all the regard she bore to her own honour, to employ more leisure and deliberation in determining a question of such extreme moment. 2 No regard was paid to this application; the jury was enclosed, of which the Earl of Caithness was chancellor; and though Lenox, foreseeing this precipitancy, had ordered Cunningham, one of his retainers, to appear in court, and protest, in his name, against the unqual of the criminal, the protest proceeded to a verdict. 3 The verdict was such as it behoved them to give, where neither accuser nor witness appeared; and 12th April. Bothwell was absolved from the king's murder. The jury, however, apprehensive that their verdict would give great scandal, and perhaps expel them afterwards to some danger, entered a protest, in which they represented the necessity of their proceedings. 4 It is remarkable, that the indictment was laid against Bothwell for the crime on the ninth of February, not in the tenth, the real day on which Henry was assassinated. 5 The interpretation generally put upon this error, too gross, it was thought, to have proceeded from mistake, was, that they, from a mistaken belief, in the eyes of the court, trusting entirely to precipitation, violence, and authority, had provided this plea, by which they insured, at all adventures, a plausible pretence for acquitting Bothwell.

Two days after this extraordinary transaction, a parliament was held; and though the verdict in favour of Bothwell was attended with such circumstances as strongly confirmed, rather than diminished, the general opinion of his guilt, he was the person chosen to carry the royal sceptre on the first meeting of the national assembly. 6 In this parliament a rigorous act was made against those who set up defamatory bills; but no notice was taken of the king's murder. 7 The favour which Mary openly bore to Bothwell, kept every one in awe; and the effects of this terror appeared more plainly in another transaction, which ensued immediately upon the dissolution of the parliament. 8 The execution, was, that the subscribers, after relating the acquittal of Bothwell by a legal trial, and mentioning a further offer, which he had made, to prove his innocence by single combat, oblige those who had charged him, to retract, and to withdraw the charge. This measure was intended to throw the blame on him of the king's murder, to defend him with their whole power against such calumniators. After this promise, which implied no great assurance in Bothwell of his own innocence, the subscribers mentioned the necessity of that queen's marriage, in order to support the government; and they recommended Bothwell to her as a husband. 9 This paper was subscribed by all the considerable nobility there present. In a country divided by violent factions, such a concurrence in favour by one nobleman, nowise distinguished above the rest, except by his flagitious conduct, could never have been obtained, had not every one been certain, at least firmly persuaded, that Mary was fully determined on this measure. 10 Nor would such a motive have sufficed to influence men, commonly so stubborn and intractable, had they not been taken by surprise, keen of ignorant of each other's sentiments, and overawed by the power and influence of persons so little governed by any principles of honour and humanity. 11

Even with all these circumstances, the subscription in this paper may justly be regarded as a reproach to the nation.

The subsequent measures of Bothwell were equally precipitate and audacious. Mary going to Stirling, to pay a visit to her son, he assembled a body of eight hundred horse, on pretence of pursuing some robbers on the borders. At one o'clock in the afternoon, the return, he seized her person near Edinburgh, and carried her to Dunbar, with an avowed design of forcing her to yield to his purpose. Sir James Melville, one of her ministers, informed him, that he saw no signs of reluctance or constraint: he was even informed, as he tells us, by Bothwell's officers, that the whole transaction was managed in concert with her. 12 A woman, indeed, of that spirit and resolution, which is acknowledged to belong to Mary, does not usually, on these occasions, give such marks of opposition to real violence, as can appear anywise doubtful or ambiguous. Some of the nobility, however, in order to put matters to a further trial, sent her a private message; in which they told her, that if, in reality, she lay under force, they would use all their efforts to rescue her. Her answer was, that she had indeed been carried to Dunbar by violence, but that she would preserve herself serene and composed, and willingly remained with Bothwell. 13 No one gave himself henceforth any concern to relieve her from a captivity, which was believed to proceed entirely from her own application to the king. 14

This unusual conduct was at first ascribed to Mary's sense of the infancy attending her pursuaded marriage; and her desire of finding some colour to gloss over the irregularity of her proceedings. She was a young woman, governed, no doubt, entirely from the interest of her person. The few days after, made the public carry their conjectures somewhat further. In this deed, Bothwell received a pardon for the violence committed on the queen's person; and for all other crimes, which, by which the king was indirectly forgiven. The rape was then conceived to have been only a contrivance, in order to afford a pretence for indirectly remitting a crime, of which it would have appeared scandalous to make openly any mention. 15

These events passed with such rapidity, that men had no leisure to admire sufficiently one incident, when they were surprised with a new one, equally rare and uncommon. There still, however, remained one particular, which it was not easy to foresee how the queen and Bothwell, determined as they were to execute their shameful purpose, could find expedients to overcome. The man who had procured this marriage, was next, by a next step, making him a husband to the queen, and who had acted this seeming violence on her person, in order to force her consent, had been married two years before to another woman, whom she had prevented from being the Earl of Huntley. But persons blinded by passion, and infatuated with crimes, soon shake off all appearance of decency. A suit was commenced for a divorce between Bothwell and his wife; and this suit was commenced at the same instant, in two different, or rather opposite, courts; in the court of the Archbishop of St. Andrews, which was popish, and governed itself by the canon law; and in the new consistorial or commissariat court, which was protestant, and was regulated by the principles of the reformed teachers. The plea, advanced in each court, was so calculated as to suit the principles which there prevailed; in the archbishop's court, the pretence of con-spiration was eminently proper, because Bothwell was related to his wife in the fourth degree; in the commissariat court, the accusation of adultery was made use of against him. The parties, too, who applied for the divorce, were sufficiently different; one was a woman, whose husband she had put, in a former; the other was both in the former, and in the latter. And the suit in both courts was opened, pleaded, examined, and decided, with the utmost precipitation; and a sentence of divorce was pronounced in four days.

The divorce being thus obtained, it was thought proper that Mary should be conducted to Edinburgh, and that there appear before the courts of judicature, and should acknowledge herself restored to entire freedom. This was understood to be contrived in a view of obviating all doubt that might be entertained as to the dissolution of the marriage. But the measure was then given to publish in the church the bans between the queen and the Duke of Orkney; for that was the title which he now bore; and Craig, a minister of Edinburgh, was put to do that for that purpose. This clergyman, not content with having refused compliance, publicly in his sermons condemned the marriage, and exhorted all who had access to the queen to give her their advice against so scandalous an alliance. Being called before the council, to answer for this liberty, he showed a courage which might cover all the nobles with shame, on account of their timeness and servility. He said, that by the rules of the church, the Earl of Bothwell, being convicted of adultery, could not be permitted to marry; that the divorce between him and his former wife was plainly procured by collusion, as appeared by the precipitation of the sentence, and the sudden conclusion of his marriage; and that the Queen, with the suspicion which prevailed, with regard to the king's murder, and the queen's concurrence in the former rape, would thence receive undoubted confirmation. He therefore exhorted the queen to the serious consideration of the present criminal enterprises; and turning his discourse to the other counsellors, he charged them to employ all their influence with the queen, in order to divert her from measures which would ruin her with eternal infamy and discomfiture. Not satisfied even with this admonition, he took the first opportunity of informing the public, from the pulpit, of the whole transaction, and expressed to them his fears, that notwithstanding all remonstrances, their success could not be expected, on her fatal purpose. "For himself," he said, "he had already discharged his conscience, and yet again would take heaven and earth to witness, that he abhorred and detested that resolution, as criminal and hateful in the sight of mankind; but since the great, as he conceived, either by their flatly or silence, gave countenance to the measure, he besought the faithful to pray fervently to the Almighty, that some man, in such a situation, and with good conscience, might, by the divine blessing, be turned to the comfort and benefit of the church and kingdom." These speeches offended the court extremely; and Craig was ordered to be arrested and thrown into tis tetter, in thus passing the bounds of his commission. But he told them, that the bounds of his commission were the word of God, good laws, and natural reason; and that, if Mary's marriage tried by any of these standards, it would appear infamous and dishonourable, and would be so esteemed by the whole world. The council were so overawed by this heroic behaviour in a private clergyman, that they dismissed him without further censure or punishment.

But though this transaction might have recalled Bothwell and the Queen of Scots from their infatuation, and might have instructed them in the dispositions of the people, as well as in their own inability to oppose them, they were still resolved to rush forward to their own manifold destruction.

15th May. The marriage was solemnized by the Queen's own Bishop of Orkney; all persons present, who was mortally Bothwell afterwards deposed by the church for his well-scandalous compliance. Few of the nobility appeared at the ceremony; they had, most of them, estates, as well as should be conducted to Edinburgh, and should The French ambassador, Le Croc, an aged gentleman of honour and character, could not be prevailed on, though a dependant of the house of Guise, to countenance the marriage. The French, however, by friendly letters and messages, against the marriage:

The court of France made like opposition; but Mary, though on all other occasions she was extremely obsequious to the advice of her relations in that country, was here determined to pay no regard to their opinion.

The news of these transactions, being carried to foreign countries, filled Europe with amazement, and threw infamy, not only on the principal actors in them, but also on the whole nation, who seemed, by their submission and silence, and by their deliberate and General dispositions to give their sanction to these scandalous practices. The Scots, who resided abroad, met with such reproaches, that they durst nowhere appear in public; and they earnestly exhorted their countrymen, who remained at home, to free them from the public odium, by bringing to condign punishment the authors of such atrocious crimes. This intelligence, with a little more leisure for reflection, roused men from their lethargy; and the rumours which, from the very beginning, had been spread against Mary, as if she had concurred in the king's murder, seemed now, by the subsequent transactions, to have received a strong confirmation and authority. It was everywhere said, that even though no particular and direct proofs had as yet been produced of the queen's guilt, the whole tenor of her late conduct was sufficient, not only to beget suspicion, but to produce entire conviction against her: that her sudden resolution of being reconciled to her husband, whom before she had long and justly hated; her bringing him to court, from which she had banished him by neglects and rigours; her fitting up separate apartments for him; were all of them circumstances, though trifling; yet being compared with the subsequent events, bore a very unfavourable aspect for her; that the least which, after the king's murder, might have been expected in her situation, was a maniacal acquittal and acquiescence; that she was ever so far removed from the proper tenor of the sentence, and from the terror which her known friendship for the criminal had infused into every one: that the very mention of her marriage to such a man, in such a situation, and with such a state of mind, and the contrivances of extorting a consent from the nobility, and of conciliating a rape, were gross artifices, more proper to discover her guilt than prove her innocence: that where she had been, there she must be accounted, and instead of correcting, provides only thin glosses to cover, her exceptional conduct, she betrays a neglect of fame, which must either be the effect or the cause of the most shameful and abominable actions: that to employ such expedients as she had, a few days before, been so scandalously divorced from his wife; who, to say the least, was believed to have, a few months before, assassinated her husband; was so contrary to the plainest rules of behaviour, that no pre-several of his servants, who afterwards discovered all the circumstances of the king's murder, and were punished for the crime. Bothwell himself escaped in a boat, and was apprehended near Denbigh, where he was thrown into prison, lost his senses, and died miserably about ten years after: an end worthy of his flagitious conduct and behaviour.

The whole of these events, now in the hands of Improvement of Mary an enraged faction, met with such treat- ment as a sovereign may naturally expect from subjects who have their future security to provide for, as well as their present interest; for, in the year 1568, when she may, resign her dignity and crown itself, rather than relinquish her affections. The malcontents, finding the danger to which they were exposed, in case Mary should finally prevail, thought themselves obliged to proceed with vigour against her; and they sent her next day under a guard to the castle of Lochleven, situated in a lake of that name. The mistress of the house was mother to the Earl of Murray; and as she was probably to have been lawfully married to the late King of Scots, she was really of no more account than Mary, and treated her with the utmost harshness and severity.

Elizabeth, who was fully informed of all these incidents, seemed to show some compassion towards the unfortunate Queen; and all her fears and jealousies being now laid asleep, by the consideration of that run and infamy in which Mary's conduct had involved her, she began to reflect on the unpopularity of affairs, the precarious state of royal grandeur, the danger of encouraging rebellious subjects; and she resolved to employ her authority for alleviating the calamities of her unhappy kinswoman.

She wrote to the queen, in order to remonstrate both with Mary and the associated lords; and she gave him instructions, which, though mixed with some lofty pretensions, were full of that good sense which was so natural to him, and of that generosity which the present interesting conjuncture had called forth. She empowered him to declare in her name to Mary, that the late conduct of that princess, so enor- mous, and in every respect so unjustifiable, had given her the highest offence; and though she felt the most vivid pity towards her, she had once determined never to inter- pose in her affairs, either by advice or assistance, but to abandon her entirely, as a person whose condition was unpardonable. This resolve was avowed by the queen herself, and was so firmly determined that she was as well assured that other foreign princes, Mary's near rela- tions, had embraced the same resolution; but, for her part, the late events had touched her heart with more tender sympathies. Yet in this remained not so endearing; she was able to the liberty and interests of the unhappy queen; that she was determined not to see her oppressed by her rebellious subjects; but would employ all her good offices, and even her power, to redeem her from captivity, and place her in such a condition as would at once be com- patible with her dignity, and the safety of her subjects: that she conjured her to lay aside all thoughts of revenge, except against the murderers of her husband; and as she herself was his near relation, she was better entitled than the subjects of Mary, to interpose her authority on that head; and she therefore besought that princess, if she had any regard to her own honour and safety, not to oppose so just and reasonable a demand: that after those two points were provided for, her own liberty, and the punishment of her husband's assassins, the safety of her infant son was next to be considered; and there seemed no expedient more proper for her success in those two important offices, than to be educated in England: and that, besides the security which would attend his removal from a scene of faction and convulsions, there were many other beneficial conse- quences which would arise to more remote as the result of his education in that country.3

1 Melville, p. 84. The reality of this letter appears somewhat disputable; early historians had received it, and even a contemporary of it was written, to his queen for the purpose of af- fecting her before Queen Elizabeth's commissioners.

2 Keith, p. 441, 452, &c.
The remonstrances which Throgmorton was instructed to make to the associated lords, were entirely compatible with these sentiments which Elizabeth entertained in Mary's favour. She empowered him to tell them, that, whatever blame she might throw on Mary's conduct, any opposition to the royal council which would have been thus incompatible with all order and good government: that it belonged not to them to reform, much less to punish, the mal-administration of their prince; and the only arms which, in her estimation, could have any weight against the supreme authority, were entreaties, counsels, and representations: that if these expedients failed, they were next to appeal by their prayers to Heaven; and to wait with patient meekness the Almighty's will. The hearts of princes, should be pleased to turn them to justice and to mercy: that she inculcated not this doctrine, because she herself was interested in its observance; but because it was universally received in all well governed states, and was essential to the preservation of civil society: that she required them to restore their queen to liberty; and promised, in that case, to concur with them in all proper expedients for regulating the government, for punishing the king's enemies, and for guarding the life and liberty of the infant prince: and that if the services, which she had lately rendered the Scottish nation, in protecting them from foreign usurpation, were duly considered by them, they would have found great reason for giving her their hearty thanks, and would esteem themselves blame-worthy in having hitherto made no application to her.

Elizabeth, besides these remonstrances, sent, by Throgmorton, two articles, one of which was to suppress any reform, or change in the religion of the country, and was to propose to both parties, as expedients for the settlement of public affairs; and though these articles contained some important restraints on the sovereign power, they were in the main calculated for Mary's advantage and were sufficiently intelligant to her. The associated lords, who determined to proceed with greater severity, were apprehensive of Elizabeth's partiality; and being sensible that Mary was too powerful to procure from the protection of that powerful princess, they thought proper, after several affected delays, to refuse the English ambassador all access to her. There were four different schemes proposed in Scotland, for the treatment of the captive queen: one, that she should be sent to France, and married to Francis; another, that she should be confined to her own dominions; a third, that she should be deposed; a fourth, that she should be sent to the Tower of London. Of all these proposals, Elizabeth was most averse to that of confinement; she determined, on the contrary, to increase the vanity of the queen's situation, by the enticements and threats which she employed in her negotiations with the princes of the blood, and by her continual promises to them of a speedy and public restoration. She was, however, at last overruled by the necessities of her case. She was, at length, determined to attempt the impracticable measure of removing Mary from thence to France; and for this purpose she employed Lord Murray, a man of great influence and abilities, as the agent for the execution of her designs. Murray was accordingly sent to Scotland, and succeeded so well in his mission that he was sent back to France with the assurance of an effectual accomplishment of his plan.

Throgmorton had orders from the queen not to assist at the coronation of the King of Scots.

The council of regency had not long occasion to exercise their authority. The Earl of Murray arrived from France, and was to proceed thither with the queen: but with the intention of a visit to the captive queen; and spoke to her in a manner which better suited her past conduct than her present condition. This harsh treatment quite extinguished in her all regard for public duties; and Murray succeeded afterwards to break, in a more public manner, all terms of decency with her. He summoned a parliament; and that assembly, after voting that her majesty had been an accomplice in her husband's murder, condemned her to imprisonment, ratified her demission of the crown, and acknowledged her son for king, and Murray for regent.

The regent, a man of vigour and abilities, acted to re-establish government, and was entirely successful; he restored the peace of the kingdom, and maintained order and tranquility. He bribed Sir James Balfour to surrender the castle of Edinburgh: he constrained the garrison of Dunbar to open their gates; and he demolished that fortress.

But though every thing thus bore a favourable aspect to the new government, and all men seemed to acquiesce in Murray's authority, a violent revolution, however necessary, can never be effected without great disorders: and it was not likely that attending the general division, in its most settled state, possessed a very disputed authority, a new establishment should meet with no interruption or disturbance. Few considerable men of the nation seemed willing to support the government of Murray, so that he was, as it were, in a situation where he could, at will, be displaced; but the removal of that obnoxious nobleman had altered the sentiments of many. The Duke of Lenox, being disappointed of the regency, bore no ill will to Murray, and the same sentiments were embraced by all his numerous retainers. Several of the nobility, finding that others had taken the lead among the associates, formed a faction apart, and opposed the prevailing power: and became the benefactors of some remains of duty and affection towards Mary, the malcontent lords observing every thing carried to extremity against her, were naturally led to embrace her cause, and shelter themselves under her authority. All who retained any propensities to that cause, and rejoiced at the declension of so many amiable accomplishments, joined to such high dignity, should be treated with such extreme severity.

Animated by all these motives, many of the principal nobility, now adhering to the Queen of Scots, met at Hamilton, and concerted measures for supporting the cause of that princess.

While these humours were in fermentation, Mary was... employed in contrivances for effecting her escape; and she engaged by her charms and cærees, a young gentleman, George Douglas, brother to the laird of Lochleven, to assist her in that enterprise. She even went so far as to give him hopes of espousing her, if her marriage with William could be dissolved by force on the plea of force; and she proposed this expedient to the regent, who rejected it. Douglas, however, persevered in his endeavours to free her from captivity; and having all opportunities of access to the house, he was at last successful in the undertakings. He conveyed her to disguise into a small boat, and himself rowed her ashore. She hastened to Hamilton; and the news of her arrival in that place being immediately spread abroad, many of the nobility flocked to her with their forces. A bond of association for her defence was signed by the Earl of Argyle, Hamilton, Eglinton, Crawford, Cumnock, Dumbarton, Errol, nine bishops, and nine barons, besides many of the most considerable gentlemen. And in a few days, an army, to the number of six thousand men, was assembled under her standard.

Elizabeth was no sooner informed of Mary's escape, than she discovered her resolution of persevering in the same generous and friendly measures which she had hitherto taken: and she had not employed force against the regent, during the imprisonment of that princess, she had been chiefly withheld by the fear of pushing him to greater extremities against her; but she had proposed to the council the use of an expedient, though less violent, would have been no less effectual for her service: she desired that France and England should by concert cut off all commerce with the Scots, till they should do justice to the imprisoned sovereign; and she also dispatched Lightfoot into Scotland to offer both her good offices, and the assistance of her forces, to Mary; but as she apprehended the entrance of French troops into the kingdom, she dreaded the competition between the Queen of Scots and her subjects might, by that means, be entirely removed from her arbitration, and that no foreign succours should be introduced into Scotland.

But Elizabeth had not leisure to exert fully her efforts in favour of Mary. The enterprise made haste to assemble forces; and notwithstanding that his army was inferior in number to that of the Queen of Scots, he took the field against her. A battle was fought at Langside, near Glasgow, which was entirely decisive in favour of the regent; and though Murray, after his victory, stopped the bloodshed, yet was the action followed by a total dispersion of the queen's party. That dispersion was caused by the flight of the Queen of Scots and her subjects; by the departure of the French from the field of battle with great precipitation, and cause, with few attendants, to the borders of England. She here declinced concerning her next measures, which would probably have been more favourable to herself had her heart been more composed. She found it impossible to remain in her own kingdom; she had an aversion, in her present wretched condition, to return into France, where she had formerly appeared with so much splendour; and she was not, besides, provided with a vessel which could safely convey her thither: the late generous behaviour of Elizabeth made her hope for protection, and even assistance, from that quarter; and as the present fears from her domestic enemies were the most urgent, she overtook all other considerations, and embraced the resolution of taking shelter in England. She embarked on board a fishing boat in Galloway, and landed the same day at Wigtown, in Cumberland, about thirty miles from Carlisle: whence she immediately despatched a messenger to London; notifying her arrival, desiring leave to visit Elizabeth, and craving her protection, in consequence of former professions of friendship made her by that princess.

Elizabeth now found herself in a situation when it was become necessary to take some decisive resolution with regard to the mutilation of the Queen of Scots. She had hitherto, contrary to the opinion of Cecil, attended more to the motives of generosity than of policy; she was engaged by that prudent minister, to weigh above all the considerations which occurred in this critical conjuncture. He represented, that the party which had dethroned Mary, and had at present assumed the government of Scotland, was always attached to the English alliance, and was engaged, by all the motives of religion and of interest, to persevere; and that if he should resist, both Murray and his friends might complain of some undue usage during their banishment in England, they would easily forestall these grounds of quarrel, when they reflected that Elizabeth was the only ally on whom they could safely rely, and that their own queen, by her attachment to the Catholic faith, and by her other concessions, excluded them entirely from the friendship of France, and even from that of Spain; that Mary, on the other hand, even before her violent breach with her protestant subjects, was to secret entirely governed by the counsels of the house of Guise; much more would she implicitly comply with their views; England would appear as easy, as that on her own family and of the jealous catholics was become her sole resource and security; that her pretensions to the English crown would render her a dangerous instrument in their hands; and she would alloy the greater part of the Scottish and English catholics, with those of all foreign states, in a confederacy against the religion and government of England: the same was the present caution in the design of restoring her rival to the throne; and to take care, both that this enterprise, if undertaken, should be effectuated by English forces alone, and that full security should be taken in the French, and the Reformation in Scotland: that above all, it was necessary to guard carefully the person of that princess; lest, finding this unexpected reserve in the English friendship, she should return and re-establish herself in France, and should attempt, by foreign force, to recover possession of her authority: that her desperate fortunes and broken reputation faded her for any attempt; and her resentment, when she should find herself deserted by the queen, would convert her with revenge; and it was necessary to dissuade her, and render her so unremitting as well as powerful enemy to the English government; that if she were once abroad, to the hands of enterprising catholics, the attack upon her would appear as easy, as that on Scotland; and the only method, she must imagine, of recovering her native kingdom, would be to acquire that crown, to which she would seem herself equally entitled; that a neutrality in such interesting situations, though it might be pretended, could never, without the most extreme danger, be upheld by the queen; and the detention of Mary was equally requisite, whether the power of England were to effectually be established in Scotland, or it should, indeed, was more becoming a great prince than generosity; yet the suggestions of this noble principle could never, without imprudence, be coalesced in such delicate circumstances; and, in the present state of affairs, the enterprise of rescuing the Queen of Scots from the English should be placed; where her own safety and the interests of her people were intimately connected in every resolution which she embraced; that though the example of successful rebellion, especially in a neighbouring country, would somehow be acceptable in any sovereign, yet Mary's imprudence had been so great, perhaps her crimes so enormous, that the insurrection of subjects after such provocation, could no longer be regarded as a precedent against others princes: that it was first necessary for Elizabeth to ascertain, in a regular and satisfactory manner, the extent of Mary's guilt, and thence to determine the degree of protection which she ought to afford her against her discontented subjects: that as no glory could surpass that of defending oppressed innocence, it was equally infamous to patronize vice and murder on the throne; and the con- tagion of such dishonour would extend itself to all who countenanced or supported it: and that, if the crimes of the Scottish princess should, on inquiry, appear as great and certain as was affirmed and believed, every measure against her should be taken, and only those attempts justified: or if she should be found innocent, every enterprise, which friendship should inspire, would be acknowledged laudable and glorious.
Agreeably to these views, Elizabeth resolved to proceed in a seemingly generous, but really cautious, manner with the Queen of Scots; and she immediately sent orders to Lady Scrope, sister to the Duke of Norfolk, a lady who lived in the neighbourhood, to attend on that princess. Scrope was a representative to the Queen, and was sent to express to her, in behalf of the marches, and Sir Francis Knollys, vice-chamberlain. They found Mary already lodged in the castle of Carlisle; and, after expressing the queen’s symptoms, and assuring her that she was so strongly attached to Elizabeth that her request of being allowed to visit her sovereign, and of being admitted to her presence, could not at present be complied with; till she had cleared herself of her husband, she was so strongly accused by Elizabeth, could not, without dishonour, show her any countenance, or appear indifferent to the assassination of so near a kinsman. So unexpected a check threw Mary into tears; and the necessity of her situation exerted within her heart, more than nature. She also considered, that though that queen had hitherto appeared partial to Mary, many political motives evidently engaged her to support the king’s cause in Scotland; and it was not to be doubted, but this penetration, and, in the end, discover this interest, and would at least afford him a patient and equitable hearing. He therefore replied, that he would himself take a journey to England, attended by other commissioners; and would willingly submit the dispute, which was his cause to the law.

Lord Herres now perceived that his mistress had advanced too far in her concessions; he endeavoured to maintain, that Mary could not, without diminution of her royal dignity, submit to a cause of rebellious subjects before a foreign prince; and he required either present and from England or liberty for his queen to pass over into France. Being pressed, however, with the former request, he submitted a letter to the Duke of Norfolk, which, on the contrary, renewed his consent; but a few days he began anew to recall; and it was with some difficulty that he was brought to acquiesce in the first determination. These fluctuating terms, which were unnecessarily renewed, showed his visible reluctance to the measures pursued by the court of England.

The Queen of Scots discovered no less aversion to the trial proposed; and it required all the artifice and prudence of Elizabeth to make her persuade in the agreement to which she had at first consented. This latter princess still said to her, that she desired not, without Mary’s consent or ratification, to enter into the controversy, and intended only, as a friend, to bear her justification: that she was confident there would be found no difficulty in refute all the calumnies of her enemies; and even if her apology should fail short of full conviction, Elizabeth was determined to support her cause, and procure her some reasonable terms of accommodation: and that it was never meant that she should be cited to a trial on the accusation of her rebellious subjects; but, on the contrary, that she should be summoned to appear, and to justify themselves for their conduct towards her. Allured by these plausible professions, the Queen of Scots agreed to vindicate herself, by her own commissioners, before commissioners appointed by Elizabeth.

During these transactions, Lord Scrope and Sir Francis Knollys, who resided with Mary at Carlisle, had leisure to study her character and make report of it to Elizabeth. Unbroken by her misfortunes, resolute in her purpose, active in her enterprises, she aspired to nothing but victory. She was determined to undergo any difficulty, and to try every fortune, rather than abandon her cause, or yield the superiority to her enemies. Eloquent, manning, affable; she had alreadyconcerted all her friends and dependents both of her past conduct; and as she declared her fixed purpose to require aid of her friends all over Europe, and even to have recourse to the barons, and baronets, rather than repel the ambitious claims or the attempt of her enemies. The court of England, therefore, who, under pretence of guarding her, had already, in effect, accompanied her, was not easy to foresee the danger to which her charms, her spirit, her address, if allowed to operate with their full force, would expose them. again taken arms against her after her deliverance from person; had rejected all her proposals for accommodation; had given battle to her troops; and had obliged her, for the safety of her person, to take shelter in England.\(^a\) The Earl of Murray, in answer to this complaint, gave a summary account of the occurrences of the late executions: she was, the Earl of Bothwell; the known murderer of the late king, had, a little after committing that crime, seized the person of the queen, and led her to Dunbar; that he acquainted with his own danger, and murdered her, as to try her consent to marry him, and he had accordingly procured a divorce from his former wife, and had pretended to celebrate his nuptials with the queen; that the scandal of this transaction was such, that it brought the king’s name upon her son, and had appointed the Earl of Murray regent during the minority.\(^b\) The queen’s answer to this apology was obvious: that she did not know, and never could suspect, that Bothwell, who had been acquitted by a jury, and reconciled to the nation and to his husband, the murderer of the king; that she never was, and still continues, desirous that if he be guilty, he may be brought to condign punishment; that her renunciation of the crown was extorted from her by the well-grounded fears of her life, and even by direct menaces of violence; and that Throgmorton, the English ambassador, as well as others of her friends, had advised her to sign that paper, as the only condition of escape from theSPACE残酷, and had assured her that a consent, given under these circumstances, could never have any validity.\(^c\)

So far the Queen of Scots seemed plainly to have the advantage in the contest; and the English commissioners might have been surprised that Murray had made so weak a defence, and had suppressed all the material imputations against that princess, on which his party had ever so strenuously insisted; had not some private conferences previously informed them of the secret. Mary’s commissioners had boasted, that Elizabeth, from regard to her kinwoman, and from her desire of maintaining the rights of sovereignty, was determined, how criminal soever the conduct of the Queen of Scots might appear, to produce such a measure as would carry effectually the commission and Murray, reflecting on some past measures of the English court, began to apprehend that there were but too just grounds for these expectations. He believed that Mary, if she would agree to conceal the most violent part of the accusation against her, would submit to any reasonable terms of accommodation; but if he once procceeded so far as to charge her with the whole of her guilt, no composition could afterwards take place; and should she ever be restored, either by the power of Elizabeth, or the assistance of her other friends, he and his party must be exposed to her severe and implacable vengeance? He resolved, therefore, not to venture rashly on a measure which it would be impossible for him ever to recall; and he privately paid a visit to Norfolk and the other English commissioners, confessed his scruples, had before them the evidence of the queen’s guilt, and desired to have some security for Elizabeth’s protection, in case that evidence should, upon examination, appear entirely satisfactory.

Norfolk was not secretly displeased with these scruples of the matter.\(^d\) He had ever been a partaker of the Queen of Scots; Secretary Lindsay, who begun also to include that party, and was a man of singular address and capacity, had engaged him to embrace further views in her favour, and even to think of espousing her; and through that duke confessed,\(^\text{d}^\,\text{d}^\) that the proofs against Mary seemed to be unquestionable, he encouraged Murray in his present reso-nution, not to produce them publicly in the conferences before the king and queen.\(^e\)

Norfolk, however, was obliged to transmit to court the queries proposed by the regent. These queries consisted of four particulars. Whether the English commissioners had authorized the sentence of the queen against Mary, in case her guilt should be fully proved before them? Whether they would promise to exonerate that authority, and proceed to an actual sentence? Whether the Queen of Scots should be allowed to be delivered into the hands of the regent, or, at least, be so secured in England, that she never should be able to disurb the tranquility of Scotland? And, Whether Elizabeth would also, in that case, promise to excommunicate the young king, and protect the regent in his authority?\(^f\)

Elizabeth, when these queries, with the other transactions, were laid before her, began to think that she pointed her own direction more clearly and more advantageously than she had hitherto expected. She determined, therefore, to bring the matter into full light; and under pretext that the distance from her person retarded the proceedings of her commissioners, she desired the regent to proceed against her, and there continue the conferences. On their appearance, she immediately joined in commission with them some of the most considerable of her council; Sir Nicholas Bacon, lord keeper, the Earl of Arundel and Leicester, Lord Clinton, and Sir Edward Wotton; and the Queen of Scots, who knew of nothing these secret motives, and who expected that fear or decency would still restrain Murray from proceeding to any violent accusation against her, expressed an entire satisfaction in this advantageous resolution, and declared that the affair, being under the immediate inspection of Elizabeth, was now in the hands where she most desired to rest it.\(^g\) The conferences were accordingly continued; and when the English commissioners were, as before, made no scruple to be present at them.

The queen, meanwhile, gave a satisfactory answer to all Murray’s demands, and declared, that though she wished and hoped, from the present inquiries, to be entirely convinced of Mary’s innocence, yet, if the event should prove contrary, and that princess should appear guilty of her husband’s murder, she should, for her own part, deem her unworthy of unworthy of any protection. The regent, encour-ged by this declaration, opened more fully his charge against the Queen of Scots, and, after expressing his reluctance to proceed to that extremity, and protesting that nothing but the necessity of self-defence, which must not be abdoned for any reason, could induce him in such a measure, he proceeded to accuse her in plain terms of participation and consent in the assassination of the king.\(^h\)

The Earl of Lenox, too, appeared before the English com-misioners; and imploring vengeance for the murder of his son, accused Mary as an accomplice with Bothwell in that enormity.\(^i\)

When this charge was unexpectedly given in, and copies of it were transmitted to the Bishop of Ross, Lord Hearres, and the other commissioners of Mary, they absoolutely refused to return an answer; and they grounded their silence on very extraordinary reasons: they had orders, they said, from William and Mary, an advanced that might touch her honour, not to make any defence, as she was a sovereign princess, and could not be subject to any tribunal; and they required that she should previously be admitted to Elizabeth’s presence, to whom, and to whom alone, she was determined to justify her innocence.\(^j\) They forgot that the conferences were at first begun, and were still continued, with no other view, than to come to an agreement, that Elizabeth should have entire power to enter into them only as her friend, by her own consent and approbation, not as assuming any jurisdiction over her; that this princess had, from the beginning, refused to admit her to her presence, and that the messenger, having been allowed to address her, had thereupon discovered no new signs of partiality by her perseverance in that resolution; and that though she had granted an audience to the Earl of Huntingdon, she had not thereby implied that she would have given the same honour on Mary’s commissioners; and her conduct was so far entirely equal to both parties.

As the commissioners of the Queen of Scots refused to agree to the King’s proposal for the settlement of the dispute, the consequence seemed to be, that there could be no further proceedings in the conference. But though this silence might be interpreted as a presumption against her, it did not fully answer the purpose of those English ministers with whom she had been conversing, and engaged to have in their hands the proofs of her guilt; and, in order to draw them with decency from the regent, a judicious artifice was employed by Elizabeth. Murray was called before them, and the English commissioners, and reproved for having, in the queen’s name, for the atrocious imputations which he had the temerity to throw upon his sovereign; but though the Earl of Murray, they added, and the other commissioners, had so far forgotten the duty of allegiance to their prince, the queen never would overlook what she owed to her friend, her neighbour, and her kinswoman; and she therefore desired to know what they could say in her defence. Murray, who had made so much difficulty in producing the proofs of his charge against the Queen of Scots; and among the rest some love-letters and somers of hers to Bothwell, written all in her own hand, and two other papers, one written in her own hand, and another in her own hand, for the Earl of Huntingdon, each of which contained a promise of marriage with Bothwell, made before the pretended trial and acquittal of thatobbyman.

These papers having been kept by Bothwell in a silver box or casket, which had been given him by Mary, and which had belonged to her first husband, Francis; and though the princess had enjoined him to burn the letters soon after his marriage. The letters, he had thought proper carefully to preserve them as pledges of her fidelity, and had committed them to the custody of Sir James Balfour, deputy-governor of the castle of Edinborough. When that fortress was besieged by the associate lords, Bothwell sent a servant to receive the casket from the hands of the deputy-governor. Balfour delivered it to him; but he could not be satisfied, and not without disgust from Bothwell, and secretly negotiating an agreement with the ruling party, he took care to convey private intelligence to the Earl of Morton, to make the papers themselves known. There was not discovered any discreditable proofs of Mary’s criminal correspondence with Bothwell, of her consent to the king’s murder, and of her concurrence in the violence which Bothwell pretended to have committed, nor even any testimonies of corresponding facts; and he added, some time after, the dying confession of one Hubert, or French Pars, as he was called, a servant of Bothwell’s, who had been executed for the king’s murder, and who directly charged Bothwell, with her being necessary to that criminal enterprise.

Mary’s commissioners had used every expedient to ward this blow which they saw coming upon them, and against which, it appears, they were not provided with any proper defence. As soon as Murray opened his charge, they endeavoured to turn the conference from an inquiry into a negotiation; and though informed by the English commissioners, and the English council, of the many dishonourable for their ministers, to enter into a treaty with such undutiful subjects, before she had justified herself from those enormous imputations which had been cast upon her. She therefore found herself at last reduced to settle terms of accommodation between Mary and her enemies in Scotland. They maintained that, till all these matters had been given in her answer to Murray’s charge, her proofs could not be put forward; and, without getting anything, finding that the English commissioners were still determined to proceed in the method which had been projected, they finally broke off the conferences, and never would make any reply. These papers, least published. The objections made to their authenticity are, in general, of small force: but were they ever so spurious, they cannot now be hearkened to; since Mary, at the time when the truth could have been fully cleared, and it could have been ascertained, whether she had any such a dangerous lurkage, which must have rendered them infamous if discovered; since their errors, from Mary’s known conduct, even without these letters, was sufficiently good and justifiable. (114) Murray opposed these letters to the examination of persons qualified to judge of them, the Scotch council, the Scotch parliament, Elizabeth Queen and her council, who were composed of a great number of Mary’s partisan letters. (111) He gave Mary herself an opportunity of refusing and expunging him, if she had chosen to lay hold of. (116) The letters tally well with all the other parts of her conduct during that transaction, that these proofs throw the strongest light on each other. (116) It is the first time, what no one before, what no one from the King, gave him an account of the same conversation. (94) There seems very little reason why the ministers and the associate lords should be so much at a disadvantage with which they were furnished, if not many very suspicious circumstances, and his association-oldest in the gave Mary herself an opportunity of refusing and expunging him, if she had chosen to lay hold of. (116) The letters tally well with all the other parts of her conduct during that transaction, that these proofs throw the strongest light on each other. (116) It is the first time, what no one before, what no one from the King, gave him an account of the same conversation. (94) There seems very little reason why the ministers and the associate lords should be so much at a disadvantage with which they were furnished, if not many very suspicious circumstances, and his association-oldest in the satisfaction, was determined that the most eminent part of the court should also be associated with them in the transactions, and should be convinced of the equity of her proceedings. She ordered her privy council to be assembled; and, that she might render the matter more solemn and impressive, and made it more sensible to the persons that then, the Earls of Northumberland, Westmoreland, Shrewsbury, Worscester, Huntington, and Warwick. All the proceedings of the English commissioners were read to them: the event was more than probable, but, upon which, a great number of letters written by Mary to Elizabeth were read before them, and the hand-writing compared with that of the letters delivered in by the regent: the refusal of the Queen of Scots to accept of the commission was related also to them on the whole, Elizabeth told them, that as she had from the first thought it improper that Mary, after such horrid crimes were imputed to her, should be admitted to her presence before she had, in some measure, justified herself from the crime; that her guilt was confirmed by so many evidences, and all answer refused, she must, for her part, persevere more steadily in that resolution.\(^\text{6}\) Elizabeth next called in the Queen of Scots' commissioners, and after a laborious examination determined that it much more decent for her ministers to continue the conferences, than to require the liberty of justifying herself in person, to them, that Mary might either send her reply by a pension, or accept of the commission, or else to submit to a sensible English nobleman, whom Elizabeth should appoint to wait upon her: but as to her resolution of making no reply at all, she must regard it as the strongest confession of guilt; and she even desired her friends who had advised her to that method of proceeding.\(^\text{7}\) These topics unexpectedly opened against her. Though she could not expect Elizabeth's final determination, it was of considerable advantage to her to know, if she had any, to the accession of the Scottish commissioners. That was for the benefit of the public, and of posterity. And surely, after the accession and proofs which had been given, it was not to be thought to be any further answer, Mary's information, that the queen or her nimble tongue to a demonstration of her own guilt.\(^\text{8}\) The very decision of these letters is a perversion of their authority. That answer could be accepted for no way but from the caprice of James I.'s courtiers, who were desirous to destroy every proof of his mother's crimes. The disappearance of Mary's narrative, and of its concession, from the Cotton library, Calig. i, must have proceeded from a like cause.\(^\text{9}\)\n
I find an objection made to the authenticity of the letters, drawn from the secret of the parliament, which is yet to be wrote and subscribed by Queen Mary's own hand; whereas the copies given in to the parliament a few days after, were only written, not subscribed.\(^\text{10}\) Goodall, ed. p. 64. 67. But it is not considered that this circumstance is of no reason of force; there were certain letters, true or false, left be fore the council; and whether the letters were true or false, this mistake proceeds from an equal error, and is a sin in the work.\(^\text{11}\) The matter may be accounted for: the letters were only written by her the second commission, her own confection, and discovered, or admitted, as such, by her sufficient at tention, and other deeds signed by the queen, where the place and date do not agree with the dates and places, is possible.\(^\text{12}\) But the fact, that her letter which is a conclusive and material fact, is not proved, is a searching of the case, a personal influence, which he could not possibly foresee, and which no one could have suspected authority.

The account given by Morton of the manner in which the papers came into his hands is very natural. When he gave it to the English commissioners, he had reason to think it would be exclaimed with all the terror of able advantage, interested in the highest degree to refute it. It is probable that he could have confirmed it by many circumstances and testimonies, which he declared the contrary.\(^\text{13}\)

The reasons are particular, no doubt that both Rainolds and Leonard, who knew Queen Mary's style, were assur ed, when they saw them, that they could not be of her composition. Jebb, ed. p. 66. But no person is equal in his productions, especially one whose style so little bored before Mary's must be supposed to be. Not in mention that such dangerous and erring practices were the more to be suspected.\(^\text{14}\)\n
So, in short, Queen Mary might easily have confuted the whole en tropy against her husband, a stupid opinion to many one person excepted.\(^\text{15}\) Goodall, ed. p. 67. It was very difficult to conduct it so that her conduct should not be trave passed: in the present case her conduct was so great as in her every body every time, and convince those among her enemies hands, and convinced her own.\(^\text{16}\) That was the one information of her imprudence, which happily in the usual attendant of great crimes, will not be found so strikingly in the case of the Queen of Scots.\(^\text{17}\) He was in one correspondence of the foregoing narrative, contained in the history, that is taken from Kranke's account.\(^\text{18}\)

She may have been an accomplice of his murder; at least the nature of her being an accomplice in her husband's murder is un precentedly produced.\(^\text{19}\) It is true, the author, having repeated four or five lines on this account of this pretense of being admitted to Elizabeth's presence, and having expressed his opinion, that, as it had been derived from the beginning, he was to be the exponent of the conferences, she did not expect to have been associated in the writings of the narrator, in which Mary is said simply to refuse answering, and then a similar manner.\(^\text{20}\) Goodall, ed. p. 66. But I must answer, and relate her answers, without inserting this condition, which occurs in the letter of the historian, that I had no reason to write, I am only to use, and to supply the omissions.\(^\text{21}\) This is wholly contrary to the intention expressed and it would be impossible (as indeed it was impossible); and not being willing to have my writings thereby, I could not be more simple, that she had refused to make any answer.\(^\text{22}\) I believe there is not one reason that can be discovered in the present state of the case, why Queen Mary must be supposed to be.\(^\text{23}\)

It is expedient to observe, that the author of the narrative, in which Mary is said simply to refuse answering, and then a similar manner.\(^\text{24}\) Goodall, ed. p. 66. But I must answer, and be very civility, and almost directly, calls the author a narrative, in which Mary is said simply to refusing answering, and then a similar manner.\(^\text{25}\) Goodall, ed. p. 66. And does not see that, accordingly to this narrative, Queen Mary would answer and relate her answers, without inserting this condition, which occurs in the letter of the historian, that I had no reason to write, I am only to use, and to supply the omissions.\(^\text{26}\) This is wholly contrary to the intention expressed and it would be impossible (as indeed it was impossible); and not being willing to have my writings thereby, I could not be more simple, that she had refused to make any answer.\(^\text{27}\) I believe there is not one reason that can be discovered in the present state of the case, why Queen Mary must be supposed to be.\(^\text{28}\) regency of the King of Scots, she thought proper to detain him till after Murray's departure. But notwithstanding these marks of favour, and some other assistance which she secretly gave this latter nobleman, she still declined acknowledging this young king, or treating with Murray as Regent of Scotland.

Orders were given for removing the Queen of Scots from Bolton, a place surrounded with cathedrals, to Tutbury, where she was to reside in a building put up for the custody of the Earl of Shrewsbury. Elizabeth entertained hopes that this princess, discouraged by her misfortunes, and confounded by the late transactions, would be induced, in her present situation, to renounce that title which she had so recently assumed; and she promised to bury every thing in oblivion, provided Mary would agree, either voluntarily to resign her crown, or to associate her son with her government; and that she should remain, during her minority, in the hands of the Earl of Murray.

But that high-spirited princess refused all treaty upon such terms, and declared that her last words should be those of a Queen. Besides many other reasons, she said, which fixed her in her resolution, she knew, that if, in the present emergency, she made such concessions, her submission would be universally deemed an acknowledgment of guilt, and would ratify all the calamities of her reign.

Mary still insisted upon this alternative; either that Elizabeth should assist her in recovering her authority, or should give her liberty to retire into France, and make trial of the fidelity of other princes who, as she pretended, still adhered to her; or that she should come voluntarily into England, invited by many former professed enemies of her majesty, she thought that one or other of these requests could not, without the most extreme measures, be refused her. But Elizabeth, sensible of the danger which attended both these proposals, was secretly resolved to detain her still a captive; and as her retreat into England had been little voluntary, her claim upon the queen's generosity appeared much more urgent than she was willing to pretend. Necessity, it was thought, would, to the prudent, justify her detention: her past misconduct would apologize for it to the equitable; and though it was foreseen, that confinement for Mary's situation, joined to her intrigues and insinuating behaviour, would, while she remained in England, excite the zeal of her friends, especially of the catholics, these inconveniences were deemed much inferior to those which attended any other expedition. Elizabeth trusted also to her own address for eluding all these difficulties; she purposed to avoid breaking absolutely with the Queen of Scots, and to hope for a reconciliation, which by degrees she was to negotiate perpetually with her, and still to throw the blame of not coming to any conclusion, either on unforeseen accidents, or on the obstinacy and perseverance of others.

We come now to some consideration some of the claims which we left behind us, that we might not interrupt our narrative of the events in Scotland, which seem so material a part of the present reign. The term fixed by the treaty of Chaumont-Cambray for the restitution of Calais expired in 1567; and Elizabeth, after making her demands at the gates of that city, sent Sir Thomas Smith to Paris; and that minister, in conjunction with Sir Henry Norris, her resident ambassador, favored her pretensions. Conferences were held on that head, without coming to any conclusion satisfactory to the English. The chancellor, De l'Hospital, told the English ambassadors, that though France, by an article of the treaty, was obliged to restore Calais on the expiration of eight years, there was another article of the same treaty, which now deprived Elizabeth of any right that could accrue to her by that engagement: that it was agreed, if the English should, during the interval, commit hostilities upon France, they should instantly forfeit all claims to Calais; and the taking possession of Havre and Dieppe, with whatever pretences that may be urged, might be considered as an act of war, and alter peace between the nations: that though these places were not entered by force, but put into Elizabeth's hands by the governors, these governors were rebels; and a correspondence with such traitors was the most flagrant injury that could be committed on any sovereign; that in the treaty which caused upon the expulsion of the English from Normandy, the French ministers had absolutely refused to make any mention of Calais, and had thereby declared their intention of taking advantage of the title which had accrued to the crown of France; and that though a general clause had been inserted, implying a reservation of all claims, this concession could not avail the English, until they expressly put forward their just claim to Calais, and had previously forfeited all right to that fortress.

The queen was nowise surprised at hearing these allegations; and as she knew that the French court intended not to begin the quarrel from first to make restitution, much less after they could justify their refusal on such plausible reasons, she thought it better for the present to acquiesce in the loss, than to pursue a doubtful title by a war both dangerous and expensive, as well as unreasonable.

Elizabeth entered anew into negotiations for expelling the Archduke Charles; and she seems, at this time, to have had no great motive of policy, which might induce her to make that farrous offer: but as she was very rigorous in the terms insisted on, and would not agree that the Archduke, if he espoused her, should enjoy any power or title in England, and even refused him the exercise of his religion, the treaty came to nothing; and that princes, desiring of success in their addresses, married the daughter of Albert, Duke of Bavaria.
tice, and even the established laws; and though young Edward, desirous of promoting a man so celebrated for his eloquence, his zeal, and his morals, enjoined them to dispense with this ceremony, they were still determined to retain it. Hooper then embraced the resolution rather to refuse the bishopric, than to clothe himself in those hated garments; but it was deemed requisite, that for the sake of the example, he should not escape so easily. He was first consulted by the SYNOD. Then, in the council, he was summoned to attend the Synod, if he would consent to be a bishop on the terms proposed: he was plied with conferences, and reprimands, and arguments: heuer and Peter Martyr, and the most celebrated foresters of the commons, conjured and exclaiming that it was a trap, and a compromise, with great difficulty, was at last made, that Hooper should not be obliged to wear commonly the ominous robes, but should agree to be consecrated, and to use them during cathedral service: a coudesinscription not a little extraordinary in a man of so inflexible a spirit as this reformed. The same objection which had arisen with regard to the episcopal habit, had been moved against the roaiment of the inferior clergy; and the surplice, in particular, with the tippet and corner cap, was a great object of abhorrence to many of the popular zealats. In vain it was urged, that particular habits, as well as postures and ceremonies, having been constantly used by the clergy, and employed in religious service, acquire a venation in the eyes of the people, appear sacred in their apprehensions, excite their devotion, and contract a kind of mysterious virtue, which attaches to all the insignia of the sacred office. The surplice, he answered, was established worship: that in order to produce this effect, an uniformity in these particulars is requisite, and even a perseverance as far as possible, in the former practice: and that the nation would be betrayed, if by retaining these offensive observances, the reformers could engage the people to renounce willingly what was absurd or pernicious in the ancient superstition. These arguments, which had infuriated both men, were the very reasons which engaged the violent protestants to reject the habits. They pressed matters to a total opposition with the church of Rome: every compliance, they said, was a symbolizing with Antichrist. And this spirit was carried so far by some reformers, that, in a national remonstrance made afterwards by the church of Scotland against these habits, it was asked, 'What has Christ Jesus to do with Beral? What has halo-kneeling to do with light! If surplices, corner caps, and tippets, have been badges of idolaters in the very act of their idolatry; why should the preacher of christian liberty, and the open rebel of all superstition, partake with the drag of the Romish beast? Yea, who is then free from its ensnarements? and with what sign shall he be afraid?—either a mark on his forehead, or on his forehead, the print and mark of that odious beast! But this application was rejected by the English church. There was only one instance, in which the spirit of contradiction to the Romishans took place universally in England: the altar was removed from the wall, was placed in the middle of the church, and was thenceforth denominated the communion-table. The reason why this innovation met with such general reception was, that the nobility and gentry got thereby a pretence for making spoil of the plate, vestures, and rich ornaments, which belonged to the altar. These disputes, which had been started during the reign of Edward, were carried abroad by the protestants, who fled from the persecutions of Mary; and as the zeal of these men had received an increase from the furious crueltv of their enemies, they were generally inclined to carry their opposition to the utmost extent in the practices of the church of Rome. Their communication with Calvin, and the other reformers, who followed the discipline and worship of Genevese, continued in this obstinate resistance; and though some of the refugees, particularly those who were established at Frankfurt, still adhered to King Edward's liturgy, the prevailing spirit carried these confessors to seek a still further reformation. On the accession of Elizabeth, they returned to their native country; and being regarded with general veneration, on account of their zeal and past sufferings, they ventured to insist on the establishment of their projected model; and it was found, in many instances, that when the word of grace was administered by these reformers, who had already gone too far, in shaking off those forms and observances, which, without distracting men of more refined apprehensions, tend, in a very innocent manner, to allure, and amuse, and engage the vulgar. She took to have a law for uniformity strictly enacted: she was empowered by the parliament to add any new ceremonies which it thought proper; and though she was sparing in the exercise of this prerogative, she continued rigid in exacting an observance of the established laws, and in punishing all nonconformity. The zealats, therefore, who harboured a great antipathy to the episcopal order, and to the whole hierarchy, were obliged to adopt, as it were, an extra-synodal set of ceremonies, which would have been regarded as highly audacious and criminal; and they confined their avowed objections to the surplice, the confirmation of children, the sign of the cross in baptism, the ring in marriage, kindred acts, the touching and anointing of sick; and some other strange cautively observed acts, which were rather inclined to bring the public worship still nearer to the Romish point. They defended these things, as things already gone too far, in shaking off those forms and observances, which, without distracting men of more refined apprehensions, tend, in a very innocent manner, to allure, and amuse, and engage the vulgar. She took to have a law for uniformity strictly enacted. She was empowered by the parliament to add any new ceremonies which she thought proper; and though she was sparing in the exercise of this prerogative, she continued rigid in exacting an observance of the established laws, and in punishing all nonconformity.
never was, to the end of her life, reconciled to their principles and practices.

We have thought proper to insert in this place an account of the rise and genius of the puritans; because Camden marks the present year, as the period when they began to make themselves considerable in England. We now return to our narration.

A. D. 1566. The Duke of Norfolk was the only peer D. of Norwich that enjoyed the highest title of noblefolk's deposition, and as there were at present no princes of the blood, the splendour of his family, the opulence of his fortune, and the extent of his influence, had rendered him without comparison the first subject in England. This great man, ranking in secret estimation: beneficent, affable, generous, he had acquired the affections of the people; prudent, moderate, obstinate, he possessed, without giving her any jealousy, the good graces of his sovereign. His grandfather and father had long been regarded as the leaders of the catholics, and this hereditary attachment, joined to the alliance of blood, had procured him the friendship of the most considerable men of that party; but as he had been educated amongst the reformers, he was sincerely devoted to their principles, and maintained that strict decorum and regularity of life, by which the protestants were at that time distinguished. He enjoyed the esteem of his fellow, and was popular even with the most opposite factions. The height of his prosperity alone was the source of his misfortunes, and engaged him in attempts, from which his virtue and prudence turned; and at a very considerable distance.

Norfolk was at this time a widower; and being of a suitable age, his marriage with the Queen of Scots had appeared so natural, that it had occurred to several of his friends and those of that princess: but the first person who, after secretary Ladington, opened the scheme to the duke, is said to have been the Earl of Murray, before his departure for Scotland. That nobleman set before Norfolk the advantage of combining the dissensions in Scotland under the head of his country, by an alliance with the house of Stuart, and the prospect of reaping the succession of England; and in order to bind Norfolk's interest the faster with Mary, he proposed that the duke's daughter should also espouse the young king of Scotland. The previous obtaining of Elizabeth's consent was regarded both by Murray and Norfolk, as a circumstance essential to the success of their project; and all terms being adjusted between them, Murray took care, by means of Sir Robert Melvil, to have the design communicated to the Queen of Scots. This princess replied, that the vexations which she had met with in her two last marriages, had made her more inclined to a single life; but she was determined to sacrifice her own happiness to the welfare of her dear sister, and therefore, as soon as she should be legally divorced from Bothwell, she would be determined by the opinion of her nobility and people in the choice of another husband.

It is probable that Murray was not sincere in this proposal. He had two motives to engage him to dissimulation. He knew the danger to which he must run in his return through the North of Ireland and Westmoreland, Mary's partisans in that country; and he dreaded an interruption in Scotland from the Duke of Châtelain, and the Earls of Orkney and Caithness, whom she had appointed her lieutenants during her absence. By these feigned appearances of friendship, he both engaged Norfolk to write in his favour to the northern noblemen; and he persuaded the Queen to give her a new assurance of her love, and even advice, to conclude a cessation of hostilities with the regent's party.

The Duke of Norfolk, though he had agreed that Elizabeth's consent should be previously obtained before the completion of his marriage and reason to his friend that he never should prevail with her voluntarily to make that concession. He knew her perpetual and unrelenting jealousy against her sister and rival; he was acquainted with her former reluctance to all proposals of marriage with the Queen of Scots; he foresaw that the princess's espousing a person of his power and character and interest would give the greatest umbrage; and as it would then become necessary to restate her in possession of her throne on some tolerable terms, and even to endeavour the re-establishing of her character, he dreaded lest Elizabeth, whose politics had now taken a different turn, would never agree to such indulgent and generous conditions. He therefore contrived his own terms, and proposed the marriage of several of the most considerable nobility; and he was successful with the Earls of Pembroke, Arundel, Derby, Bedford, Shrewsbury, Southampton, Northumberland, Westmoreland, Scotland, Sir Lord Lumley and Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, and gradually engrafted the interest of the Earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's declared favourite, who had formerly entertained some views of espousing Mary, willingly resigned all his pretensions, and seemed to enter zealously into Norfolk's interests. There were other motives, besides affection to the duke, which produced this general combination of the nobility.

Sir William Cecil, secretary of state, was the most vigilant, active, and prudent minister ever known in England: and as he was governed by no views but the interests of his sovereign, which he had inflexibly pursued, his authority over her became every day more predominant. Ever enlightened by the public good, he was the first to check those sallies of passion, and sometimes of caprice, to which she was subject; and if he failed of persuading her in the first movement, his perseverance, and remonstrances, and his arguments, and his great art in carrying himself, seemed to have made an impression on her, and to have reconciled her to the King of Scots. He gained, however, the more credit he gained with his mistress, the more he was exposed to the eny of her other counsellors; and as he had been supposed to adopt the interests of the house of Suffolk, whose claim seemed to carry with it no danger to the present establishment, his enemies, in opposition to him, were naturally led to attach themselves to the Queen of Scots. Elizabeth saw, without uneasiness, this emulation among her ministers, and sought to moderate it, and thought that she could support Cecil, whenever matters came to extremities, and dissipated every conspiracy against him, particularly one had about this time for having him thrown into the Tower on some pretence or other; she never gave him such unlimited confidence as might enable him entirely to crush his adversaries.

Norfolk, sensible of the difficulties which he must meet with in controlling his council's counsels, especially where they collided with the inclination as well as interest of the queen, durst not open to her his intentions of marrying the Queen of Scots; but proceeded still in the same course, of increasing his interest in the kingdom, and engaging more of the nobility in his views. A letter was written to Mary by Leicester, and signed by several of the first rank, recommending Norfolk for her husband, and stipulating conditions for the advantage of both kingdoms; particularly, that she should give sufficient entry to Elizabeth, and the heirs of her body, for the free enjoyment of the crown of England; that a perpetual league, offensive and defensive, should be made between their realms and subjects; that the protestant religion should be established by law in Scotland; and that she should grant an amnesty to her rebels in that kingdom. When Mary returned a favourable answer to this application, Norfolk employed himself with new ardour in the execution of his project; and besides securing the interests of many of the considerable gentry and nobility who resided at court, he wrote letters to such as lived at their country estates, and persons in the greatest authority of the nonconformist counties. The kings of France and Spain, who interested themselves extremely in Mary's cause, were secretly consulted, and expressed their approbation of these measures. And though Elizabeth's consent was always supposed, in expectation of an alliance, it was apparently Norfolk's intention, when he proceeded such lengths without consulting her, to render her party so strong, that it should no longer be in her power to refuse it.
It was impossible that so extensive a conspiracy could entirely escape the queen's vigilance and that of Cecil. She dropped several intimations to the duke, by which he might learn that she was acquainted with his designs; and she frequently warned him to beware on what pillow he reposed his head: but he never had the prudence or the courage to open to her his full intentions. Certain intelligence of this dangerous combination was given her first by her messenger, Murray, and the more so because in promoting Norfolk's marriage, which is much to be doubted, had at least intended, for his own safety, and that of his party, that Elizabeth should in reality, as well as name, be engaged with the condition, and not should have her consent extorted by any conference of her own subjects. This information gave great alarm to the court of England; and the more so, as those intrigues were attended with other circumstances, of which, it is probable, Elizabeth was not wholly ignorant.

Among the nobility and gentry that seemed to enter into Norfolk's views, there were many, who were zealously attached to the catholic religion, who had no other design than that of restoring Mary to her liberty, and who would gladly, by a combination with foreign powers, or even at the expense of a civil war, have placed her on the throne of England. The Earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, who possessed great power in the North, were leaders of this party; and the former nobleman made offer to the Queen of Scots, by Leonard Dacres, brother to Lord Dacres, that he would flee her from confinement, and conduct her to Northumberland, or to the place to which she should think proper to retire. Sir Thomas and Sir Edward Stanley, sons of the Earl of Derby, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Holstone, and other gentlemen, whose interest lay in the personal liberty of Mary, were on her side, concerned, in the same views; and required that, in order to facilitate the execution of the scheme, a diversion should, in the mean time, be made from the side of Florida, which was discovered, and that all the suppressed, these conspiracies; both because his duty to Elizabeth would not allow him to think of effecting his purpose by revolution, and because he foresaw that, if the Queen of Scots came into the possession of these men, they would rather choose for her husband the King of Spain, or some foreign prince, who had power, and inclination, to re-establish the Catholic religion.

When those noblemen and good principality as the Duke of Norfolk, engage in dangerous enterprises, they are commonly so unfortunate as to be criminal by halves; and while they balance between the execution of their designs and their remorse, their fear of punishment and their consternation, they render themselves prey to their enemies. The duke, in order to repress the surmises spread against him, spoke contemptuously to Elizabeth of the Scottish alliance; affirmed that his estate in England was not valuable, but that he was writing to the king of Spain, to remove evil counsellors, and to restore the Duke of Norfolk and other faithful peers to their liberty and to the queen's favour. The number of the malcontents amounted to four thousand foot and sixteen hundred horse; and they expected the concurrence of all the catholics in England.

The queen was not negligent in her own defence, and she had beforehand, from her prudent and wise conduct, acquired such power over herself as ensured a certain security of a sovereign; insomuch that even the catholics in most counties expressed an affection for her service; and the Duke of Norfolk himself, though he had lost her favour, and was in confinement, was not wanting, as far as his situation permitted, to promote the levies among his friends and retainers. Sussex, attended by the Earls of Rutland, the Lords Hunsdon, Evers, and Willoughby of Parham, marched against the rebels at the head of seven thousand men, and found them already advanced to the bishops of Durham, of which they had taken possession. They retired before him to Hexham; and hearing that the Earl of Warwick and Lord Clinton were advancing against them with a greater body, they found no other resource than to disperse themselves without striking a blow. The common people retired to their houses; the leaders fled into Scotland. Northumberland was found skulking in that country, and consequently, by Mary's command, in the castle of Lochinvar. Westmoreland received shelter from the chieftains of the Kers and Scots, partisans of Mary; and persuaded them to make an irruption into England, with a view of reestablishing the Bishop of Durham. After they had committed great ravages, they retreated to their own country. This sudden and precipitate rebellion was followed soon after by another still more imprentid, Elizabeth now found, that the detention of Mary was attended with all the ill consequences which she had foreseen when she first embraced that measure. This latter princess, recovering, by means of her misfortunes and her own natural good sense, from that delirium into which she seems to have been thrown during her attachment to Bothwell, had behaved with such modesty and judgment, and even dignity, that every one who approached her was charmed by her demeanour; and her friends were enabled, on some plausible grounds, to deny the reality of all those crimes which had been imputed to her.

By compassion for her situation, and the necessity of procuring her liberty, proved an incitement among all her partisans, to be actuated by the same motives as herself. As, at length, no further advantage was expected from captivity, it was thought, could nowise be effected by attempts dangerous to the established government, Elizabeth had reason to expect little tranquillity so long as the Scottish queen remained a prisoner; and, had she resolved to guard, by every prudent expedient, against the mischiefs to which it was exposed. She still flattered Mary with hopes of her protection, maintained an ambiguous conduct, and observed, that in Scotland, negociated perpetually concerning the terms of her restoration, made constant professions of friendship to her; and by these arts endeavoured both to prevent her from making any desperate effect decisive resistance, and to satisfy the French and Spanish ambassadors, who never intermitted their solicitations, sometimes accompanied with menaces, in her behalf. This deceit was received with the same deceit by the Queen of Scots; professions of friendship were, on both sides, equally insincere; and while an appearance of friendship was maintained on both sides, the animosity and jealousy, which had long prevaled between them, became every day more strong, and more decided. The queen's address, capacity, activity, and spirit, were nearly a match for each other; but unhappily, Mary, besides her present forlorn condition, was always inferior in personal conduct and discretion, as well as in power, to her illustrious rival. Elizabeth and Mary wrote at the same time letters to the regent. The Queen of Scots desired that her marriage with Bothwell might be examined, and a divorce be legally pronounced between them. The Queen of England gave Murray the choice of three conditions; that Mary should be restored to her dignity on certain terms; that she should be associated with her son, and the admittance of him afterwards, in the regent's hands till the young prince should come to years of discretion, that she should be allowed to live at liberty as a private person in Scotland, and have an honourable settlement made in her favour.

Murray summoned a convention of states, in order to deliberate on these proposals of the two queens. But no answer was made by them to Mary's letter, on pretence that she had there employed the style of a sovereign, addressing herself to her subjects; but in reality, because they saw that her request was calculated to prepare the way for a marriage with Norfolk, or some powerful prince, who could support her cause, and restore her to the throne. They replied to Elizabeth, that the two former conditions were so derogatory to the royal authority of their prince, that they could not be more deliberate concerning them: the third alone could be the subject of treaty. It was evident that Elizabeth, in proposing conditions so unequal in their importance, invited the Scots to a refusal of those which were most advantageous to Mary; and as it was a refusal they were not at liberty to accept, if not too soon; the terms of the third, so as to render it secure and eligible to all parties, it was concluded that she was not sincere in any of them.

It is pretended that Murray had entered into a private negotiation with the queen, to get Mary delivered into his hands; and as Elizabeth found the detention of her in England so dangerous, it is probable that she would have been pleased, on honourable or safe terms, to rid herself of a prisoner who gave her so much inequality. But all these projects vanished by the sudden death of the regent, who was assassinated, in revenge of a private injury, by a gentleman of the name of Hamilton.

Murray was a person of considerable vigour, abilities, and constancy; but though he was not successful, during his regency, in compelling the dispensations in Scotland, he was so tenacious of more eminently in the beginning than in the end of his life. His manners were rough and austere; and he possessed not that perfect integrity, which frequently accompanies, and can alone atone for, that eminent capacity by which he had been distinguished.

By the death of the regent, Scotland relapsed into anarchy. Mary's party assembled together, and made themselves masters of Edinburgh. The castle, commanded by Sir Alexander Murray and Lord Darnley, was inviolable by the French cause; and as many of the principal nobility had embraced that party, it became probable, though the people were in general averse to her, that her authority might again acquire the ascendancy. To check its progress, Elizabeth despatched Sussex with an army to the North, under colour of chastising the ravages committed by the borders. He entered Scotland, and laid waste the lands of the Kerrs and Scots, seized the castle of Hume, and committed hostilities on all Mary's partisans, who, he said, had offended his mistress by harbouring the English rebels.

Sir William Drury was afterwards sent with a body of troops, and he threw down the houses of the Hamiltons who were either engaged in the French cause, or suspected of being so; the English armies were afterwards recalled by agreement with the Queen of Scots, who promised, in return, that no French troops should be introduced into Scotland, and that the English rebels should be delivered up to the queen by her partisans.

But though the queen, covering herself with the pretence of revenging her own quarrel, so far contributed to support the party of the young king of Scots, she was still cautious not to declare openly against Mary; and she even sent a request, which was equivalent to a command, to the enemies of that princess, not to elect, during some time, a regent in the place of Murray. Lenox, the king's grandfather, was therefore chosen temporary governor, under the title of Lieutenant. Hearing afterwards, that Mary's partisans, instead of delivering up Westmoreland and the other fugitives as they had promised, had allowed them to escape into Flanders; she permitted the king's party to give Lenox the title of regent, and she sent Randolph, as her resident, to maintain a correspondence with him. But notwithstanding this step, taken in favour of Mary's enemies, she never had made her ambassador so cordial, nor quitted the appearance of amity to that princess. Being imported by the Bishop of Ross, and her other agents, as well as by foreign ambassadors, she twice procured a suspension of arms between the Scottish factions, appears, that an agreement had been made between Elizabeth and the regent for the day of Appeal up to be held by the king and queen dowager Killiour to the Earl of Marche when regent; offering to put Mary into his hands. This was the first intimation given the queen of the regent, that that queen should be tried for her crimes, and that the sentence should be executed upon her. He applied to Mary, and she rejected the offer because we hear not more of it.

by and by that means stopped the hands of the regent, who was likely to obtain advantages over the opposite party.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130. b Sir James Melville, p. 101, 100.} By these seeming contrarities she kept alive the factions in Scotland, increased their mutual animosity, and rendered the whole country a scene of devastation and of misery.\ footnoteref{Freeland, p. 130.} She had no intention to conquer the kingdom, and consequently no interest or design to instigate the parties against each other; but this consequence was an accidental effect of her cautious politics, by which she was engaged, as far as possible, to secure the peace, the title, and the person of the Queen of Scots, and never to violate the appearances of friendship with her, at least those of neutrality.

The better to amuse Mary with the prospect of an accomplished treaty, Sir Walter and Sir John had previously been sent to her with proposals from Elizabeth. The terms were somewhat rigorous, such as a captive queen might expect from a jealous rival; and they thereby bore the greater appearance of sincerity on the part of the English court. It was required that the Queen of Scots, besides renouncing all title to the crown of England during the life-time of Elizabeth, should make a perpetual lease, offensive and defensive, between the kingdoms; that she should marry no Englishman without Elizabeth's consent, nor any person without the consent of the states of Scotland; that compensation should be made for the late ravages committed in England; that justice should be executed on the murderers of Darnley and Murray; that the young prince should be sent into England to be educated there; and that six hostages, all of them noblemen, should be delivered to the Queen of England, with the castle of Hume, and some other securities for the future conduct of Such were the conditions upon which Elizabeth promised to contribute her endeavours towards the restoration of the deposed queen. The necessity of Mary's affairs obliged her to consent to them; and the kings of France and Spain, as well as the Pope, when consulted by her, approved of her conduct; chiefly on account of the civil wars by which all Europe was at that time agitated, and which incapacitated the catholic princes from giving her any assistance.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.}

Elizabeth's commissioners proposed also to Mary a plan of accommodation with her subjects in Scotland; and after some reasoning on that head, it was agreed that the queen should require Lenox, the regent, to send commissioners, in order to treat of conditions under her mediation. The partisans of Mary boasted, that all terms were fully settled with the court of England, and that the Scottish rebels would soon be constrained to submit to the authority of her sovereign; but Elizabeth took care that these rumours should meet with no credit, and that the king's party should not be discouraged, nor see too low in their demands. Cecil wrote to inform the regent, that all propositions for making peace, if from him, fixed and irreconcilable, were to be discussed anew in the conference; and desired him to send commissioners who should be constant in the king's cause, and cautious not to make concessions which might be prejudicial to their party.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.} Sussex also, in his letters, dropped hints to the same purpose; and Elizabeth herself said to the Abbot of Dunfermling, whom Lenox had sent to the court of England, that she would not insist on Mary's restoration, provided the Scots could make the justice of their cause appear to her satisfaction; and that, even if their reasons should fall short of full conviction, she would take effectual care to provide for their future security.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.}

A perseverance of the French and appointed the 1st March. Earl of Montrose and Sir James Macgill, together with the Abbot of Dunfermling, to manage the treaty. These commissioners presented memorials, containing the defects of the proposition; and other objections were seconded their arguments with examples drawn from the Scottish history, with the authority of laws, and with the sentiments of many famous divines. The lofty ideas which Elizabeth had entertained, of the absolute, indefeasible right of sovereigns, made her be shocked with these republican topics; and she told the Scottish commissioners, that she was nowise satisfied with their reasons for justifying the conduct of their countrymen; and that they must be prepared, without the least scruple, to open the conditions which they required for their security.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.} They replied, that their commission did not empower them to treat of any terms which might infringe the title, person, or authority of the crown king, but that they would gladly hear whatever proposals should be made them by her majesty. The conditions recommended by the queen were not disadvantageous to Mary; but as the commissioners had still insisted, that they were not authorized to treat in any manner concerning the restoration of that prince, the conferences were necessarily at an end; and Elizabeth dismissed the Scottish commissioners with injunctions that they should return, after having procured more ample powers from their parliament.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.}

The Bishop of Ross openly complained to the English council, that they had abused his mistress by false promises and professions; and Mary herself was no longer at a loss to judge of Elizabeth's insincerity. By reason of these disappointments matters came still nearer to extremities between the two princesses; and the Queen of Scots, finding all her hopes eluded, was more strongly incited to make, at all hazards, in the turbulence of the town, a final attempt.

An incident also happened about this time, which tended to widen the breach between Mary and Elizabeth, and to increase the vigilance and jealousy of the latter princess. Pope Pius issued his bull, in which he excommunicated and deposed some of the English heretics, to this effect, that he was deposed from the sanctuary, and absolved her subjects from their oaths of allegiance.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.} It seems probable, that this attack on the queen's authority was made in concert with Mary, who intended by that means to forward the northern rebellion; a measure which was at that time in agitation.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.} John Felton affixed this bull to the gates of the Bishop of London's palace; and scouring either to fly or deny the fact, he was seized and confined, and received the crown of martyrdom, for which he seems to have entertained so violent an ambition.\footnote{Spenlow, p. 410. a Freeland, p. 130.}

A new parliament, after five years' interval, on 4th April, was assembled at Westminster; and as the parliament, queen, by the rage of the Pope against her, was become still more the rival of the reigning party, it might be expected, both from this incident, and from her own prudent and vigorous conduct, that her authority over the two houses would be absolutely uncontrollable. It was so in fact; yet the queen, with some small opposition, and that too arising chiefly from the height of zeal for protestantism; a disposition of the English which in general contributed extremely to increase the queen's popularity. We shall be somewhat particular in relating the transactions of this session, because they show, as well the extent of the royal power during that age, as the character of Elizabeth, and the genius of her governmeit. It will be curious also to observe the faint dawn of the spirit of liberty among the English, the jealousy with which that spirit was repressed by the sovereign, the impious conduct which was maintained in opposition to it, and the ease with which it was subdued by this arbitrary monarch.
government, alliances, peace and war, or foreign negotiations, no parliament in that age ever presumed to take them under consideration, or question, in these particulars, the conduct of their sovereign, or of his ministers.

In the former parliament, the puritans had introduced seven bills for a further reformation in religion; but they had not been able to prevail in any one of them. The House of Commons had sat a very few days, when Sir John Downage moved the bill for the amendment of the liturgy. The chief objection, which he mentioned, was the sign of the cross in baptism. Another member added the kneeling at the sacrament; and another, that it was requisite in that act of devotion, it were better that the communions should throw themselves prostrate on the ground, in order to keep at the widest distance from former superstition.

Religion was a point, of which Elizabeth was, if possible, still more jealous than of matters of state. She pretended, that, in quality of supreme head or governor of the church, she was fully empowered, by her prerogative alone, to decide all questions which might arise with regard to doctrine, discipline, or worship; and she never would allow her parliaments so much as to take these points into consideration. The couriers did not forget to impress on the minds of the subject that discretion; although, though he allowed that any heresy might be repressed by parliament, (a concession which seems to have been rash and unguarded, since the act, inventing the crown with the supposition that it might be unassailable, gave the sovereign full power to reform all heresies,) yet he affirmed, that it belonged to the queen alone, as head of the church, to regulate every question of ceremony in worship. The comptroller seconded this argument; insisted on the exalted dignity of the bishop was concerned to provide for; and his brethren, if from former examples, have taken warning not to meddle with such matters. One Pastor opposed these remonstrances of the couriers. He was scandalized, he said, by the carriage of such persons (numerosity, kneeling, and making the sign of the cross,) should be passed over so slightly. These questions, he added, concern the salvation of souls, and interest every one more deeply than the monarchy of the whole world. This cause he showed to be the cause of God; the rest were all but terrere, yea, trifles in comparison, call them ever so great: subjects, crowns, kingdoms, he knew not what weight they had, when the whole subjects of such unspeakable importance. Though the zeal of his master seems to have been approved of, the House, overawed by the prerogative, voted upon the question, that a petition should be presented to her majesty, for her licence to proceed in such acts of legislation; and if she did not give her consent, they should stop all debate or reasoning concerning it.

Matters would probably have rested here, had not the queen been so highly offended with Strickland's presumption, in moving the bill for reformation of the liturgy. This cause he seemed to have himself before the council, and prohibited him thenceforth from appearing in the House of Commons. This act of power was too violent even for the submissive parliament to endure. Carleton took notice of the matter; complained that the liberties of the House were invaded; observed that Strickland was not a private man, but represented a multitude, and moved that he might be sent for, and, if he were guilty of any offence, might answer for it at the bar of the House, which he was summoned to be the only competent tribunal. Yelverton enforced the principles of liberty with still greater boldness. He said, that the precedent was dangerous; and though in this happy time of tenty, among so many good and honourable persons as were at present invested with authority, nothing of extremiti or injury was to be apprehended; yet the times might alter; what now is permitted might hereafter be condemned; that the duty might lower of the benediction, on the ground of the present permission. He added, that all matters not treasonable, or which implied not too much derogation of the imperial crown, might, without offence, be introduced into parliament; where every question that concerned the community must be considered, and where even the right of the crown itself must finally be determined. He remarked, that men sat not in that House in their private capacities, but as elected by their country; and though it was proper that the prince should retain his prerogative, yet was that prerogative limited by law: as the sovereign could not of himself make laws, neither could he break them, merely from his own authority.

These propositions were so strong, and so generous; but the open assertion of them was, at this time, somewhat new in England; and the couriers were more warranted by present practice, when they advanced a common abstract doctrine. The treasurer warned the House to be cautious in their proceedings; neither to venture further than their assured warrant might extend, nor hazard their good opinion with her majesty in any doubtful cause.

The member, he said, whose attendance they required, was not restrained on account of any liberty of speech, but for his exhibiting a bill in the House against the prerogative of the queen; a temerity which was not to be tolerated. And he concluded with observing, that even speeches made in that House had been questioned and examined by the sovereign. Cleere, another member, remarked, that the sovereign's prerogative is not so much as disputable, and that the safety of the queen is the safety of the kingdom; and that every man was for his instruction to repair to his ordinary; and he seems to insinuate, that the bishops themselves, for their instruction, must repair to the queen. Fleetwood, another member, added, that he, who, in the fifth of the present session, had been called to account for a speech in the House. But lest this example should be deemed too recent, he would inform them, from the parliament rolls, that in the reign of Henry V. a member was ordered to appear before the House, on account of his freedom of speech; and the parliament presumed not to go further than to humble suitors for him. In the subsequent reign, the Speaker himself was ordered to appear, that affairs might be compassed, without consulting his master; and the House found no other remedy than a like submissive application. He advised the House to have recourse to the same expedient; and not to presume either to send for their member, or demand him, as of right. During this speech, those members of the privy-council who sat in the House, whispered together; upon which the Speaker moved, that the House should make stay of all further proceedings; a motion which was immediately complied with. The queen, finding that the affair was committed, was alarmed; in her mind she was most likely to excite a great ferment, saved her honour by this silence of the House; and lest the question should be resumed, she sent next day to Strickland her permission to give her attention to the time, that they might, if they should stop all debate or reasoning concerning it.

Notwithstanding this rebuke from the throne, the zeal of the Commons still engaged them to continue the discussion of those other bills which regarded religion; but they were interrupted by a still more arbitrary proceeding of the queen, in which the Lords condescended to be her instruments. This House sent a message to the Commons, desiring that a committee might attend them. Some members were appointed for that purpose; and the upper House acquainted them, that the queen's majesty, being informed of the articles of Reformation which they had canvassed, approved of them, intended to publish them, and make the bishops execute them, by virtue of her royal authority; and that the Lords would not permit them to be treated of in parliament. The House, though they did not entirely stop proceedings on account of this injunction, seem to have been now imposed with such harassing command; and in the issue all the bills came to nothing.

A motion made by Robert Bell, a puritan, against an exclusive patent granted to a company of merchants in this kingdom, for conveying goods to the East, was seconded in questions called by the Speaker. The queen, some days after the motion was made, sent orders by the mouth of the Speaker, commanding the House to spend little time in motions, and to avoid long speeches. All the members understood that she had been offended, because a matter had been moved which seemed to touch her prerogative. Fleetwood accordingly spoke of this delicate subject. He observed, that the queen had a prerogative of granting patents; that to pique the validity of any patent, was to invade the royal prerogative; that all foreign trade was entirely subject to the pleasure of the sovereign; that even the statute which gave liberty of commerce, admitted of all prohibitions; and that this principle, when he granted an exclusive patent, only employed the power vested in him, and prohibited all others from dealing in any particular branch of commerce. He quoted the clerk of the parliament's book, to prove that no man might speak in the parliament of the statute of wills, unless the king first gave license; because the royal prerogative in the wards was thereby touched. He showed likewise the statutes of Edward I, Edward III, and Henry IV, with a saving of the prerogative. And in Edward VI's time, the protector was applied to, for his allowance to mention matters of prerogative.

Sir Humphrey Gilbert, the gallant and renowned sea-adventurer, carried these topics still further. He endeavoured to prove the motion made by Bell to be a vain device, and perilous to be treated of; since it tended to the derogation of the prerogative imperial, which whoever should undertake, as much as in fact he did not, he said, could be otherwise accounted than an open enemy. For what difference is there between saying that the queen is not to use the privilege of the crown, and saying that she is not qualified for that purpose has been the queen's money in her majesty, as might, perhaps, make subjects forget their duty; it is not good to sport or venture too much with princes. He reminded them of the fable of the hare, who, upon the proclamation that all horned beasts should be destroyed, instantly set off, lest her ears should be construed to be horns; and by this apologue be seems to insinuate, that even those who heard or permitted such dangerous speeches, would not themselves be entirely free from the suspicion of being the queen's money. He denied that he meddled further with these matters, the queen might look to her own power; and finding herself able to suppress their challenged liberty, and to exert an arbitrary authority, might imitate the example of Lewis XI. of France, who, as he termed it, delivered the crown from wardship.

Though this speech gave some disgust, nobody, at the time, replied any thing, but that Sir Humphrey mistook the meaning of the House, and of the member who made the motion: they never had any other purpose, than to represent their grievances, in due and seemly form, unto her majesty. But in a subsequent debate, Peter Wentworth, avowed free speech, but was struck with an insult on the House; noted Sir Humphrey's disposition to flatter and fawn on the prince; compared him to the chameleon, which can change itself into all colours except white; and recommended to the House a due care of liberty of speech, and of the privileges of parliament.

It appears, on the whole, that the motion against the exclusive patent had no effect. Bell, the member who first introduced it, was sent for by the council, and was severely reprimanded for his temerity. He returned to the House with such an amazed countenance, that all the members, well informed of the reason, were struck with terror; and during some time no one dared rise, to speak of any matter of importance, for fear of giving offence to the queen and the council. Even after the fears of the Commons were somewhat allayed, the members spoke with extreme precaution; and by employing most of their discourse in preambles and apologies, they showed their conscious terror of the rod which hung over them. Wherever any delicate point was touched, though ever so gently; nay, seemed to be approached, though at ever so great a distance, ran alarm among the hearers. The queen would be offended; the council will be extremely displeased: and by these surmises men were warned of the danger to which they exposed themselves. It is remarkable, that the queen, which the queenmen so impiously provoked, was content with the profit of fines.

Thus every thing which passed the two 20th May. Houses was extremely respectful and submissive; yet did the queen think it incumbent on her, at the conclusion of the session, to check, and that with great severity, those feeble efforts of liberty, which had appeared in the motions and speeches of some members. The lord chancellor, after delivering a strong and bitter reproof to those who had ventured to ask this question, that although the majority of the lower House had shown themselves, in their proceedings, discreet and dutiful, yet a few of them had discovered a contrary character, and had most unjustly endeavored to raise up an enmity, arrogant, and presumptuous: contrary to their duty, both as subjects and parliament-men, nay, contrary to the express injunctions given them from the throne at the beginning of the session, injunctions which it might well become them to have better attended to, they had presumed to call the question her majesty's grants and prerogatives. But her majesty warns them, that since they thus wilfully forget themselves, they are otherwise to be admonished: some other species of correction must be found for them; since neither the commands of her majesty, nor the example of their wiser brethren, can reclaim their audacious, arrogant, and presumptuous folly, by which they are thus led to encroach on the prerogative of the crown, and what lies beyond the compass of their understanding.

In all these transactions appears clearly the opinion which Elizabeth had entertained of the duty and authority of parliament; and the prerogative of the crown. The prince was to be the mark of all respect and obedience; the meanest subject of the crown ought to be as careful of his duty to the crown, as the crown to the subject; and the state; still less were they to meddle with the church. Questions of either kind were far above their reach, and were appropriated to the prince alone, or to those councils and ministers with whom he was pleased to intrust them. What was the manner of the House, that it should give directions for the due tanning of leather, or milling of cloth; for the preservation of pheasants and partridges, for the repARATION of bridges and highways; for the punishment of mutiny or contempt of the laws. Concerning the police of the country came properly under their inspection; and the laws of this kind which they prescribed, had, if not a greater, yet a more durable, authority, than those which were promulgated directly from the proclamations of the sovereign. Precedents or reports could fix a rule for decisions in private property, or the punishment of crimes; but no alteration or innovation in the municipal laws, or in the manners of the crown, but such as the crown might derive from the crown, the crown, or the crown; nor would the courts of justice be induced to change their established practice by an order of council. But the most acceptable part of parliamentary proceedings was the granting of subsidies; the attaining and maintaining of credit, and public ruin, without its being of state after his fall; the countenance of such great efforts of power, as might be deemed somewhat exceptional, when they proceeded entirely from the sovereign. The redress of grievances was sometimes promised to the people, but seldom could have place, while it was an established rule, that the prerogatives of the crown must not be abridged, nor so much as questioned and examined in parliament. Even though monopolies, and exclusive companies, had already reached an enormous height, and were every day increasing, to the destruction of all liberty, and extinction of all industry; it was criminal in a member to propose, in the most dutiful and regular manner, a parliamentary application against any of them.

These maxims of government were not kept secret by Elizabeth, nor smoothed over by any fair appearances or plausible pretenses. They were openly avowed in her speeches and messages to parliament; and were accompanied with all the haughtiness, nay, sometimes bitterness, of expression, which the meanest servant could look for from with whose conduct, either in word or con-duct, Elizabeth continued to be the most popular sovereign that ever swayed the sceptre of England; because of the maxims of her reign were conformable to the principles of the times, and to the opinion generally entertained with regard to the conduct of the reign. The maxims of government were the most gentle, because they were the most temperate. The ments of popular assemblies on Elizabeth's successors have so changed our ideas in these matters, that the passages above mentioned appear to us extremely curious, and even, at first, surprising; but there were so little remarked during the time, that neither Camden, though a contemporary writer, nor any other historian, has taken any notice of them. So absolute, indeed, was the authority of the crown, that the precious spark of liberty had been kindled and put out, as well as the fire of patriotism, and it was to this sect, whose principles appear so frivolous, and habits so ridiculous, that the English owe the whole freedom of their constitution. Actuated by that zeal which so frequently occurs in those whose enthusiasm inspires, they hazarded the utmost indignation of their sovereign; and employing all their industry to be elected into parliament, a matter not difficult, while a seat was rather regarded as a burden than an advantage, it they first acquired a majority in that assembly, and then obtained an ascendant over the church and monarchy. The following were the principal laws enacted this session. It was declared treason, during the lifetime of the queen to affirm, that she was not the lawful sovereign, or that any other possessed a preferable title, or that she was a heretic, schismatic, or infidel, or that the laws and statutes cannot limit and determine the right of the crown, nor the extent of the crown's power in writing or printing, that any person, except the natural issue of her body, is or ought to be the queen's heir or successor, subjected the person and all his abettors, for the first offence, to imprisonment for a term of years, and for the forfeiture of half their goods; the second offence subjected them to the penalty of a præmunire. This law was plainly levelled against the Queen of Scots and her parasitical and immodest avowal, that Elizabeth never intended to declare her successor. It may be noted, that the usual phrase of lawful issue, which the parliament thought intolerable to the queen, as if she could be supposed to have any other, was changed into that of natural issue, although the crown was to be preserved during the time; and some suspected a deeper design, as if Leicester intended, in case of the queen's demise, to produce some bastard of his own, and affirm that he was first in rank. It was also enacted, that whosoever, by bulls, should publish absolutions, or other rescripts of the Pope, or should, by means of them, reconcile any man to the church of Rome, such offenders, as well as those who were so reconciled, should be guilty of treason. The penalty of a præmunire was imposed on every one who imported any Agnus Dei, crucifix, or such other implement of superstition as the hands of the queen-mother, by the forementioned act, were supposed to have power to destroy. The former laws against usury were enforced by a new statute. A supply of one subsidy and two twentieths, was granted by parliament. The queen, as she was determined to yield them none of her power, was very cautious in asking them for any supply. She endeavoured, either by a rigid frugality to make her ordinary revenues suffice for the necessities of the crown, or she employed her prerogative, and procured money by the granting of patents, monopolies, or by some such ruinous expedient.

Though Elizabeth possessed such uncontrolled authority over her parliaments, and such extensive influence over her people; though during a course of thirteen years she had maintained the public tranquillity, which was only interrupted by the hasty and ill-considered insurrection in the North; she was still kept to great anxiety, and felt her throne perpetually totter under her. The violent commotions excited in France and the Low Countries as well as in Scotland, seemed, in one view, to secure her against any disturbance; but they served, on more reflection, to instruct her in the danger of her situation, when she remarked that England, no less than these nations, was deified by the severe and intolerable measures of the James, and possessed the same enormity, and the same interminable discord; the differences of religious opinion, and the furious intolerance and animosity of the opposite sectaries.

Civil wars of France. The league formed at Bavarone, in 1566, for the extermination of the protestants, had not been concluded so secretly, but intelligence of it had reached Condé, Coligny, and the other leaders of the hugonots; and finding that the measures of the court agreed with their sentiments, they were excited by the crusel perfidy of their enemies, and to strike a blow before the catholics were aware of the danger. The hugonots, though dispersed over the whole kingdom, formed a kind of separate empire; and being closely related by blood, as well as religious sentiments, to which they were perpetually exposed, they obeyed, with entire submission, the orders of their leaders, and were ready, on every signal, to fly to arms. The king and queen-mother were living in great security, at Monceaux in Brie, when they found themselves surrounded by protestant troops, which had secretly marched thither from all quarters; and had not a body of Swiss come speedily to their relief, and conducted them with great intrepidity to Paris, they must have fallen, without resistance, into the hands of the malcontents. A battle was afterwards fought in the plains of St. Denis; where, though the old constable Montmorency, the general of the catholics, was killed, combating bravely at the head of his troops, the hugonots were finally defeated. Condé, collecting his broken forces, and receiving a strong reinforcement from the German protestants, appeared again in the field; and raising about seven thousand, a place of great importance, obliged the court to agree to a new accommodation. So great was the mutual animosity of those religious, that even had Medici been on one side in favor of either, he would have been difficult to retain the people in tranquillity; much more, where such extreme jealousy prevailed, and where the court employed every pacification as a snare for their enemies. A plan was laid for seizing the person of the prince and admiral; who narrowly escaped to Rochelle, and summoned their partisans to their assistance. The civil wars were renewed with greater vehemence than ever, and the parties became still more exasperated against each other. The young Duke of Anjou, brother to the king, commanded the forces of the catholics; and fought, in 1569, a great battle at Jarres with the hugonots, where the Prince of Condé was killed and his army defeated. This discomfiture, with the loss of so great a leader, reduced not the hugonots to despair. The admiral still supported the cause; and having posted at the head of his troops the Prince of Navarre, then sixteen years of age, and the young Prince of Condé, he encouraged the party to persist bravely in the field than ignominiously by the breach of the league. All the hugonots, though they had dispersed their forces, so determined to endure every extremity, that he was enabled to make head against the Duke of Anjou; and being strengthened by a new reinforcement of Germans, he obliged that prince to retreat, and to divide his forces.

Coligny then laid siege to Poitiers; and as the eyes of all France were fixed on this enterprise, the Duke of Guise, enmous of the renown which his father had acquired by the defence of Metz, threw himself into the place, and so animated the garrison by his valour and conduct, that the admiral was obliged to raise the siege. Such was the commencement of that unrivalled fame and honour afterwards attained by this Duke of Guise. The attachment which all the catholics had borne to his father was immediately transferred to the son; and men pleaded themselves in comparing all the great and shining qualities of the eldest of the Guises, to adorn the character of the younger. Equal in ability, in munificence in address, in eloquence, and in every quality which engages the affections of men; equal also in valour, in conduct, in enterprise, in capacity; there seemed only this difference between them, that the son, educated in more turbulent times, and finding a greater dissolution of all law and order, exceeded the father in ambition and temerity, and was engaged in enterprises still more destructive to the authority of his sovereign, and to the repose of his native country.
Elizabeth, who kept her attention fixed on the civil commotions of France, was nowise pleased with this new rise of her enemies the Guises; and being anxious for the fate of the protestants, whose interests were connected with her own, she was engaged, notwithstanding her aversion from all rebellion, and from all opposition to the will of the sovereign, to give them secretly some assistance.10 In these enterprises, she lent money to the Queen of Navarre, and received some jewels as pledges for the loan. And she permitted Henry Champenon to levy, and transport over state funds, the regiment of a hundred gentlemen volunteers, among whom Walter Raleigh, then a young man, began to distinguish himself in that great school of military valour.11 The admiral, constrained by the impiety of his troops, and by the difficulty of subsisting them, fought with the Duke of Anjou the battle of Moncontour in Poucct, where he was wounded and defeated. The court of France, notwithstanding their frequent experience of the obstinacy of the hugonots, and the vigour of Coligny, vainly flattered themselves that the force of the rebels was at last entirely annihilated; and they neglected further preparations against a foe, who, they thought, could never more become dangerous. They were surprised to hear that his leader had appeared without display in an unexpected quarter of the kingdom; had encouraged the young princes, whom he governed, to like constancy; had assembled an army; had taken the field; and was even now besieging a strong place near Paris.

The habeas practice of the crown, diminished by the continuous disorders of the kingdom, and wasted by so many fruitless military enterprises, could no longer bear the charge of a new armament; and the king, notwithstanding his extreme necessity against the hugonots, was, in 1570, to conclude the accommodation with them, to grant them a pardon for all past offences, and to renew the edicts for liberty of conscience.

Though a pacification was seemingly concluded, the minds of the kings were not reconciled to their rebellious subjects; and this accommodation, like all the foregoing, was nothing but a snare by which the perfidious court had projected to destroy at once, without danger, all its formidable enemies. Of the two young princes, the admiral, and the other leaders of the hugonots, instructed by past experience, discovered an extreme distrust of the king's intentions, and kept themselves in security at a distance, all possible artifices were employed to remove their apprehensions, and to convince them of the sincerity of the new counsels which seemed to be embraced. The terms of the peace were religiously observed to them; the toleration was strictly maintained; all attempts made by the zealous catholics to destroy it, were punished with severe penalties, and favours, and honours were bestowed on the principal nobility among the protestants; and the king and council everywhere declared, that, tired of civil disorders, and convinced of the impossibility of forcing men's consciences, they were thenceforth determined to allow every one the free exercise of his religion.

Among the other artifices employed to full the protestants into a fatal security, Charles affected to enter into close connexion with Elizabeth; and as it seemed not the interest of France to forward the union of the two kingdoms of Great Britain, that princess the more easily flattered herself that the French monarch would prefer her friendship to that of the Queen of Scots. The better to deceive her, proposals of marriage were made her with the Duke of Anjou; a prince whose youth, beauty, and reputation for valour might naturally be supposed to recommend him to a woman, who had appeared not altogether insensible to these endowments. The queen immediately founded on this offer the project of deceiving the court of France; and being intent on that article, she laid before the other operations designed for her. Negotiations were entered into with regard to the marriage; terms of the contract were proposed, difficulties started and removed; and the two courts, equally insinuative, though not equals, agreed in regription to approach each other in their demands and concessions. -- HISTORY OF ENGLAND --

1 Obstacle seemed to lie in adjusting the difference of religion; because Elizabeth, who recommended toleration to Charles, was determined not to grant it in her own dominions, not even to her husband; and the Duke of Anjou seemed unwilling to submit, for the sake of interest, to the dishonour of an apostasy.9 The artificial politics of Elizabeth never triumphed so much in her relations with the Gentile princes, she lent money to the Queen of Navarre, and received some jewels as pledges for the loan. And she permitted Henry Champenon to levy, and transport over state funds, the regiment of a hundred gentlemen volunteers, among whom Walter Raleigh, then a young man, began to distinguish himself in that great school of military valour. self. The Flemings found, that the name alone of regent remained with the duchess; that Cardinal Granville entirely possessed the king's confidence; that attempts were every day made on their liberties; that a resolution was taken never more to assemble the states; that new bishoprics were arbitrarily erected, in order to enforce the execution of the persecuting edicts; and that, on the whole, they must expect to be reduced to the condition of a province under Spanish rule. The discontent of the nobility gave countenance to the complaints of the gentry, which encouraged the mutiny of the populace; and all orders of men showed a strong disposition to revolt. Assemblies were called by a like violence; petitions presented, names of distinction assumed, badges of party displayed; and the current of the people, impelled by religious zeal and irritated by feeble resistance, rose to such a height, that in several towns, particularly in Antwerp, they made an open invasion on the established worship, pillaged the churches and monasteries, broke the images, and committed the most unwarrantable disorders.

The worst part of the nobility, particularly the Prince of Orange, and the Counts Egmont and Horn, were alarmed at these excesses, to which their own discontents had at first given countenance; and seconding the wisdom of the government, they suppressed the dangerous insurrections, prevented the risings, and restored the people to a state of order and submission. But Philip was not content with the re-establishment of his ancient authority; he considered, that provincials so remote from the seat of government could not be governed by the same laws as the subjects, and that a prince, who must entertain rather than command, would necessarily, when resided not among the people, feel every day a diminution of his power and influence. He determined, therefore, to lay hold of the popular disorders, as a pretence for excluding the privileges of the Low Country provinces; and for ruling them thenceforth with military and arbitrary authority.

In the execution of this violent design, he employed a mass of troops, which he conducted in the hands of such a tyrant. Ferdinand of Toledo, Duke of Alva, had been educated amidst arms; and having attained a consummate knowledge in the military art, his habits led him to transfer the regulations of the army to all the methods of a camp, and to conceive no measures between prince and subject, but those of rigid command and implicit obedience. This general, in 1568, conducted from Italy to the Low Countries a powerful body of veteran Spaniards; and his ardent animosity to the Flemings, with his known character, struck that whole people with terror and consternation. It belongs not to our subject to relate at length those measures, which Alva's natural barbarity, steeled by reflection, and supported by the power of the monarch, on those flourishing provinces. It sufficed to say, that all their privileges, the gift of so many princes, and the inheritance of so many ages, were openly and expressly abolished by edict; arbitrary and sanguinary tribunals erected; the Counts Egmont and Horn, in spite of their great merits and past services, brought to the scaffold; multitudes of all ranks thrown into confinement, and then delivered over to the executioner; and notwithstanding the peremptory submissun of all men, nothing was heard of but confiscation, imprisonment, exile, torture, and death.

Elizabeth was equally displeased to see the progress of these disorders, and the determination of the protestants, and to observe the erection of so great a military power, in a state situated in so near a neighbourhood. She gave protection to all the Flemish exiles who took shelter in her dominions, and promised them shelter for a long sustant without excusing some connexion, she ventured to commit an insult upon him, which she would have been cautious not to hazard against a more established authority. She was determined to send a fleet of armed vessels, composed of English and Flemish ships, under contract with Philip, to transport into Flanders the sum of four hundred thousand crowns; and the vessels, on which this money was embarked, had been attacked in the Channel by some privateers equipped by the French huguenots, and had taken shelter in Plymouth and Southampton. The commanders of the ships pretended that the money belonged to the King of Spain; but the queen, finding upon inquiry that it was the property of Genoese merchants, took possession of it as a loan; and by that means defrauded the king of his greatest benefit. Alva, in revenge, seized all the English merchants in the Low Countries, threw them into prison, and confiscated their effects. The queen retaliated the blow by a like violence; she seized the Spaniards and their effects; and gave all the English liberty to make reprisals on the subjects of Philip.

These differences were afterwards accommodated by treaty, and mutual reparations were made to the ministers: but nothing could repair the loss which so well timed a blow inflicted on the Spanish government in the Low Countries. Alva, in want of money, and dreading the immediate mutiny of his troops, to whom great arrears were due, imposed by his arbitrary will the most ruinous taxes on the people. He not only required the hundredth penny, and the twentieth of all the immovable goods: he also demanded the tenth of all movable goods on the people, the half of all the金银, and the half of all the gold, and a fine of five hundred per cent on all the revenues of the kingdom. This was a renunciation of the common intercourse of life. The people refused compliance: the duke had recourse to his usual expedient of the gibbon; and the материалов of this scheme of extortions between the Flemings and the Spaniards.

All the enemies of Elizabeth, in order to revenge themselves for her insults, had naturally recourse to one policy, the supporting of the cause and pretensions of the Queen of Scots; and the King of Spain, who was a сын of Elizabeth, had opened a secret intercourse with that prince. There was one Rodolph, a Florentine merchant, who had resided about fifteen years in London, and who, while he lived, was a sufferer by the successive measures which had been taken by the Spaniards to destroy all arts and commerce, but even have restrained the common intercourse of life. The Queen of Scots, indignation for her father's death, and her own, and her attachment to her religion, led her to be a propagator of the reformation in Scotland, and to be a principal promoter of the war against her cousin. actions, he was pressed to give his consent to enterprises still more criminal. Rodolph's plan was, that the Duke of Alva should, on some other pretence, assemble a great quantity of men at the Lords' House, and should transport a body of six thousand foot, and four thousand horse, into England; should land them at Harwich, where the Duke of Norfolk was to join them with all his friends; should thence march directly to London, and subsist the question of the rebellion in the interim, or the time the prisoner should trust, to impose upon her? Norfolk expressed his assent to this plan; and three letters, in consequence of it, were written in his name by Rodolph, one to Alva, another to the Pope, and a third to the King of Spain; but the duke was apprehensive of the danger, refused to sign them. He only sent to the Spanish ambassador a servant and confidential, named Barker, as well to notify his concurrence in the plan, as to vouch for the authenticity of these letters; and Rodolph, having obtained a letter of credence from the ambassador, proceeded on his journey to Brussels and to Rome. The Duke of Alva and the Pope embraced the scheme with alacrity. Rodolph informed Norfolk of this as a matter of no weight; and every thing seemed to concour in forwarding the undertaking.

Norfolk, notwithstanding these criminal enterprises, had never entirely forgotten his duty to his sovereign, his conscience; and though he had thought the plan both of an invasion and an insurrection, he still flattered himself, that the innocence of his intentions would justify the violation of his measures, and that, as he aimed at nothing but the liberty of the Queen of Scots, and the obtaining of Elizabeth's consent to his marriage, he could not justly reproach himself as a rebel and a traitor. It is certain, however, that, considering the queen's vigour and spirit, the scheme, if successful, must finally have ended in dethroning her; and her authority was here exposed to the utmost danger.

The conspiracy hitherto had entirely escaped the vigilance of Elizabeth, and that of secret Cecil, who now bowing to the board by Rodolph's carriage, sent from another attempt of Norfolk's, that they first obtained a hint, which, being diligently traced, led at last to a full discovery. Mary had intended to send a sum of money to Lord Herries, and her partisans in Scotland; and Norfolk undertook to have it delivered to Bannister, a servant of his, at that time in the North, who was to find some expedient for conveying it to Lord Herries. He mistrusted the money to any servant who was not in the secret, and told him that the bag contained a sum of money in silver, which he was to deliver to Bannister with a letter: but the servant conjecturing, from the weight and size of the bag, that it was full of treasure, the letter to Bannister; who immediately ordered Bannister, Barker, and Hecford, the duke's secretary, to be put under arrest, and to undergo a severe examination. Torture made them confess the whole truth; and as Hecford, though ordered to burn all papers, had carefully kept them concealed under the mat of the duke's chamber, and under the tiles of the house, full evidence now appeared against his master. Norfolk himself, who was entirely ignorant of the discoveries made by his servants, was brought before the council; and though exhorting to stone for his guilt by a full confession, he persisted in denying every crime with which he was charged. The queen always declared, that, if he had given her this proof of his sincere repentance, she would have pardoned all his former offences, but finding him obstinate, she committed him to the Tower, and ordered him to be brought to his trial. The Bishop of Ross had, on some suspicion of conspiring in the council of Norfolk's guilt; and every expedient was employed to make him reveal his share in the conspiracy. He at first insisted on his privilege; but he was told, that as his mistress was no longer a sovereign, he would not be required to reveal his knowledge, and information. As he were allowed, it did not warrant him in conspiring against the sovereign at whose court he resided. As he still refused to answer interrogatories, he was informed of the confession made by Norfolk's servants, after which he no longer scrupled to make a full discovery; and his evidence then formed the basis of the trial. A jury of twenty-five peers unanimously passed sentence upon him. The trial was quite regular, even according to the strict rules of Trial of Norfolk, observed at present in these matters; except that the witnesses given time to consider, and they were confronted with the prisoner: a laudable practice, which was not at that time observed in trials for high treason.

The queen still hesitated concerning Norfolk's execution, whether that she was really moved by friendship and compassion towards a peer of that rank and merit, or that, affecting the peace of eleemosyne, she only put on the appearance of these sentiments. Twice she signed a warrant for his execution, and twice revoked the fatal sentence; and though her ministers and counsellors pushed her to rigour, she still appeared irresolute and undecided. After four months' hesitation, a parliament was assembled, and the Commons addressed her, in strong terms of condemnation and execration, against the execution of the duke; and the king and queen, in a general resolution, which, when added to the greatness and certainty of his guilt, would, she thought, justify, to the eyes of all mankind, her severity against that nobleman.

Norfolk was found in the most ignoble manner, and though he cleared himself of any diabolical intentions against the queen's authority, he acknowledged the justice of the sentence by which he suffered. That we may relate together all of a sudden, it is said that the Earl of Northumberland, being delivered up to the queen by the Regent of Scotland, was also, a few months after, brought to the scaffold for his rebellion.

The Queen of Scots was either on the occasion or the cause of all these disturbances; but as she was a sovereign princess, and might reasonably, from the harsh treatment which she had met with, think herself entitled to any expedient for her relief. Elizabeth durst not, as yet, form expensive and hazardous designs against her; but she had on her side her own daughter, and she only sent Lord Delwar, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Thomas Bromley, and Dr. Wilson, to expostulate with her, and to demand satisfaction for all those parts of her conduct which, from the beginning of her life, had given displeasure to Elizabeth: her assuming the arms of England, refusing to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, intending to marry Norfolk without the queen's consent, conspiring in the northern rebellion, in prating with Rodolph to engage the King of Spain in an invasion of England, procuring the Pope's bull of excommunication, and allowing her friends abroad to give her the title of Queen of England. Mary, in her letter to Elizabeth, in her charge, either by denying the facts imputed to her, or by throwing the blame on others. But the queen was little satisfied with her apology, and the parliament was so enraged against her, that the Commons made a direct application as a general rule of conduct, (an intention which it is unreasonable to suppose,) would lead to consequences destructive of all principles of humanity and morality. Matters were here carried further than Elizabeth intended; and that the queen, satisfied with the execution of the nation, sent to the House her express commands not to deal any further at present in the affair of the Scottish queen. Nothing could be a stronger proof, that the spirit of man, prevails over the temperance of authorities derived from Scripture, especially from the Old Testament; and that the queen was so little a lover of that sect, that she was not likely to make any concession merely in deference to their solicitation. Table should have shown, that that character, which the Commons in another remarkable instance. The Commons had passed two bills for regulating ecclesiastical ceremon—A. D. 1571.—chap. XII.
ies; but she sent them a like impetuous message with her former ones; and by the terror of her prerogative, she stopped all further proceeding in those matters.

But though Elizabeth would not carry matters to such extremities as Mary, yet it is likely that a precedent, so contumaciously, by the advice of her parliament, she was alarmed at the great interest and the restless spirit of that princess, as well as her close connexions with Spain; and she thought it necessary both to increase the rigor and strictness of her confinement, and to prevent those accessions of force which she imagined her hitherto pursued in her management of Scotland.

That kingdom remained still in a state of anarchy. The castle of Edinburgh, commanded by Kirkaldy of Grange, had declared for Mary; and the lords of that party, encouraged by his countenance, had taken possession of the capital, and carried on a vigorous war against the regent. By a sudden and unexpected seized, they seized that nobleman at Stirling; but finding that his friends, sallying from the castle, were likely to rescue him, they instantly put him to death. The Earl of Moray was chosen regent in his room; and found the same difficulties in the government of that divided country. He was therefore glad to accept of the mediation offered by the French and English ambassadors; and to conclude on equal terms a truce with the queen's party. He was a man of a free and generous spirit, and scorned to submit to any dependence upon foreign powers: and Elizabeth, who had then formed intimate connections with France, yielded with less reluctance to the solicitations of that court, still maintained the appearance of neutrality between the two parties, and the balance of power was preserved. But affairs soon after took a new turn: Moray died of melancholy, with which the distracted state of the country afflicted him: Morton was chosen regent; and as this nobleman had secreted all his measures with Elizabeth, who no longer relied on the friendship of the French court, she resolved to exert herself more effectually for the support of the party which she had always favoured. She sent Sir Henry Killegrew, ambassador of her name to Scotch, who on Scotch had practised so decisive and decisive was by the discovery and punishment of Norfolk's conspiracy, that they were glad to submit to the king's authority, and accept of an indemnity for all past offences.

The Duke of Châtelherault and the Earl of Huntly, with the most considerable of Mary's friends, laid down their arms on these conditions. The garrison alone of the castle of Edinburgh continued refractory. Kirkaldy's fortunes were extreme; and he flattered himself with the hopes of receiving friendship and aid from the French and Spanish court, who encouraged his obstinacy, in the view of being able, from that quarter, to give disturbance to England. Elizabeth was alarmed with the danger, she no more approved the adherence of the whole, and an exact register of those, who she found, would no longer be amuse by her artifices; she had an implicit reliance on Morton; and she saw that by the submission of all the considerable nobility, the pacification of Scotland would be an easy as well as a most important undertaking. She ordered therefore Sir William Darny, governor of Berwick, to march with some troops and artillery to Edinburgh, and to besiege the castle.

The garrison surrendered at discretion; Kirkaldy was delivered into the hands of his countrymen, by whom he was tried, condemned, and executed; secretary Lidington, who had taken part with him, died soon after a voluntary death, as is supposed; and Scotland, submitting entirely to the regent, gave not, during a long time, any further intimation to Elizabeth.

French affairs. The events which happened in France were not so agreeable to the queen's interests and inclinations. The fallacious pacifications which had been so often made with the huguenots, gave reason to suspect the present intentions of the court; and, after all the other leaders of that party were betrayed into a dangerous credulity, the egregious seditious still remained unpunished. For the abettors of the massacre were at last overcome, partly by the profound dissimula-the massacre of France, and return again to the performance of his duty towards his prince and country. He considered besides, that as the former violent conduct of the court had ever met with such fatal success, it was not unwise that Prince Charles, who had repeatedly his was the introduction, and appeared not to be exerted in any dangerous amonist or prejudices, would be induced to govern himself by more moderate maxims. And as Charles was young, was of a passionate, hasty temper, and addicted to the pursuit of pleasures, such as gaming, hunting, and good company, the character, or difficult, and almost impossible, to be so uniformly supported by him. Moved by these considerations, the admiral, the Queen of Navarre, and all the French nobility, betook themselves to the Court of France, and gave credit to the treacherous cursses and professions of the French court. Elizabeth herself, notwithstanding her great experience and penetration, entertained not the least distrust of Charles's sincerity; and being pleased to find her enemies of the house of Guise removed from all authority, and to observe an amity every day growing between the French and Spanish monarchs, she concluded a defensive league with the former, and regarded this alliance as an invincible barrier to her throne. Walsingham, her ambassador, sent her over, by every courier, the most satisfactory accounts of the humble, and plain dealing, and fidelity of those perjured French.

The better to blind the jealous huguenots, and draw their leaders into the snare prepared for them, Charles offered his sister Margaret in marriage to the Prince of Navarre; and the admiral, for the satisfaction of his party, had come to Paris, in order to assist at the celebration of these nuptials, which, it was hoped, would finally, if not compose the differences, at least appease the bloody animosity of the two religions. The Queen of Navarre was persuaded by orders from the court; the admiral was dangerously wounded by an assassin: yet Charles re- doubting his disavowal, was still able to retain the huguenots in their security; till, on the evening of St. Bartholomew's a few days after the marriage, the signal was given for a general massacre of those religious, and the king himself in person led the way to these assassinations. The hatred of the monarch of France, against the Protestants, made them second, without any preparation, the fury of the court; and persons of every condition, age, and sex, suspected of any propensity to that religion, were involved in an undistinguished ruin. The admiral, his son, the cardinal of Vendome, Captain Lavardin, men who, during the late wars, had signalized themselves by the most heroic actions, were miserably butchered, without resistance; the streets of Paris flowed with blood; and the people, more enraged, was excited with their cruelty, as if repaying that death had saved the victims from further insult, exercised on their dead bodies all the rage of the most licentious brutality. About five hundred gentlemen and men of rank perished in this massacre, and near ten thousand of inferior condition. Orders were instantly despatched to all the provinces for a like general execution of the protesters; and in Rouen, Lyons, and many other cities, the people emulated the fury of the capital. Even the murder of the King of Navarre, and Prince of Conde, had been proposed by the Duke of Guise; but Charles, softened by the amiable manners of the King of Navarre, and hoping that these young princes might easily be converted to the Catholic faith, determined to spare their lives, though he obliged them to purchase their safety by a seeming change of their religion.

Charles, in order to cover this barbarous perfidy, pretended that a conspiracy of the huguenots to seize his person had been suddenly detected; and that he had been necessitated, for his own defence, to proceed to this severity against them. He sent orders to Fenelon, his ambassador in England, to ask an audience, and to give Elizabeth this intelligence. Edward, the Irish minister, a man of probity, abhorred the treachery and cruelty of his court; and even scrupled not to declare, that he was now ashamed to bear the name of Frenchman; yet he was obliged to obey his orders, and make use of the apology which had been prescribed to him. He met with that reception from all the courtiers, which he knew the conduct of his master had so well merited. Nothing could be more awful and affecting than the solemnity of his audience. A melancholy sorrow sat on every face: silence, as in the dead of night, reigned throughout all the chambers of the royal apartment; the courtiers and ladies, clad in deep mourning, were ranged on each side, and allowed him to pass, without affording him one salute or favourable look; till he was admitted to the presence of the king. That ceremony seemed to him with a more easy, if not a more gracious countenance; and heard his apology, without discovering any visible symptoms of indignation. She then told him, that though on the first rumour of this dreadful intelligence, she had been astonished that so many brave men and loyal subjects, who rested secure on the faith of their sovereign, should have been suddenly butchered in so barbarous a manner, she had hitherto suspended her judgment, till further and more certain information should be brought her: that the account which he had given, even if founded on no mistake or bad information, though it might alleviate, would by no means remove the blame of the king's counsellors, on whom he had the immediate proceedings of the whole. That the same force which, without resistance, had massacred so many defenceless men, could easily have secured their persons, and have reserved them for a trial, and for proper and just punishment; which he could have distinguished the innocent from the guilty: that the admiral, in particular, being dangerously wounded, and environed by the guards of the king, on whose protection he seemed entirely to rely, had no means of escape, and might surely, before his death, have been constrained to the cruelties imputed to him; that it was more worthy of a sovereign to reserve in his own hands the sword of justice, than to commit it to bloody murderers, who, being the declared and avowed enemies of the person of the king, employed it without mercy and without distinction: that if these sentiments were just, even supposing the conspiracy of the protesants to be real, how much more so, if that crime was a calamity of their enemies, invented for their destruction! that if, upon inquiry, the innocence of these unhappy victims should afterwards appear, it was the king's duty to turn his vengeance on their defacers, who had thus cruelly abused his confidence, had murdered so many of his brave subjects, and had done what in what they lay to cover him with everlasting dishonour; and that for her part, she should form her judgment of his intentions by his conduct, and in the mean time should act as desired by the king, to incriminate her; or, by pity then, blame his master for the extremities to which he had been carried.

Elizabeth was fully sensible of the dangerous situation in which she now stood. In the massacre of Paris, she saw the result of that general conspiracy, formed for the extermination of the protestants; and she knew that she herself, as the head and protectress of the new religion, was exposed to the utmost fury and resentment of the catholics. The violence and cruelty of the Spaniards in the Low Countries was another branch of the same conspiracy; and as Charles and Philip, two princes nearly allied in perjury and barbarity, as well as political ambition, had now laid aside their pretended quarrel, and had avowed the most entire friendship, she had reason, as soon as they had appeased their domestic commotions, to dread the effect of their wishes and designs. To the Duke of Guise, the king, and his family, whom Charles, in order to deceive the admiral, had hitherto kept at a distance, had now acquired an open and entire ascendant in the court of France; and she was sensible that these princes, from personal as well as political motives, were her declared implacable enemies. The Queen of Scots, their near relation and close confederate, was the pretender to her throne; and, though detained in custody, was actuated by a restless spirit, and, besides her foreign allies, possessed numerous and zealous partisans in the heart of the kingdom. For these reasons, Elizabeth thought it more prudent not to reject all commerce with the French monarch, but still to listen to the professions of friendship which he made her. She allowed even the negociations to be renewed for her marriage with the Duke of Alençon, Charles's third brother: those with the Duke of Anjou had already been broken off. She sent the Earl of Worcester to assist in the baptism of a young princess, born to Charles; but before she agreed to give him this last mark of concession, she thought it becoming her dignity, to renew her expressions of blame, and even of detestation, against those persons, whose designs on him she had formed. Meanwhile, she prepared herself for that attack which seemed to threaten her from the combined power and violence of the Romanists: she fortified Portsmouth, put her fleet in order, exercised her militia, cultivated popularity with her subjects, acted with vigour for the further reduction of Scotland under obedience to the young king, and renewed her alliance with the German princes, who were no less alarmed than herself at these treacherous and sanguinary measures, so universally embraced by the catholics.

But though Elizabeth cautiously avoided coming to extremities with Charles, the greatest security that she possessed against the designs of his implacable enemies was the existence of those difficulties which the obstinate resistance of the hugonots still continued to create to him. Such of that sect as lived in French affairs, near the frontiers, immediately, on the first approach of persons of that sect, into the principality of Orange, Germany, or Switzerland, where they excited the commotion and passion of the protestants, A. D. 1574, and prepared themselves, with increased forces and renown, to return into France, and avenge the treacherous slaughter of their brethren. Those who lived in the middle of the kingdom, took shelter in the nearest garrisons occupied by the hugonots; and finding that they could repose no faith in capitulations, and expect no clemency, ventured to come within the last extremity. The sect, which Charles had hoped, at one blow, to exterminate, had now an army of eighteen thousand men on foot, and possessed, in different parts of the kingdom, above a hundred cities, towns, or fortresses; nor could it be that prince deemed himself secure from the invasions threatened him by all the other protestants in Europe. The nobility and gentry of England were roused to such a pitch of resentment, that they offered to levy an army of twenty-four thousand foot and four thousand horse, to transport them into France, and to maintain them six months at their own charge; but Elizabeth, who was cautious of her people to intrust their destiny still further the quibbles between the two religions by those dangerous crusades, refused her consent, and moderated the zeal of her subjects. The German princes, less political, or more secure from the resentment of France, forwarded the leaves made by the protestants; and the young Prince of Condé, having escaped from court, put himself at the head of these troops, and prepared to invade the kingdom. The Duke of Alençon, the King of Navarre, the family of Montmorency, and many considerable men, even among the catholics, displeased, either on a private or public account, with the measures of the court, favored the progress of the hugonots; and every thing escaped into confusion. The king, instead of repressing his violent counsels, which had brought matters to such extremities, called aloud for new violences; nor could even the mortal distemper under which he laboured, moderate the extremity by which he was actuated. He died without male issue, at the age of twenty-five years; a prince, whose character, containing that usual mixture of dissimulation and ferocity, of quick resentment and unrelenting justice, was filled with implacable enmity, and threatened still worse, both to his native country and to all Europe. Henry, Duke of Anjou, who had, some time before, been elected King of Poland, no sooner heard of his brother's death, than he hastened to take possession of the throne of France; and found the kingdom not only involved in the greatest present disorders, but exposed to infirmities, for which it was extremely difficult to provide any suitable remedy. The people were now, as Henry admitted, in their faction, furious from their zeal, and mutually engrossed from the injuries which they had committed or suffered; and as all faith had been violated, and moderation banished, it seemed impracticable to find any terms of accommodation between them. Each of the parties, indeed, appealed itself to others, whose commands had more authority than the will of the sovereign; and even the catholics, to whom the king was attached, were entirely conducted by the counsels of Guise and his family. The religious connexions led, on both sides, superseded the civil; or, (for men will always be guided by present interest,) two empires being secretly formed in the kingdom, every individual was engaged by new views of interest to follow these leaders, to whom, during the course of past convulsions, he had been indebted for his honour and preferment.

Henry, observing the low condition of the crown, had his mind formed for taking his own authority by acting as umpire between the parties, by moderating their differences, and by reducing both to a dependence upon himself. He possessed all the talents of dissimulation, requisite for the execution of this delicate plan; but being deficient in the propriety of conduct and the spirit of manner, instead of acquiring a superiority over both factions, he lost the confidence of both, and taught the partisans of each to adhere more closely to their particular leaders, whom they found more cordial and sincere in the cause, which they espoused. The hugenots were strengthened by the accession of a German army, under the Prince of Condé and Prince Casimir; but much to the credit and personal worth of the King of Navarre, who, having fled from court, had placed himself at the head of that formidable party. Henry, in prosecution of his plan, entered into a composition with them; and being desirous of preserving a balance between the sects, he granted them peace on the most advantageous conditions. This was the fifth general peace made with the hugenots; but though it was more sincere on the part of the court than any of the former, it gave the highest disgust to the catholics; and afforded the Duke of Guise the desired pretext of declaiming against the measures, and maxims, and conduct of the king. That artful and bold leader took then an occasion of reviving his faction among his own followers, and he laid the first foundations of the famous League, which, without paying any regard to the royal authority, aimed at the entire suppression of the hugenots. Such was the unhappy condition of France, from the past severities and violent measures of the government, that toleration could no longer be admitted; and a concession for liberty of conscience, which would probably have appeased the reformers, excited the greatest resentment in the catholics. Henry, in order to divert the force of the abilities as were neutrals between those dangerous factions, he gave all his confidence to young able-headed favourers, who, unable to prop his falling authority, leant entirely upon it, and inflamed the general odium against his administration. The public burdens, increased by his profuse gifts to the nobility, and by a variety of other devices, became another ground of complaint; and the uncontrolled animosity of parties, joined to the multiplicity of taxes, rendered peace more uncomfortable than any open state of foreign, or even domestic, hostilities. Thus, A.D. 1570, and too frequent to be concealed; and the plain, direct, and avowed conduct of the Duke of Guise, on one side, and that of the King of Navarre, on the other, drew by degrees the generality of the nation to devote themselves, without reserve, to one or the other of those great leaders.

The civil commotions of France were of too general importance to be overlooked by the other princes of Europe; and Elizabeth's foresight and vigilance, though somewhat restrained by her frugality, led her to take secretly some part in them. Besides employing on all occasions her good offices in favour of the hugenots, she had expended in considerable sums in levying that army of Germans which the Prince of Condé and Prince Casimir conducted into France; and notwithstanding her negotiations with the court, and her professions of amity, she always considered her own interests as connected with the prosperity of France; and was anxious to replace the ancient house of Guise. Philip, on the other hand, had declared himself protector of the league; had entered into the closest correspondence with Guise; and had employed all his authority in supporting the credit of that factious leader. This sympathy of religion, which of itself begot a connection of interests, was one considerable inducement; but that monarch had also in view, the subjugation of his relations hugenots in the Netherlands, as they received great encouragement from the French protestants, would, he hoped, finally despair of success, after the entire suppression of their friends and confederates.

The same political views which engaged the wars of the Elizabeth to support the hugenots, would lower countries, have led her to assist the distressed protestants in the lower countries; but the mighty power of Philip, the tranquillity of all his other dominions, and the spot force which he maintained in those mutinous provinces, kept her at a distance, and obliged her, notwithstanding all temptations and all provocations, to preserve some terms of amity with that monarch. On his part, Philip, also as a matter of glory, that many of the Flemish exiles, who infested the seas, and preyed on his master's subjects, were received into the harbours of England, and were there allowed to dispose of their prizes; and by these demonstrations, the queen found herself under a necessity of denying them all entrance into her dominions. But this measure proved, in the issue, extremely prejudicial to the interests of Philip. These desperate exiles, finding no longer any possibility of subsistence, were forced to attempt the most pernicious enterprises; and they made an attack on the Brille, a sea-port town in Holland, where they met with success, and after a short resistance, became masters of the place. The Duke of Alva was alarmed at the danger; and stopping those bloody executions which he was making on the defenceless Flemings, he hastened with his army to extinguish the flame, which, falling on materials so well prepared for combustion, seemed to promise a general conflagration. His fears soon appeared to be well grounded.

The people in the neighbourhood of the Brille, enraged by that complication of cruelty, oppression, insolence, usurpation, and persecution, under which they and all their countrymen laboured, few to arms; and in a few days almost the whole province of Holland and that of Zealand had revolted from the Spaniards, and had openly declared against the tyranny of Alva. This event happened in the year 1573.

William, Prince of Orange, descended from a sovereign family of great lustre and antiquity in Germany, inheriting the possessions of a sovereign family in France, had fixed his residence in the Low Countries, and on account of his noble birth and immense riches, as well as of his personal merit, was universally regarded as the greatest subject that lived in those provinces. He had opposed, by all regular and dutiful means, the progress of the Spanish usurpations; and when Alva conducted his army into the Netherlands, and assumed the government, this prince, well acquainted with the violent character of the man, and the tyrannical spirit of the court of Madrid, wisely fled from the danger that threatened him. He retired to his paternal estate and dominions in Germany. He was cited to appear before Alva's tribunal, was condemned in absence, was declared a rebel, and his ample possessions in the Low Countries were confiscated. When Autegoeve, he had formed an army of protestants in the empire, and had made some attempts to restore the Flemings to liberty; but was still repulsed with loss, by the vigilance and military conduct of Alva, and by the great bravery, as well as discipline, of those veteran Spaniards who served under that general.

The revolt of Holland and Zeeland, provinces which the Prince of Orange had formerly commanded, and where he was much beloved, called him anew from his retreat; and he added conduct, no less than spirit, to that obstinate resistance which was here made to the Spanish dominion. By uniting the revolted cities in a league, he laid the foundations of that union, which was intended to promote industry and liberty, whose arms and policy have long made so signal a figure in every transaction of Europe. He inflamed the inhabitants by every motive which re- sembled resentment, or love of freedom could inspire. Though the present greatness of the Spanish monarchy might deprive them of all courage, he still flattered them with the concurrence of the other provinces, and with assistance from neighboring states; and he exhorted them, in defence of their religion, their liberties, their lives, to endure the utmost extremities of war. From this spirit proceeded the desperate defence of Harlem; a defence which neither cowardice could daunt. But which the Spaniards revenged by the execution of more than two thousand of the inhabitants. This extreme severity, instead of striking terror into the Hollanders, animated them by despair; and the vigorous resistance made at Alkmaer, where Alva was finally repulsed, showed them that their insolent enemies were not invincible. The duke, finding at last the pernicious effect of his violent counsels, selected to be recalled; Medina-Celi, who was appointed his successor, refused to accept the government; Requesens, commander of Castle, was sent from Italy to replace Alva; and this tyrant departed from the Netherlands in 1574; leaving his name in execution to the terror of the rebels, and making his escape. During a course of five years, he had delivered above eighteen thousand of those rebellious heretics into the hands of the executioners. Requesens, though a man of milder dispositions, could not oppose the violent hatred which the revolted Hollanders had conceived against the Spanish government; and the war continued as obstinate as ever. In the siege of Leyden, undertaken by the Spaniards, the Dutch opened the dykes and sluices, in order to drive them from the enterprise; and the very peasants were active in running their fields by an inundation, rather than fall again under the hated tyranny of Spain. But notwithstanding this regularity and resolution of the enemy; and the contest seemed too unequal between so mighty a monarchy, and two small provinces, however fortified by nature, and however defended by the desperate resolution of the inhabitants, The Prince of Orange, in their behalf, in 1575, resolved to use for foreign succour, and to make applications in one or other of his great neighbours, Henry or Elizabeth. The court of France was not exempt from the same spirit of tyranny and persecution which prevailed among the Spaniards; and that kingdom, torn by domestic dissensions, seemed not to enjoy, at present, either leisure or ability to pay regard to foreign interests. But England, long connected, both by commerce and alliances, with the Netherlands, and now more concerned in the fate of the revolted provinces by sympathy in religion, seemed naturally interested in their defence; and as Elizabeth had justly entertained great jealousy of Philip, and governed her kingdom in perfect tranquillity, hopes were entertained that her policy, her ambition, or her generosity, would engage her to support them under their present calamities. They sent therefore a solemn embassy to London, consisting of St. Aldegonde, Donna, Nivelle, Buys, and Melsen; and after employing the most humble supplications, and the most touching representations of the miseries of their sovereignty, of their provinces, if she would exert her power in their defence.

There were many strong motives which might impel Elizabeth to consent to liberate an offer. She was apprized of the injuries which Philip had done her, by his intrigues with the mulctedness in England and Ireland; she foresaw the danger which she might incur from a total prevalence of the Catholics in the Low Countries; and the maritime situation of those provinces, as well as their command over the great rivers, was an inviting circumstance to a nation like the English, who were beginning to cultivate commerce and naval power. But this princes, though magnanimous, had never entertained the ambition of making conquests, or gaining new acquisitions; and the whole purpose of her vigilant and active politics was to maintain, by the most frugal and cautious expedients, the tranquillity of her empire. And the Spanish monarchy was the apparent consequence of her accepting the dominion of these provinces; and after taking the inhabitants under her protection, she could never afterwards lose them to any consequence. This being considered, her defence might become, she must embrace it, even further than her convenience or interests would permit. For these reasons, she refused, in positive terms, the sovereignty offered her; but told the ambassador, that an agreement for the good will which the Prince of Orange and the States had shown her, she would endeavour to mediate an agreement for them, on the most reasonable terms that could be proposed. She sent him to Holland to Cobham to Philip; and represented to him the danger which he would incur of losing entirely the Low Countries, if France could obtain the least interval from her internal disorders, and find leisure to offer her protection to those mutinous and discontented provinces. Philip seemed to take this remonstrance in good part; but no accord ensued, and war in the Netherlands continued with the same rage and violence as before.

It was now the turn of the Dutch to repel the Hollanders from their present desperate situation. Requesens, the governor, dying suddenly, the Spanish troops, discontented for want of pay, and licentious for want of a proper authority to curb their great expedition, and threw everything into confusion. They sacked and pillaged the cities of Maastricht and Antwerp, and executed great slaughter on the inhabitants; they threatened the other cities on the Scheldt, and all the provinces, excepting Luxembourg, united for mutual defence against their violence, and called in the Prince of Orange and the Hollanders as their protectors. A treaty, commonly called the Pacification of Ghent, was formed by common agreement; and the removal of foreign troops, with the restoration of their ancient liberties, was the object which the provinces mutually stipulated to pursue. Don John of Austria, natural brother to Philip, being appointed governor, failed in an expedition that devastated Brabant, and threw everything into confusion. minded to impose very strict limitations on his authority, he broke all articles, seized Namur, and procured the recall of the Spanish army from Italy. This prince, endowed with a lofty genius, and elated by the prosperous successes of his youth, had opened his mind to vast undertakings: and when he beheld the united forces of the three revolutions, or provinces, he projected to espouse the Queen of Scots, and to acquire in her right the dominion of the British kingdoms. Elizabeth was aware of his intentions; and some months before he had made up his mind to restore her, she determined to have a large prospect of their making a long and vigorous defence against Spain, she no longer scrupled to embrace the protection of their liberties, which seemed so intimately connected with their happiness. She sent a sum of money, about twenty thousand pounds, for the immediate pay of their troops; she concluded a treaty with them; in which she stipulated to assist them with five thousand foot and a thousand horse, at the charge of the Flemings; and to lend them a hundred thousand pounds on receiving the bonds of some of the most considerable towns of the Netherlands, for her repayment within the year. It was further agreed, that the commander of the English army should be admitted into the council of the States, and nothing be determined concerning war or peace without previously informing the queen or him of it; that they should enter into no league without her consent; and that all regulations of private houses and affairs should be referred to her arbitration; and that if any prince, on any pretext, should attempt hostilities against her, they should send to her assistance an army equal to that which she was to reinforce. This alliance was signed on the 6th of January 1578.1

One considerable inducement to the queen for entering into treaty with the States was, to prevent their throwing themselves into the arms of France, and she was desirous to make the King of Spain believe that it was her sole motive. She represented to him, by her ambassador, Thomas Wilkes, that hitherto she had religiously acted the part of a good neighbour and ally; had refused the sovereignty of Holland and Zealand, when offered her; had advised the Prince of Orange to submit to the king; and had even accompanied her counsel with menaces, in case of his refusal. She persevered, she said, in the same friendly intentions; and as a proof of it, she would venture to interpose with her advice, for the composure of the present differences: let Don John, whom she could not but regard as her mortal enemy, be recalled; let some other prince more moderate be substituted in his room; let the Spanish armies be withdrawn; let the Flemings be restored to their ancient liberties and privileges: and if, after these concessions, they were still obstinate not to return, let all her promised pains be made with them; and those of the King of Spain had force to compel him. Philip dissembled his resentment against the queen; and still continued to supply Don John with money and troops. That prince, though once repulsed at Rinemont by the valour of the English under Norris, and though opposed, as well by the army of the States as by Prince Casimir, who had conducted to the Low Countries a great body of Germans, paid by the queen, gained a great advantage over the Flemings at Gemblours; but was cut off in the midst of his prosperity by poison, given him secretly, as was suspected, by orders from Philip, who dreaded his ambition. The Prince of Parma succeeded to the throne, more at that time in adversity, negociation and military exploits, made great progress against the revolted Flemings, and advanced the progress of the Spaniards by his arts, as well as by his arms.

During these years, while England was almost every where in great commotion, England enjoyed a profound tranquillity; owing chiefly to the prudence and vigour of the queen's administration, and to the wise precautions which she employed in all her measures. By supporting the zealous protestants in Scotland and Ireland and giving them the superiority over their antagonists, she had closely connected their interests with her own, and had procured herself entire security from that quarter whence the most dangerous anxieties could be made upon her. She saw in France her enemies, the Gusses, though extremely powerful, yet counterbalanced by the hugenots, her zealous partisans; and even hated by the king, who was jealous of their restless and evanescent ambition. The king of Philip gave her just ground of anxiety; but the same hugenot had happily excited the most obstinate opposition among his own subjects, and had created him enemies, whom, soon after, he conceived a great and deadly love. The Queen of Scots, her antagonist and rival, and the pretender to her throne, was a prisoner in her hands; and by her impatience and high spirit had been engaged in practices, which afforded the queen a pretence for rendering her confinement more rigorous, and for cutting off her communication with her partisans in England.

Religion was the capital point, on which depended all the political transactions of that age; and the queen's conduct in this particular, making allowance for the prevailing prejudices of the times, could scarcely be accused of severity or imprudence. She established no inquisition into men's bosoms: she imposed no oath of supremacy, except on those who received trust or emolument from the public: and though the exercise of every religion but the established was prohibited by statute, the violation of this law, by saying mass, and receiving the sacrament in any form, was visited by no punishment at all. So, while, on the other hand, the catholics, in the beginning of her reign, showed little reluctance against going to church, or frequenting the ordinary duties of public worship, she showed no inclination to press them to exercise their degrees reconcile all his partisans to the reformed religion, hastened the publication of the bull, which excommunicated the queen, and freed her subjects from their oaths of allegiance. Envy to great parties was taken by the emissaries of Rome, to render the breach between the two religions as wide as possible, and to make the frequency of protestant churches appear highly criminal in the catholics. These practices, with the rebellion which ensued, increased the vigilance and severity of the government; but the Romanists, if their condition were compared with that of the nonconformists in other countries, and with their own maxims where they domineered, could not justly complain of violence or persecution.

The queen appeared rather more anxious to keep a strict hand over the puritans; who, though their pretensions were not so immediately dangerous to her authority, seemed to be actuated by more irreconcilable obstinacy, and to retain claims, of which, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, it was, as yet, difficult to discern the full scope and intention. Some secret attempts of that sect to establish a separate congregation and discipline had been made; to compel them to observe the inquisition; and when any of the established clergy discovered a tendency to their principles, by omitting the legal habits or ceremonies, the queen had shown a determined resolution to punish them by fines and deprivation, 2 though her orders to that purpose had been frequently eluded, by the secret protection which these sectaries received from some of her most considerable couriers.

But what chiefly tended to gain Elizabeth the hearts of her subjects, was, her frugality, which, though carried sometimes to an extreme, led her not to amass treasures, but only to prevent impositions upon her people, who, she seemed to be accustomed by more irreconcilable obstinacy, and to retain claims, of which, both in civil and ecclesiastical matters, it was, as yet, difficult to discern the full scope and intention. HISTORY OF ENGLAND. [A.D. 1579.—CHAP. XL.

history; and except the small part which Elizabeth took in foreign transactions, there scarcely passed any occurrence which required a particular detail.

A parliament, was a session of parliament, held on the 8th of February 1576; where debates were started, which may appear somewhat curious and singular. Peter Wentworth, a puritan, who had signalized himself in former parliaments by his frequent and unqualified spirit, opened this session with a premised harangue, which drew on him the indignation of the House, and gave great offence to the queen and the ministers. As it seems to contain a rude sketch of those principles of liberty which happily issued afterwards the premeditation in England, it may be improper to give, in a few words, the substance of it. He promised that the name of liberty is sweet; but the thing itself is precious beyond the most insatiable treasure; and that it believed them to be careful, lest, contenting themselves with the sweetness of the name, they forego the substance, and abandon what of all earthly possessions was of the highest value to the kingdom. He then proceeded to observe, that freedom of speech in that House, a privilege so useful both to sovereign and subject, had been formerly infringed in many essential articles, and was at present exposed to the most imminent danger: that it was absurd to suppose that any one was hand-made, especially if it regarded religion, to surmise, that these topics were disagreeable to the queen, and that the further proceeding in them would draw down her indignation upon any, that Solomon, justly affirmed, the king's displeasure to be a messenger of death; and it was no wonder if men, even though urged by motives of conscience and duty, should be inclined to stop short, when they found themselves exposed to so severe a punishment. He insisted upon the employing the common sense, the House was incapacitated from serving their country, and even from serving the queen herself, whose ears, besieged by pernicious flatterers, were thereby rendered more easily to be imposed upon. He told the Commons, it was a mockery to call an assembly a parliament, yet deny it that privilege, which was so essential to its being, and without which it must degenerate into an abject school of servility and dissimulation. That, as the parliament was the great guardian of the laws, they ought to have liberty to discharge their trust, and to maintain that authority whence even kings themselves derive their being: that a king was constituted such by law, and though he was not dependent on man, yet was he subordinate to God and the law, and was obliged to make their prescriptions, not his own will, the rule of his conduct: that even his commission, as God's vicegerent, enforced, instead of loosening, that right which he had to be invested with authority to execute on earth the will of God, which is nothing but law and justice: that though these surmises of displeasing the queen by their proceedings had impeached, in a very essential point, all freedom of speech, a privilege granted them by a special law, yet was there more express and more dangerous invasion made on their liberties by frequent messages from the throne; that it had become a practice, when the House was entering on any question, either ecclesiastical or civil, to bring an order from the queen, inhibiting them absolutely from treating of such matters, and deferring them from all further discussion of any momentous articles: that the prelates, emboldened by her royal protection, had assumed a decisive power in all questions of religion, and required that every one should implicitly submit his faith to their arbitrary determinations: that the love which he bore his sovereign forbade him to be silent under such abuses, or to sacrifice, on this important occasion, his duty to servile flattery and complaisance; and that so earthly creature was exempt from fault, so neither was the queen herself; but, in imposed silence, they diverged from the right path, committed a great, and even dangerous, fault against herself and the whole commonwealth.

It is easy to observe from this speech, that, in this dawn of liberty, the parliamentary style was still crude and unformed; and that the proper decour of attacking ministers and councillors, without interesting the honour of the crown, or mentioning the person of the sovereign, was not yet entirely established. The Commons expressed great displeasure at this unusual licence. They questioned Wentworth from the House, and committed him prisoner to the serjeant-at-arms. They even ordered him to be examined by a committee, and after that, that they who were also members of the privy-council; and a report to be next day made to the House. This committee met in the star-chamber, and, wearing the aspect of that arbitrary court, summoned Wentworth to appear before them and answer for his behaviour; and that the Commons had discovered so little delicacy or precaution, in thus confounding their own authority with that of the star-chamber, Wentworth better understood the principles of liberty, and refused to give these counsellors any account of his conduct in parliament, till he were satisfied that they acted, not as members of the privy-council, but as a committee of the House. He justified his liberty of speech, by pleading the rigor and hardship he had suffered in the formation of the messages; and notwithstanding that the committee showed him, by instances in other reigns, that the practice of sending such messages was not unprecedented, he would not agree to do what was in hand merely; especially if it regarded religion, to surmise, that these topics were disagreeable to the queen, and that the further proceeding in them would draw down her indignation upon any. For, if the affair was that, after a month's confinement, the queen sent to the Commons, informing them, that, from her special grace and favour, she had restored him to his liberty, and placed him in the dangling of a mere liberty, she indirectly retained the power which she had yielded, of impressing the members, and obliging them to answer before her for their conduct in parliament. And Sir Walter Mildmay endeavored to make the House sensible of her Majesty's power in such cases, of expressing her opinion, the House was incapacitated from serving their country, and even from serving the queen herself, whose ears, besieged by pernicious flatterers, were thereby rendered more easily to be imposed upon. He told the Commons, it was a mockery to call an assembly a parliament, yet deny it that privilege, which was so essential to its being, and without which it must degenerate into an abject school of servility and dissimulation. The greatest and most absolute security that Elizabeth enjoyed during her whole reign never exempted her from vigilance and attention; but the scene began now to be more overcast, and dangers gradually multiplied on her from more than one quarter.

The Earl of Morton had hitherto retained Scotland. In strict alliance with the queen, and had also restored domestic tranquillity to that kingdom. But it was not to be expected that the factitious and legal authority of a regent would long maintain itself in a country accustomed with law and order; where even the natural dominion of hereditary princes so often met with opposition and control. The nobility began anew for their liberties, and the people were disquieted with some instances of Morton's avarice: and the clergy, who complained of further encroachments on their narrow revenue, joined and increased the discontent of the other orders. The regent was sensible of his dangerous situation; and having dropped some peevish expressions, as if he were willing or desirous to resign, the noblemen of the opposite party, favourites of the young king, held high of this concession, and required that demission which he seemed so frankly to offer them. James was at this time but eleven years of age; yet Morton, having secured himself, as he imagined, by a general pardon, resigned his authority into the hands of the king, who pretended to conduct in his own name, the administration of the kingdom. The regent retired from the government; and seemed to employ himself entirely in the care of his domestic affairs: but, either tired with this tranquillity, which appeared to him a burthen, or finding it time to throw off dissimulation, he came again to court; acquired an ascendant in the council; and, though he resumed not the title of regent, governed with the same authority as before. The opposite party, after holding separate conventions, took to arms on pretence of delivering their prince from captivity, and restoring him to the free exercise of his government; Queen Elizabeth interfered by her ambassador, Sir Robert Bowes, and mediatised an agreement between the factions: Morton kept possession of the government; but his enemies were numerous and vigilant: and his authority seemed to become every day more precarious.

The queen, d'Aubigny, of the house of Lenox, cousin-german to the king's father, had been born and educated in France; and being a young man of good address and a sweet disposition, he appeared to the Duke of Guise a proper instrument for detaching James from the English interest, and connecting him with his mother and her relations. He no sooner appeared at Stirling, where James resided, than he acquired the affections of the young monarch; and, joining his interest with those of James Stuart, of the house of Ochiltree, a man of profuse manners, who had acquired the king's favour, be employed himself, under the appearance of play and amusement, in instilling into the tender mind of the prince new sentiments of politics and government. He represented to him the injustice which had been done to Mary in her deposition, and made him entertain thoughts either of resigning the crown into her hands, or of associating her with him at the head of the English; and, though James, at the danger which might ensue from the prevalence of this interest in Scotland, sent anew Sir Robert Bowes to Stirling; and, accusing d'Aubigny, now created Earl of Lenox, of an attachment to the French, warned James against entertaining such sanguine and dangerous connexions. The king excused himself, by Sir Alexander Hume, his ambassador; and Lenox, finding that the queen had openly declared against him, was further confirmed in his intention of overturning the English interest, and particularly of ruining Morton, who was regarded as the head of it. That nobleman was arrested in council, accused as being taken up to accomplish more than the late king's murder, committed to prison, brought to trial, and condemned to suffer as a traitor. He confessed that Bothwell had communicated to him the design, had pleaded Mary's consent, and had desired his consent; but he declared that the king had ever had no oppression of the crime; and, in excuse for his concealing it, he alleged the danger of revealing the secret, either to Henry, who had no resolution nor constancy, or to Mary, who appeared to be an accomplice in the murder. Sir Thomas Halket was sent by the queen to intercede in favour of Morton; and that ambassador, not content with discharging this duty of his function, engaged, by his persuasion, the Earls of Argyle, Montrose, Angus, Murre, and Glemencar, to enter into a confederacy for protecting, even by force of arms, the life of the prisoner. The more to overawe that nobleman's enemies, Elizabeth ordered forces to be assembled on the borders of England; but this expedition served only to hasten his sentence and execution. Morton dealt with that constancy and resolution which had attended him through all the various events of his life; and left a reputation, which was augmented with regard to abilities than probity and virtue. But this conclusion of the scene happened not till the subsequent year.

Elizabeth was, during this period, extremely anxious on account of every revolution in Scotland; because that country alone, not being separated from England by sea, and bordering on all the catholic and malcontent counties, afforded her enemies a safe and easy method of attacking her; and because she was sensible, that Mary, thinking herself abandoned by the French monarch, had been engaged by the Guises to have recourse to the powerful protection of Philip, who, though he had not yet come to an open rupture with the queen, was every day more and more confirmed in his hatred to her. This might rattle the assistance which she gave to his rebels in the Low Countries, he had sent, under the name of the Pope's a body of seven hundred Spaniards and Italians into Ireland; where the inhabitants, always turbulent, and discontented with the English government, were now more alienated by religious prejudices, and were ready to join every invader. The Spanish general, San Josepho, built a fort in Kerry; and, with the aid of the Earl of Ormond, president of Munster, who was soon after joined by Lord Gray, the deputy, he made a weak and cowardly defence. After some assaults, freely sustained, he surrendered it; which was committed to the care of Lord Gray, who was ordered to disband the troops, and to command a small force, finding himself encumbered with so many prisoners, put all the Spaniards and Italians to the sword without mercy, and hanged about fifteen hundred of the Irish; a cruelty which gave great displeasure to Elizabeth. When the English ambassador made complaints of this invasion, he was answered by Sir Francis Drake, a bold seaman, who had assaulted the Spaniards in the place where they deemed themselves most secure, in the New World. This man, sprung from mean parents in the county of Devon, having acquired considerable riches by depredations made in the isthmus of Panama, and having there gotten a sight of the Pacific Ocean, was so stimulated by ambition and avarice, that he scrupled not to employ his whole fortune in a new adventure for the conquest of that vast empire, which had been, for all the European nations. By means of Sir Christopher Hatton, then vice-chamberlain, a great favourite of the queen's, he obtained her consent and approbation; and he set sail from Plymouth in 1577, with four ships and a pen- sion, on board of which were one hundred and sixty-four able sailors. He passed into the South Sea by the Straits of Magellan, and attacking the Spaniards, who expected no enemy in those quarters, he took many rich prizes, and prepared to return with the booty which he had acquired. Apprehensive of being intercepted by the enemy, if he took the same way forward, by which he had reached the Pacific Ocean, he attempted to find a passage by the north of California; and failing in that enterprise, he set sail for the East Indies, and returned safely this year by the Cape of Good Hope. He was the first Englishman who encircled the globe, and the first captain of his nation, who substituted a distant and hard adventure, died in his passage. His name became celebrated on account of so bold and fortunate an attempt; but the disgrace attending the defeat of the Spaniards that year, endeavoured to persuade the queen, that it would be more prudent to desist from the enterprise, to punish Drake, and to restore the treasure. But Elizabeth, who admired valour, and was allured by the prospect of sharing in the booty, determined to counterfeit that gallant sailor: she conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and accepted of a banquet from him, at Deptford, on board the ship which he had achieved so memorable a voyage. When Philip's ambassador, Mendonza, exclaimed against Drake's piracies, she told him that the Spaniards, by arrogating a right to the whole New World, and excluding thence all other European nations, who should sail thither, even waying the conquest of the denomination of the most industrious and naturally tempted others to make a violent irruption into those countries. To pacify, however, the catholic monarch, she caused part of the booty to be restored to Pedro Sebastian, a Spaniard whom they had treated as a pirate for five years, and who was an honest merchant whom Drake had spoiled. Having learned afterwards, that Philip had seized the money, and had employed part of it against herself in Ireland, part of it in the pay of the Prince of Parma's troops, she determined to make no more restitutions.

A.D. 1581. There was another cause, which induced the queen to take this resolution: she was in such want of money, that she was induced to assemble a parliament, a measure which, as she herself openly declared, she never entered, except when constrained by necessity. For, however, reconciled any one to the church of Rome, or was himself reconciled, it was declared by the act of parliament, that to say mass was subjected to the penalty of a year's imprisonment, and a fine of two hundred marks; the being present was punishable by a year's imprisonment, and a fine of one hundred marks. Elizabeth ordered a penalty a pound a day was imposed on every one who continued, during that time, absent from the church. To utter slanderous or seductive words against the queen was punishable, for the first offence, with the pillory and loss of ears; for the second offence was declared felony: the writing or printing of such words was felony even on the first offence. The puritans prevailed so far as to have further applications made for reformation in religion: and Paul Wentworth, brother to the member of that name who had distinguished himself in the preceding session, moved, That the Commons, from their own authority, should appoint a general fast and prayers: a motion, to which the House unwarily assented. The queen was very willing to pass these severe laws against the catholics, by some late discoveries of the treasonable practices of their priests. When the ancient worship was suppressed, and the Reformation introduced, for the unities, the king of Spain reflected, that as some species of literature was necessary for supporting these doctrines and controversies, the Romish communion must decay in England, if no means were found to give erudition to the ecclesiastics; and for this reason, he founded a seminary at Douay, where the catholics sent their children, chiefly such as were intended for the priesthood, in order to receive the rudiments of their education. The Cardinal of Lorraine imitated this example, by erecting a like seminary in his diocese of Cambrai; and from that time the Pope would not neglect to adorn, by a foundation of the same nature, that capital of orthodoxy. These seminaries, founded with so hostile an intention, sent over every year a colony of priests, who maintained the catholic superstition in its utmost vigor, as they were purchased with a view to the crown of martyrdom, were not deterred, either by danger or fatigue, from maintaining and propagating their principles. They infused into all their votaries an inveterate hatred of the Spaniards, and endeavored to persuade the queen, that it would be more prudent to desist from the enterprise, to punish Drake, and to restore the treasure. But Elizabeth, who admired valour, and was allured by the prospect of sharing in the booty, determined to counterfeit that gallant sailor: she conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and accepted of a banquet from him, at Deptford, on board the ship which he had achieved so memorable a voyage. When Philip's ambassador, Mendonza, exclaimed against Drake's piracies, she told him that the Spaniards, by arrogating a right to the whole New World, and excluding thence all other European nations, who should sail thither, even waying the conquest of the denomination of the most industrious and naturally tempted others to make a violent irruption into those countries. To pacify, however, the catholic monarch, she caused part of the booty to be restored to Pedro Sebastian, a Spaniard whom they had treated as a pirate for five years, and who was an honest merchant whom Drake had spoiled. Having learned afterwards, that Philip had seized the money, and had employed part of it against herself in Ireland, part of it in the pay of the Prince of Parma's troops, she determined to make no more restitutions.

The queen was very willing to pass these severe laws against the catholics, by some late discoveries of the treasonable practices of their priests. When the ancient worship was suppressed, and the Reformation introduced, for the unities, the king of Spain reflected, that as some species of literature was necessary for supporting these doctrines and controversies, the Romish communion must decay in England, if no means were found to give erudition to the ecclesiastics; and for this reason, he founded a seminary at Douay, where the might pursue, she never would depart from the principles of the Reformation.

The Duke of Alençon, now created Duke of Anjou, had never entirely dropped his claim to the hand of Elizabeth. He had, though her suitor was near twenty-five years younger than herself, and had no knowledge of her person but by pictures or descriptions, was still pleased with the image, which his addresses afforded her, of love and tenderness. This being the case, he resolved, before his departure, on his own accoutrements, by employing his brother's ambassador, sent over Simser, an agent of his own, an artful man, of an agreeable conversation; who, soon remarking the queen's humour, amused her topics, and opened to her the subject of the marriage, as a matter of course, but without the least apprehension, which she found, only awakened her ambition, and hurt his master's interest, be introduced every moment all the topics of passion and of gallantry. The pleasure which she found in this man's company, soon produced a familiarity between them; and amidst the greatest hurry of business, her most confidential ministers had not such ready access to her, as had Simser, who, on pretence of negotiation, entertained her with accounts of the tender attachment borne her by the Duke of Anjou. The Earl of Leicester, who had never before been alarmed with any courtship paid her, and who always trusted that her love of dominion would prevail over her inclination to marriage, being now apprehensive that she was last caught in her own snare, and that the artful encouragement which she had given to this young suitor, had, unaware, engaged her affections. To render Simser odious, he awaited himself of the progress of the times, and spread reports, that that minister had gained an ascendant over the queen, not by any natural principles of her constitution, but by incansations and love potions. Simser, in revenge, endeavoured to discredit Leicester with the queen; and he reviled to her a secret, which none of her courtiers dared to disclose, that this nabobler was secretly without her consent, married to the widow of the Earl of Essex; an action which he insinuated either to increase from her, of respect to her, or of the violation of her matrimonial attachments; and which so provoked her, that she threatened to send him to the Tower. The quarrel went so far between Leicester and the French agent, that the former was suspected of having employed one Tudor, a brave, to take away the life of his enemy; and the queen thought it necessary, by proclamation, to take Simser under her immediate protection. It happened, that while Elizabeth was rowing in her barge at the time, and surrounded by Simser's courtiers, a shot was fired which wounded one of the bargemen; but the queen, finding, upon inquiry, that the piece had been discharged by accident, gave the person who had fired the gun, the leave of going from her, without entertaining any suspicion against her people, that she was often heard to say, * That she would lend credit to railing against them, which parents would not believe of their children.

The Duke of Anjou, encouraged by the accounts sent him of the queen's possessions in his favour, paid her secretly a visit at Greenwich; and after some conference with her, the purport of which is not known, he departed. It appeared, that though his figure was not advantageous, he had lost no ground by being personally known to her; and soon after, she commanded Burleigh, now treasurer, Sussex, Leicester, Bedford, Lincoln, Hatton, and secretary Walsingham, to go to Westminster, to treat with the queen, in the terms of the intended contract of marriage. Henry had sent over, on this occasion, a splendid embassy, consisting of Francis de Bourbon, Prince Dauphin, and many considerable noblemen; and as the queen relished the power of pronouncing what terms she pleased, the articles were soon settled with the English commissioners. It was agreed that the marriage should be celebrated within six weeks after the ratification of the articles; and the duke and his retinue should have the exercise of their royalties; that after the marriage he should bear the title of King, but the administration remain solely in the queen; that their children, male or female, should succeed to the crown of England; that if there be two males, the elder, in case of Henry's death without issue, should be king of France, the younger of England; that if there be but one male, and he succeed to the crown of France, he should be obliged to reside in England eight months every two years; that the laws and customs of England should be preserved inviolate; and that no foreigner should be promoted by the duke to any great places of power. The queen agreed to this.

These articles, providing for the security of England, in case of its annexation to the crown of France, opened but a dismal prospect to the English, had not the age of Elizabeth, who was in the sixth year of her reign, proved her at every moment very much to allay their apprehensions of this nature. The queen, also, as a proof of her still remaining uncertainty, added a clause, that she was not bound to complete the marriage, till further articles, which were not specified, should be agreed on between the parties, and till the King of France be certified of this agreement. Soon after, the queen sent over Walsingham, as ambassador to France, in order to form closer connexions with Henry, and enter into a league, offensive and defensive, against the increasing power and dangerous usurpations of Spain. The French king, who had been extremely disturbed with the unquiet spirit, the restless ambition, the enterprising yet timid and insecure unquiet spirit, the restless ambition, the enterprising yet timid and insecure spirit, had soon after, been prevailed upon to set free the kingdom from his intrigues, by opening a scene for his activity in Flanders; and having allowed him to embrace the protection of the States, had secretly paid his respects to Elizabeth. The prospect of settling him in England was, for a like reason, very agreeable to that monarch; and he was desirous to cultivate, by every expedient, the favourable sentiments which she had entertained towards him. But this princess, though she had gone further in her amorous dalliance than could be justified or accounted for by any principles of policy, was not yet determined to carry matters to a further step. Henry in Walsingham, in his instructions, to negotiating conditions of a mutual alliance between France and England.1 Henry with reluctance submitted to hold conferences on that subject; but no sooner had Walsingham begun to settle the terms of alliance than he was informed of a preceding his speech, the queen, foreseeing hostility with Spain to be the result of this confederacy, had declared, that she would prefer the marriage with the war, before the war without the marriage.1 The French court, alarmed with the news of this resolution, broke off the conferences concerning the league, and opened a negotiation for the marriage. But matters had not long proceeded in this train, before the queen again declared, that she was lost in entertaining any suspicion against her people, that she was often heard to say, * That she would lend credit to railing against them, which parents would not believe of their children.

In the course of this affair, Elizabeth felt another variety of intentions, from a new contest between her reason and her ruling passions. The Duke of Anjou expected from her some money, by which he might be enabled to open his campaign, to which end he authorised his ministers to take the supply which she made her long reluctant, was sensible that this supply was necessary; and she was last induced, after much hesitation, to comply with his request. She gratified him a present of a small sum; and ordered Simser, her confidential minister, to which, joined to his own demesnes, and the assistance of his brother and the queen-dowager, he levied an army, and took the field against the Prince of Parma. He was successful in razing the siege of Cambray; and being closely pressed by the States governors of the Netherlands, he put his army into winter-quarters, and came over to England, in order to execute his suit to the queen. The reception which he met with made him expect entire success, and gave him hopes that Elizabeth had surmounted all scruples, and was finally determined to make choice of him for her husband. In the midst of the pomp which attended the anniversary of her coronation, she was seen, after long and intimate discourse with him, to take a ring from her own finger, and put it upon his; and all the spectators concluded, that in this ceremony, she had given him a promise of marriage, and was even desirous of signifying her intentions to all the world. Sir Aldegonde, ambassador from the States, despatched immediately a letter to his masters, informing them of this great event; and the inhabitants of Antwerp, who, as well as the other Flemings, regarded the queen as a kind of tutelary divinity, testified their joy by bonfires and the discharge of their great ordnance. A portion of his protestant subjects; and she could not be enticed. The Gulph in which England will be swallowed by the French marriage. He was apprehended and prosecuted, by order of the queen, and was condemned to lose his just, and lost all his landed property. Thus was the constancy and loyalty of the man, that immediately after the sentence was executed, he took off his hat with his other hand; and, waving it over his head, cried, "God save the queen." He was the only subject who, it appears, was attached to his Elizabeth to openly discovered to the Duke of Anjou, the combative her sentiments was not entirely over; and her ambition, as well as prudence, rousing itself by intervals, still found some determination. Almost all the courtiers whom she trusted and favoured, Leicester, Hatton, and Walsingham, discovered an extreme aversion to the marriage; and the ladies of her bed-chamber made no secret of opposing her resolves, with the most zealous remonstrance, among other enemies to the match, Sir Philip, son of Sir Henry Sidney, deputy of Ireland, and nephew to Leicester, a young man, the most accomplished of the age, declared himself; and he used the freedom to write her a letter, in which he expressed the present resolution, with an unusual elegance of expression, as well as force of reasoning. He told her, that the security of her government depended entirely on the cessation and defenceless protestants: that the catholics were her mortal enemies, and believed, either that she had originally usurped the crown, or was now lawfully depos'd by her subjects; and they were in such a situation, that she could not conduct their dangerous enterprises; and she herself was rashly supplying that defect, by giving an interest in the kingdom to a prince, whose education had naturally attached him to that communion; that though he was a stranger to the blood royal of England, the disposition of men were now such that they preferred the religious to the civil connexions; and were more influenced by legal and ecclesiastical opinions, than by the principles of legal and hereditary government: that the duke himself had discovered a very restless and turbulent spirit; and having often violated his loyalty to his elder brother and his sovereign, there remained no hope that he would preserve it. But without women, a woman, in quality of husband, think himself entitled to command: that the French nation, so populous, so much abounding in soldiers, so full of nobility, who were devoted in arms, and for some time accustomed to secure for plunder, would supply him with partisans, dangerous to a people unwarlike and defenceless, like the generality of her subjects: that the plain and honourable path which she had follow'd, but without the success of her people, had furnished rendered her reign secure and happy; and however her enemies might seem to multiply upon her, the same in-necessary to submit to the present necessity. He pretended an e intrusive acequiescence in the conduct of the commissioners; acknowledged the detention of his person to be acceptable to their grace, and agreed to summon both an assembly of the crown, and a convention of estates, in order to ratify that termination.

The assembly, though they had established it as an invulnerable right, that the king, on no account and under no pretense of evidence, could lose it, had of course made all matters made no scruple of taking civil affairs under their cognizance, and of deciding on this occasion, that the attempt of the conspirators was unacceptable to all that feared God, or tended to defend the government of the king and people, and perputious state of the realm. They even enjoined all the clergy to recommend these sentiments from the pulpit; and they threatened with ecclesiastical censures every man who should oppose the authority of the confederate lords.

The convention, being composed chiefly of these lords themselves, added their sanction to these proceedings.

Arran was confined a prisoner in his own house: Lenox, though he had power to resist, yet rather than raise a civil war, or be the cause of bloodshed, chose to retire into France, where he soon after died. He persevered in the last in the Protestant religion, to which James had converted him, but which the Scottish clergy could never settle or promote in the land. The king sent for his family, restored his son to his paternal honours and estate, took care to establish the fortunes of all his other children; and to his last moments never forgot the early friendship which he had borne their father: a strong proof of the sincerity of his professions.

No sooner was this revolution known in England, than the queen sent Sir Henry Cary and Sir Robert Bowes to James, in order to congratulate him on his deliverance from the pernicious counsels of Lenox and Arran; to exhort him not to resist the seeming violence committed on him by the confederate lords; and to procure from him permission for the return of the Earl of Angus, who, even so near his father, yet lived in England. They easily prevailed in procuring the recall of Angus; and as James suspected that Elizabeth had not been entirely unacquainted with the project of his detention, he thought proper before the English ambassadors to dissemble his resentment against the authors of it. Soon after, La Mothe-Fenelon and Menneville appeared as ambassadors from France: their errand was to inquire concerning the situation of the king, make proposals for his deliverance, in case he should voluntarily confirm the reconciliation with France, and procure an accommodation between James and the Queen of Scots. This last proposal gave great alarm to the clergy; and the assembly voted the king's admission to be in the most wicked uptight. The pulpits resounded with declarations against the French ambassadors; particularly Fenelon, whom they called the messenger of the bloody murders, meaning the Duke of Guise: and as that minister, being knight of the Holy Ghost, wore a white cross on his shoulder, they commonly denominated it, in contempt, the badge of antichrist. The king endeavoured, in though in vain, to repress these insolent reflections; but in order to make the ambassadors some compensation, he pressed them that the magistrates of Edinburgh to give them a splendid dinner before their departure. To prevent this entertainment, the clergy appointed that very day for a public fast; and finding that these orders were not regarded, they employed their sermons in thundering curses on the magistrates, who, by the king's direction, had put this mark of respect on the ambassadors. They even pursued them afterwards with the censures of the church; and it was with difficulty they were prevented from issuing the sentence of excommunication against them, on account of their submission to royal, preferable to clerical, authority.

What increased their alarm with regard to an accommodation between James and Mary was, that the English ambassadors seemed to concur with the French in this proposal; and the clergy were so ignorant as to believe the sincerity of the proposals made by the former. The Queen of Scots had often made overtures to Letter of Mary Elizabeth, which had been entirely neglected; but hearing of James's detention, she wrote a letter in a more pathetic and more spirited strain than usual; claiming the rights of the crown for herself and her son; and her liberty. She said, that the account of the prince's captivity had excited her most tender concern; and the experience which she herself, during so many years, had of the civility and lenity of her husband's situation, had made her the more apprehensive lest a like fate should pursue her unhappy offspring: that the long train of injustice which she had undergone, the calumnies to which she had been exposed, were so grievous, that finding no place for right or truth among men, she was reduced to make her last appeal to Heaven, the only competent tribunal between princes of equal jurisdiction, degree, and dignity; that after her rebellious subjects, secretly instigated by Elizabeth's ministers, had expelled her the throne, had confined her in prison, had pursued her with arms, she had voluntarily thrown herself under the protection of England; finally allowed by those reterritoried profession of amity which had been made her, and by her confidence in the generosity of a friend, an ally, and a kinswoman: that, not content with excluding her from her presence, with supporting the usurpers of her throne, with supporting the project of the treacherous murder of her brother; and though she had been constrained to Elizabeth had reduced her to a worse captivity than that from which she had escaped, and had made her this cruel return for the unlimited confidence which she had reposed in her: that though her restoration of such severe usage had never curbed the haughtiness of her confederates, and rather than the impediments their endeavors, had raised for her deliverance, unhappy for herself, and fatal to others, she found the rigours of confinement daily multiplied upon her, and at length carried to such a height, that it surpassed the bounds of all human patience, and no longer tolerable; therefore she now desired an end to endure them:

that she was cut off from all communication, not only with the rest of mankind, but with her only son; and her maternal fondness, which was now more enkindled by her complaints, and her fate in which she was confined, and was her sole remaining attachment to this world, deprived her of even of that melancholy solace which letters or messages could give: that the bitterness of her sorrows, still more than her close confinement, had preyed upon her health, and had added the insufferable weight of bodily infirmity to all those other calamities under which she laboured: that while the daily experience of her malignants opened to her the comfortable prospect of an infallibleness of their scheme, and the certainty of her sorrows being no more, her enemies envied her that last consolation; and, having secluded her from every joy on earth, had done what in them lay to debar her from all the comforts of her own heart, the true cause of her religion was refused her; the use of those sacred rites in which she had been educated; the commerce with those holy ministers whom Heaven had appointed to receive the acknowledgment of our progressions, and to seal our patience by a solemn re-admission into heavenly favour and forreness: that it was in vain to complain of the rigours of persecution exercised in other kingdoms, when a queen and an innocent woman was excluded from an indulgence which never yet, in the most barbarous countries, had been denied to the meannest and most obnoxious malefactor: that could she ever be induced to descend from that royal dignity in which protection she had lived, and which had been afforded her, she would have been content to return to Heaven, there was only one other tribunal to which she could appear from all her enemies; to the justice and humanity of Elizabeth's own breast, and to that lenity which, uninfluenced by malignant counsel, she would naturally be induced to exercise towards her; and that she finally incurred her to resume her natural disposition, and to reflect on the support, as well as comfort, which she might receive from her son and herself, if, joining the obligations of grata-tude to the times past, she would condescend to receive from their present melancholy situation, and reinduce them in that liberty and authority to which they were entitled:

Elizabeth was engaged to obstruct Mary's restoration, chiefly because she foresaw an unhappy alternative attending that event. If this princess recovered any considerable share of authority in Scotland, her resentment, ambition, zeal, and both triumph and terror possessed, might render her a dangerous neighbour to England, and enable her, after supressing the protestant party among her subjects, to revive those pretensions which she had formerly advanced to the crown, and which her partisans in both kingdoms continued to cherish with great industry and assurance. If she were reinstated in power with such strict limitations as could not be broken, she might be disgusted with her situation; and flying abroad, form more desperate attempts than any sovereign who has been known to leave the world would willingly undertake. Mary herself, sensible of these difficulties, convinced by experience that Elizabeth would ever dear her the throne, was now become more humble in her wishes; and as age and infirmities had repressed those sentiments of ambition by which she had formerly been so much actuated, she was willing to sacrifice all her hopes of grandeur in order to obtain a little liberty; a blessing to which she naturally aspired with the fondest impunity. She proposed therefore, that she should be associated with her son in the title to the crown of Scotland, but that the administration should remain solely in him: and she was content to live in England in a private station; ever aworthy a lover of her country in her confinement; but with some more liberty; both for exercise and company, than she had enjoyed since the first discovery of her intrigues with the Duke of Norfolk. But Elizabeth, afraid lest such a change of station would facilitate her escape into France or Spain, or at least would encourage and increase her partisans, and enable her to conduct those intrigues to which she had already discovered so strong a propensity, was secretly determined to deny her requests; and, though she seemed to assent to them, she well knew how to disappoint the expectations of the unhappy princess. While Lenox maintained his authority in Scotland, she ever gave every reply to all the applications by the Scotch queen; as present, when her own creatures had acquired possession of the government, she was resolved to throw the odium of refusal upon them; and pretending that nothing further was required to a perfect accommodation than the censure of the council of the state in Scotland, she ordered her ambassador, Bowes, to open the negotiation for Mary's liberty, and her association with her son in the title to the crown. Though she seemed to make this concession to Mary, she refused her the liberty of sending any ambassador of her own; and that princess could easily conjecture from this circumstance what would be the result of the pretended negotiation. The privy council of Scotland, instigated by the clergy, thought it would act against the interests of the nation; and kẻpt in their hands, affirmed that he had never agreed to an association with his mother, and that the matter had never gone further than some loose proposals for that purpose.

The affairs of Scotland remained not long in the present situation. James, impatient of restraint, made his escape from his keepers; and flying to St. Andrews, summoned his friends and partisans to attend him. The Earl of Argyll, Marshal, Montrose, and Ruthven, hastened to pay their duty to their sovereign; and the opposite party found themselves unable to resist so powerful a combination. They were offered a pardon upon their submission, and an acknowledgment of their fault in seizing the king's person, and restraining him from his liberty. Some of them accepted of the terms: the greater number, particularly Angus, Hamilton, Moray, Glamis, left the country, and took shelter in Ireland or England, where they were protected by Elizabeth. The Earl of Arran was recalled to court; and the malcontents, who could not brook the authority of Lenox, a man of virtue and moderation, found that they could not prevail. The Duke of Norfolk, with the hands of a person whose counsels were as violent as his manners were profligate. Elizabeth wrote a letter to James; in which she quoted a moral sentence from Isocrates, and indirectly reproached him with inconstancy, and a breach of his engagements. James, in his reply, justified his measures; and though the queen could not discover any new breach of the compact, she still proposed to proceed against her. She next sent Walsingham an embassy to him; and her chief purpose in employing that aged minister in an grand where so little business was to be transacted, was to learn, from a man of so much penetration and experience, whether she had been deceived by the young prince possessed good parts, though not accompanied with that vigour and industry which his station required; and as he excelled in general discourse and conversation, Walsingham entertained a higher opinion of his talents than he was afterwards found, when real business was transacted, to have fully merited. The account which he gave his mistress induced her to treat James thenceforward with some more regard than she had hitherto been inclined to pay him. The King of Scots, persevering in his present views, summoned a parliament; where it was enacted, that no clergyman should presume in his sermons to utter false, untrue, or scandalous speeches against the king, the council, or the public measures, or to meddle, in an improper manner, with the affairs of his majesty and the state. The clergy, feeling that the pulpit would be no longer a sanctuary for them, were exceedingly disturbed;. custody, on account of a letter which he had written to the Queen of Scots, and which was intercepted. Lord Puget and Charles Arundel, who had been engaged with him in treasonable designs, immediately withdrew beyond sea. The queen ordered a commission to be appointed for an investigation, and insurrection had been laid; and though, on his trial, he was desirous of retracting this confession, and imputing it to the fear of torture, he was found guilty, and executed. Meanwhile, the Spanish vessels, which had sailed and this conspiracy, was ordered to desert the kingdom; and Wade was sent into Spain to excuse his dismissal, and to desire the king to send another ambassador in his place: but Philip sent in the person of the cardinal of Bourbon as minister to his presence.

Crepisont, a Scottish Jesuit, coming over on board a vessel which was seized, tore some papers, with an intention of throwing them into the sea: but the wind blowing them back upon the ship, they were pieced together, and discovered some dangerous secrets.

Many of those conspiracies were, with great appearance of reason, imputed to the intrigues of the Queen of Scots; and as her name was employed in all of them, the council thought that they could not use too many precautions against the danger of her claims, and the restless activity of her temper. She was removed from under the care of the Earl of Shrewsbury, who, though vigilant and faithful in his duty, yet had not the power to prevent the occurrence of those attempts, particularly with regard to air and exercise: and she was committed to the custody of Sir Amias Paulet, and Sir Druc Drury; men of honour, but inexcusable in their care and attention. An association was also set on foot against her, and the peers of the realm. Elizabeth was beloved by the whole nation, except the more zealous catholics, men of all ranks willingly flocked to the subscription of it. The purport of this association was to defend the queen, to revenge her death, or any injury committed against her, and to exclude from the throne all claimants, what title soever they might possess, by whose suggestion, or for whose benefit, any violence should be offered to the queen, or any of her ministers: so that this association was levellied against her; and to remove all suspicion from herself, she also desired to subscribe it.

Elizabeth, that she might the more dis- A parliament, courage malcontents, by showing them the concurrence of the nation in her favour, summoned a new parliament; and she met with that dutiful attachment which she expected. The association was confirmed by parliament, and the House of Commons empowered to name commissioners for the trial of any pretender to the crown, who should attempt or imagine any invasion, insurrection, or assassination against her. Upon the trial of the Jesuits, the votes of the guilty person was excluded from all claim to the succession, and was further punishable as her majesty should direct. And for the greater security, a council of regency, in the case of the queen's violent death, was appointed to govern the kingdom, to settle the succession, and to take vengeance for that act of treason.

A severe law was also enacted against Jesuits and popish priests. It was ordained that they should depart the kingdom within forty days; that those who should remain beyond that time, or should afterwards return, should be guilty of treason; that those who harboured or relieved them should be guilty of felony; that those who were educated in seminaries, if they were added, by which the queen was instructed, within six months after notice given, and submitted not themselves to the queen, before a bishop, or two justices, should be guilty of treason; and that if any, so submitting themselves, should within ten years approach the court, or come within ten miles of it, their submission should be void. By this law, the exercise of the catholic religion, which had formerly been prohibited under lighter penalties, and which was in many instances connived at, was totally suppressed. In the subsequent part of the queen's reign, the law was sometimes executed by the capital punishment of priests; and though the partisans of that princess asserted that they were punished for their treason, not their religion, the apology must only be understood in this sense, that the law was enacted on account of the treason and attempts of the sect, not that every individual who suffered the penalty of the law was convicted of treason.

The catholics therefore might now with justice complain of a violent persecution, which we may safely affirm, in spite of the rigid and bigoted maxims of that age, not to be the best method of converting them, or of reconciling them to the established government and religion.

The parliament, disguised with those powers, granted her a supply of one subsidy and two fifteenths. The only circumstance in which their proceedings were disagreeable to her, was an application made by the Commons for a further reformation in ecclesiastical matters. Yet even this attempt, which affected her, as well as them, in a delicate point, they discovered how much they were overawed by her authority. The majority of the House were puritans, or inclined to that sect; but the severe reprimands which they had already, in former sessions, met with from the throne, deterred them from introducing any bill concerning religion; a proceeding which would have been interpreted as an encroachment on the prerogative, and were contrary to the doctrine of a humble petition, and that not addressed to her majesty, which would have given offence, but to the House of Lords, or rather the bishops, who had a seat in that House, and from whom alone the will of the people towards reformation was a strange departure from what we now apprehend to be the dignity of the Commons.

The Commons desired, in their humble petition, that no bishop should exercise his function of ordination but with the consent and concurrence of six presbyters; but this demand, as it really introduced a change of ecclesiastical government, was firmly rejected by the prelates. They desired that no clergyman should be instituted into any benefice without previous notice being given to the parish, that they might examine whether there lay any objection to his life or doctrine: an attempt towards a popular model, which naturally met with the same fate. In another article of that petition, they prayed that the bishops should not insist upon every ceremony, or deprive incumbents for omitting part of the service; as if uniformity in public worship had not been established by law; or as if the prelates had been endowed with a dispensing power. They complained of abuses which prevailed in public worship, the sentence of excommunication, and they entreated the reverend fathers to think of some law for the remedy of these abuses; implying, that those matters were too high for the Commons, to be more intrusted with them.

But the most material article which the Commons touched upon in their petition, was the court of ecclesiastical comission, and the oath ex officio, as it was called, exacted by that court. This is a subject of such importance as to merit some explanation.

The first primate after the queen's access- The ecclesias- was Parker; a man rigid in exacting tical court. conformity to the established worship, and in punishing, by fine or deprivation, all the puritanical clergymen who attempted to innovate any thing in the habits, ceremonies, or liturgy of the church. He died in 1579; and was succeeded by Grindal, who, as he himself was inclined to Rome, in some measure did much difficulty brought to execute the laws against them, or to punish the nonconforming clergy. He declined obeying the queen's orders for the suppression of propellas, or the assemblies of the seclots in private houses, which she apprehended had become so many academies of fanaticism; and for this offence she had, by an order of the star-chamber, sequestered him from his archepiscopcal function, and confined him to his own house. Upon his death, which happened in 1583, she determined not to put into the same error in her next choice; and she named Whitgift, a zealous churchman, who had already signalized his pen in controversy, and who, having in vain attempted to convince the puritans by argument, was now resolved to open their eyes by power, and by the execution of penal statutes. He informed the queen that all the spiritual authority lodged in the prelates was insignificant without the sanction of the crown; and as there was no ecclesiastical law to that effect in force, he engaged her to issue a new one, more arbitrary than any of the former, and conveying more unlimited authority. She appointed forty-four commissioners, twelve of whom were ecclesiastics; and for three-quarters of the jurisdiction of the court extended over the whole kingdom and over all orders of men; and every circumstance of its authority, and all its methods of proceeding, were contrary to the clearest principles of law and natural equity. The commissioners were empowered to visit and reform all errors, heresies, schisms, in a word, to regulate all opinions, as well as to punish all breach of uniformity in the exercise of public worship. They were directed to make inquiry, not only by the legal methods of jurisprudence and witnesses, but by all other means and ways which they could devise; that is, by the rack, by torture, by inquisition, by imprisonment. Where they found reason to suspect that any might admittance to him or any power called ex officio, by which he was bound to answer all questions, and might thereby be obliged to accuse himself or his most intimate friend. The fines which they levied, with the confiscation of the properties of the offender, contrary to the established laws of the kingdom. The imprisonment to which they condemning any delinquency was limited by no rule but their own pleasure. They assumed a power of imposing on the sovereign, without incurring the anger of their majesty, any new articles of subscription, and consequently of faith, they thought proper. Though all other spiritual courts were subject, since the Reformation, to penalties from the supreme courts of law, the ecclesiastical commissioners were exempted from that regard to the laws which was essential to no control. And the more to enlarge their authority, they were empowered to punish all incents, adulteries, fornications; all outrages, misbehaviour, and disorders in marriage; and the punishments which they might inflict, were according to their wisdom, conscience, and discretion.

In a word, this court was a real inquisition; attended with all the iniquities, as well as cruelties, inseparable from that tribunal. For in the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical court was destructive of all law, so its erection was deemed by many a mere usurpation of this impertinent princess; and she had no other foundation than a clandestine agreement with the queen, and the sovereign strength of the Cæsars, to empower the sovereign to appoint commissioners, for exercising that prerogative. But prerogative in general, especially the supremacy, was supposed in that age to involve powers which no law, precedent, or reason, could limit and determine.

But though the Commons, in their humble petition to the prelates, had touched so gently and submissively on the ecclesiastical grievances, the queen, in a speech from the throne at the end of the session, could not forbear taking notice of their presumption, and reproving them for those murmurs, which, for fear of offending her, they had pronounced so low, as not directly to reach her royal ears. And giving them some general thanks for their attachment to her, and making professions of affection to her subjects, she told them, that whoever found fault with the church, threw a slander upon her; since she was appointed by God for her end, and whoever spoke against her could prevail in the kingdom but by her permission and negligence that some abuses must necessarily have place in every thing; but she warned the prelates to be watchful; for if she found them careless of their charge, she would not fail to disapprove of them; and had not been supposed to have employed herself in many studies, particularly philosophical, (by which I suppose she meant theological,) and she would confess that few, whose leisure had not allowed them to make profession of science, had read or reflected more: that as she could discern the presumption of many, in curiously canvassing the Scriptures, and starting innovations, she would no longer endure this licentiousness; but meant to guide her people, by God's rule, in the just mean between the corruptions of Rome, and the errors of modern sectaries; and as that the Romish were the invertebrate enemies of her person, and so of her government, she would to the utmost, to the death, resist all her career; and under the colour of preaching the word of God, presumed to exercise their private judgment, and to renew the actions of the prince.

From a practice of this government, the judgment we may observe, that the Commons, in making their general application to the prelates, as well as in some particular articles of their petition, showed themselves wholly ignorant, no less than the queen, of the principles of liberty, and a legal constitution. And it may not be unworthy of remark, that Elizabeth, so far from yielding to the displeasure of the parliament against the ecclesiastical commission, granted, before the end of her reign, a new commission; in which she enlarged, rather than restrained, the powers of the commissioners.

During this session of parliament there was discovered a conspiracy, which much increased the general animosity against the catholics, and still further widened the breach between them and their countrymen. Flavio Farnese, a gentleman, had received the queen's pardon for a crime, by which he was exposed to capital punishment; and, having obtained permission to travel, he retired to Milan, and made a projected attempt to invade Spain, which was conceived while he remained in England. He was here persuaded by Palma, a jesuit, that he could not perform a more meritorious action than to take away the life of his sovereign and benefactress; and two of his partizans, Lampeggio, when consulted, approved extremely of this pious undertaking; and Parry, though still agitated with doubts, came in Paris, with an intention of passing over to England, and executing his bloody purpose. He was here encouraged to proceed, and was admitted to the confidential conversation of the court; and though Watts and some other catholic priests told him that the enterprise was criminal and impious, he preferred the authority of Hagezzam, the nuncio at Paris, and determined to persist in his resolution. He here wrote a letter to the Pope, which was conveyed to cardinal Como; he communicated his intention to the holy father; and craved his absolution and papal benediction. He received an answer from the cardinal, by which he found that his purpose was extremely applauded; and he came over to England with a full design of carrying it into execution. So deeply are the sentiments of the English on these occasions imprinted on their minds, that it is difficult even for the prejudices of false religion totally to efface them; and this bugbod assassin resolved, before he came to extremities, to try every other expedient for alleviating the persecutions under which the catholics at that time laboured. He found means of being introduced to the queen; assured her that many conspiracies were formed against her; and exhorted her, as she tendered her life, to give the Romish some more indulgence in the exercise of their religion; but, lest he should be tempted, by the opportunity, to assassinate her, he always came to court unprovided with every offensive weapon.

He even found means to be elected member of parliament, and had a public defense of the remonstrances of the commoners, and of the laws enacted last session, was committed to custody for his freedom, and sequestered from the house. His failure in these attempts confirmed him the more in his former resolve; and, his letters and speeches being again supposed to have employed herself in many studies, particularly philosophical, (by which I suppose she meant theological,) and she would confess that few, whose leisure agreeable, as they imagined, to the will of God and to true religion. But while they were watching an opportunity for the execution of their purpose, the Earl of Westmoreland happened to die in exile; and as Nevil was next heir to that family, he began to entertain hopes, that by doing some acceptable service to the queen, he might recover the estate and honours, which had been forfeited by the rebellion of the last earl. He betrayed the whole conspiracy to the queen; and was, in the presence of the queen, confessed the guilt, both to them and to the jury who tried him. The letter from Cardinal Como, being produced in court, put Parry's narrative beyond all question; and his recent sentence of death, suffered the punishment which the law appointed for his treasonable conspiracy.

These bloody designs now appeared everywhere as the result of that blighted spirit by which the two religions, especially the catholic, at this time actuated. Somers- ville, a gentleman of the county of Warwick, somewhat disordered in his understanding, had heard so much of the merit attaching the assassination of heretics and persecutors, that he came to London with a view of murdering the queen; but having betrayed his design by some extravagances, he was thrown into prison, and there punished by a voluntary death. About the same month Parry, a man of revising from the English to the Spanish tongue, took and executed the same design against the Prince of Orange; and that great man perished at Delft, by the hands of a desperate assassin, who, with a resolution exceeding all his own measures, resolved to end his life, in order to destroy the famous restorer and protector of religious liberty. The Flemings, who regarded that prince as their father, were filled with great sorrow, as well when they considered the miserable end of so brave a patriot, as their own infant independence of so powerful and prudent a leader, and from the rapid progress of the Spanish arms. The Prince of Parma had made every just great advances upon them, had reduced several of their strong places, and was at the very point of the Antwerp, the richest and most populous city of the Netherlands, whose subjection, it was foreseen, would give a mortal blow to the already declining affairs of the revolted province. The only hopes which remained to them arose from the prospect of foreign succour. Being well acquainted with the cautious and frugal maxims of Elizabeth, they expected better success in France; and, in the view of engaging Henry to retrieve their disasters, they tendered him the sovereignty of their provinces. But the present condition of that monarchy obliged the king to reject so advantageous an offer. The Duke of Anjou's death, which he thought would have tended to make France more a warlike nation, diverging him from the intrigues of that prince, plunged him into the deepest distress; and the King of Navarre, approved huguenot, being next heir to the crown, the Duke of Guise took occasion to revive the catholic league, and to urge Henry, by the most violent expedients, to seek the exclusion of that brave and virtuous prince. Henry himself, though a zealous catholic, yet, because he declined complying with their precipitate measures, became an object of aversion to the league; and as his zeal, in pretesting all the superstitious observances of the Roman church, was accompanied with a very licentious conduct in private life, he was not considered as the contradiction to universal experience, embraced thence the pretext of representing his devotion as more decent and hypocritical. Finding his authority to decline, he was obliged to decline war against the huguenots, and to put arms into the hands of the league, whom, both on account of their dangerous pretensions at home, and their close alliance with Philip, he secretly regarded as his most dangerous enemies. Constrained by the same policy, he dreaded the danger of associating himself with the Protestant Council, and determined to depart secretly beyond sea, but was discovered and thrown into the Tower. In 1567, this villain was brought to his trial for high treason, chiefly because of his conspiracy against the delivery of the Queen of Scots. He was thrown into the Tower, and being brought to the scaffold, he confessed his guilt, and died with a groan. About the same time the Earl of Arundel, one of the leading agents of theesy, was executed. The French ambassador would probably have prosecuted him, but he freed himself from this danger by concealing his guilt, and then having secret communications with the queen, he sent her a message with a plot. sive of the consequences attending each extreme, was inclined to steer a middle course; and though such conduct is seldom prudent, she was not, in this resolution, guided by any prejudice or mistaken affection. She was determined not to permit, without opposition, the total subjection of the revolted provinces, whose interests she deemed so closely connected with her own: but foreseeing what the prince would require of her to employ her whole force in their defence, would give umbrage to her neighbours, and would expose her to the reproach of ambition and usurpation, imputations which hitherto she had carefully avoided, she immediately rejected this offer. She concluded a truce with the States on the following conditions: that she should send over an army to their assistance, of five thousand foot and a thousand horse, and pay them during the war; that the general, and two others, whom she should appoint, should be admitted into the council of the States; that neither party should make peace without the consent of the other: that her expenses should be refunded after the conclusion of the war; and that the towns of Flushing and the Bërle, with the castle of Hammekins, should in the mean time be consigned into her hands, by way of security. The queen knew that this measure would immediately enable her in open hostilities with Philip; yet was not she terrified with the view of the present greatness of that monarch. The continent of Spain was at that time rich and populous; and the late addition of Portugal, besides securing internal tranquillity, had annexed an opulent kingdom. Philip’s possessions, however, had many settlements in the East Indies, and of the whole commerce of those regions, and had much increased his naval power, in which he was before deficient. At that period of Italy, even the Pope and the court of Rome, were reduced to a kind of subjection under him, and seemed to possess their sovereignty on terms somewhat precarious. The Austrian branch in Germany, with the states of the empire, was involved in the same unequal struggle; and the care of his riches the more formidable and extensive. The Netherlands seemed on the point of relapsing into servitude; and small hopes were entertained of their withstanding those numerous and veteran armies which, under the command of the most experienced generals, were employed against them. Even France, which was wont to counterbalance the Austrian greatness, had lost all her force from intestine commotions; and as the catholics, the ruling party, were not so entirely connected with him as expected thence an augmentation than a diminution of his power. Upon the whole, such prepossessions were every where entertained concerning the force of the Spanish monarchy, that the King of Sweden, when he heard that Elizabeth had openly embraced the defence of the revolted Flemings, scrupled not to say, that she had now taken the diadem from her head, and had adventured it upon the doubtful chance of war. Yet was this princess rather cautious than enterprising in her natural temper: she ever needed more to be impelled by the vigour, than restrained by the prudence, of her ministers: but when she saw an evident necessity, she braved danger with magnanimous courage; and trusting to her own consummate wisdom, and to the affections, however divided, of her people, she prepared herself to resist and even to assault the. Heavo force of the Catholic monarch. The Earl of Leicester was sent over to Holland, at the head of the English auxiliary forces. He carried with him a splendid retinue; being accompanied by the young Earl of Essex, his son-in-law, the Lords Audley and Norris, Sir William Ruston, Sir John Devereaux, Sir John Haste, Sir Walter Waller, Sir Gervase Chilton, and a select troop of five hundred gentlemen. He was received, on his arrival at Flushing, by his nephew Sir Philip Sidney, governor, and which he passed expressed their joy by acclamations and triumphal arches, as if his presence and the queen’s pro-attempt raising the siege, endeavoured to draw off the Prince of Parma by forming another enterprise. He first sent a Dutchman, then a Frenchman, to discourse with the Prince before Zouammen, which the Spanish general thought so important a fortress that he hastened to his relief. He made the Marquis of Guasto advance with a convoy, which he intended to throw into the place. They were favoured by a very proper foresight. The place was taken through a furious action ensued, in which the Spaniards were worsted, and the Marquis of Gonzaga, an Italian nobleman of great reputation and family, was slain. The pursuit was stopped by the advance of the Prince of Parma with the main body of the Spanish army; and the English cavalry, on their return from the field, found their advantage more than compensated by the loss of Sir Philip Sidney, who, being mortally wounded in the action, was carried off by the soldiers, and soon after died. This person is described by the writers of that age as the most perfect model of an accomplished gentleman that could be formed even by the wanton imagination of poetry or fiction. A virtuous conduct, polite conversation, heroic valour, and elegant erudition, all concurring to render him the ornament and delight of the English court; and as the credit which he possessed with the queen and the Earl of Leicester, and the singular genius and literature, his praises have been transmitted with advantage to posterity. No person was so low as not to become an object of his humanity. After this last action, while he was being seated, he was struck with wounds, a bottle of water was brought him to relieve his thirst; but, observing a soldier near him in a like miserable condition, he said, "This man's necessity is still greater than mine; and resigned to him the bottle of water. The hero of Scots, struck with admiration of Sidney's virtue, celebrated his memory in a copy of Latin verses, which he composed on the death of that young hero.

The English, though a long peace had deprived them of all need and occasion of possessing of military genius; and the advantages gained by the Prince of Parma were not attributed to the superior bravery and discipline of the Spaniards, but solely to the want of military abilities in Leicester. The States were much discontented with his management of the war; still more with his arbitrary and impetuous conduct, and at the end of the campaign they applied to him for a redress of all their grievances. But Leicester, without giving them any satisfaction, departed soon after for England. 8

The queen, while she provoked so powerful an enemy as the King of Spain, was not forgetful to secure herself on the side of Scotland; and she endeavoured both to cut off the possession of military genius; and to remove all grounds of quarrel between them. An attempt which she had made some time before was not well calculated to gain the confidence of that prince. She had dispatched Wotton, English ambassador in Scotland; but though she gave him private instructions with regard to her affairs, she informed James that when she had any political business to discuss with him, she would employ another minister; that this man was not fitted for serious negotiations; and that her chief purpose in sending him was to entertain the king with witty and facetious conversation, and to partake, without reserve, of his pleasures and amusements. Wotton was master of profound disimulation, and knew how to cover, under the appearance of a careless gaiety, the deepest designs and most dangerous artifices. When but a youth of twenty, he had been employed by his uncle, Dr. Wotton, ambassador in France, during the reign of Mary, to interest the constable, Montmorency; and had not his purpose been frustrated by pure accident, his cunning had prevailed over all the caution and experience of that aged minister. It is no wonder, that after years had improved him in all the arts of decent, he should gain an ascendant over a young prince of so open and unguarded a temper as James; especially when the queen's recommendation prepared the way for him. He was at first admitted into all the pleasures of the king; made himself master of his secrets; and had so much the more authority with him in political

The Scottish ministers, who observed the growing intimacy of the two princes, were now more confident to procure his friendship; and scrupled not to sacrifice to his intrigues the most essential interests of their master. Elizabeth's usual jealousy with regard to her heirs, began now to be levelled against James; and as that prince had attained the years proper for a suit to be made, and had been formed in the arts of being strengthened with children and alliances, he should acquire the greater interest and authority with her English subjects. She directed Wotton to form a secret concert with some Scottish noblemen, and to procure their pre-courage which fell on Jeroboam, that he should die childless, and be the last of his race.

The secretory, Thurston, perceiving the king so much moved by the circumstantial affairs, and with the refractory disposition of the clergy, advised him to leave them to their own courses; for that in a short time they would become so intolerable, that the people would rise against them with generocity; resentment of this usage had pushed Mary into enterprises which had nearly threatened the repos and authority of Elizabeth: the rigour and restraint, therefore redoubled on the captive queen; still impelled his utmost strength to press against greater extremities, to humble and abase her while her in- patience of captivity increased. A. D. 1586: The dangers which arose from the character and policies, and the interests of the Queen of Scots, had very early engaged Elizabeth to consult, in her treatment of that unfortunate princess, the dictates of jealousy and politics, rather than of friendship or generosity: resentment of this usage had pushed Mary into enterprises which had nearly threatened the repos and authority of Elizabeth: the rigour and restraint, therefore redoubled on the captive queen; still impelled his utmost strength to press against greater extremities, to humble and abase her while her in- patience of captivity increased. This was a concurrence with religious zeal, and the suggestions of desperate bigot, she was at last engaged in designs which afforded her enemies, who watched the opportunity, a pretence or reason for effecting her final ruin.

The English senate at Rheims had brought themselves up to a bough pitch of rage and animosity against the queen. The recent persecu- tions from which they had escaped; the new rigours which they knew awaited them in the course of theire missions; the liberty, which at present they enjoyed, of declaiming against that princess; and the contagion of that example to which every one succumbed them France: all these causes had obviated with them every maxim of common sense, and every principle of morals or humanity. Intoxicated with admiration of the divine and hereditary infallibility of the Pope, they revolved his will, by which each was commanded and exhorted; and some of them had gone to that height of extravagance as to assert, that that performance had been immediately dictated by the Holy Ghost. honour to devote himself entirely to the service of that unfortunate princess. During some time, he had found means of conveying to her all her foreign correspondence; but after she was put under the custody of Sir Anne Paulet, and reduced to a more rigorous confinement, he experienced so much difficulty and danger in rendering her this service, that he had desisted from every attempt of that nature.

When Ballard began to open his intentions to Babington, he found his zeal suspended, not extinguished: his former ardour revived on the mention of any enterprise which seemed to promise success in the cause of Mary and of the catholic religion. He had entertained sentiments consistent with those of his master, and knew the folly of all attempts which, during the lifetime of Elizabeth, could be formed against the established religion and government of England. Ballard, encouraged by this hint, proceeded to discover to him the design undertaken by Savage; and was well pleased to observe, that instead of being shocked with the project, Babington only thought it not secure enough, when intrusted to one single hand, and proposed to join five others with Savage in this desperate enterprise.

In prosecution of these views, Babington employed himself in increasing the number of his associates; and he secretly drew into the conspiracy many catholic gentlemen, discontented with the government or his inordinate schemes. There was a noble family in Ireland, Charnoe, a gentleman of Lancashire, and Abington, whose father had been coherer to the household, readily undertook the assassination of the queen. Daniel Tinley, the heir of an ancient family, and Tielbourne, of Southampton, when the design was proposed to them, expressed some scruples, which were removed by the arguments of Babington and Ballard. Savage alone refused, during some time, to share the glory of the enterprise with any others; he challenged the whole to himself; and it was with some difficulty he was induced to depart from this propterous ambition.

The means proposed for the escape of the princess at the very same instant when Elizabeth should be assassinated, was requisite for effecting the purpose of the conspirators; and Babington undertook, with a party of a hundred horse, to attack her guards while she should be taking the air on horseback. In this enterprise he engaged Edward Wendum, brother to the lord of that name, Thomas Salisbury, Robert Gage, John Travers, John Jones, and Henry Donne; most of them men of family and interest. The conspirators, who desired, but could not find, any nobleman of note whom they might place at the head of the enterprise; but they trusted that the great events of the queen's death and Mary's deliverance, would reassure all the scruples which this scheme excited; and that, by taking advantage of the general confusion, would easily fix the Queen of Scots on the throne, and re-establish the ancient religion.

Some desperate projects had not escaped the vigilance of Elizabeth's council, particularly of Walsingham, secretary of state. That arful minister had engaged Maud, a catholic priest, whom he retained in pay, to attend Ballard in his journey to France, and had thereby got a hint of the designs entertained by the fugitives. Poly, another of his spies, had found means to instigate himself among the conspirators in England; and though not entirely trusted, had obtained some insight into their dangerous secrets. But the bottom of her apprehension and concurrence. For this service they employed Gifford, who immediately applied to Walsingham, that the interest of this minister might forward his secret correspondence with Mary. Walsingham proposed the matter to Paulet, and desired him to convey at Gifford's corrupting one of his servants; but Paulet, averse to the introduction of such a pernicious precedent into his family, desired that they would rather think of some other expedient. Gifford found a broker, who supplied the family with goods; and brought letters to convey letters to the captive queen. The letters, by Paulet's contrivance, were thrust through a chink in the wall; and answers were returned by the same conveyance.

Ballard and Babington were at the beginning of Gifford's fidelity; and to make trial of him, they gave him only blank papers made up like letters: but finding by the answers that these had been faithfully delivered, they laid aside all further scruple, and conveyed by his hands the most dangerous secrets of Babington. Babington informed Mary of the design laid for a foreign invasion, the plan of an insurrection at home, the scheme for her deliverance, and the conspiracy for assassinating the emperor by six noble gentlemen, as he termed them, all of them his private friends; who from the zeal which they bore to the catholic cause, and her majesty's service, would undertake the tragic execution. Mary replied, that she approved highly of the design; that the gentlemen might expect all the rewards which it should ever be in her power to confer; and that the death of Elizabeth was a necessary circumstance, before any attempts were made, either for her own deliverance or for the establishment of her. Mendoza, Charles Paget, the Archbishop of Glasgow, and Sir Francis Inglefield, were carried by Gifford to secretary Walsingham, were deciphered by the art of Philips, his master of the rolls, Charles Walsingham, and another artifice in order to obtain full insight into the plot: he subjoined to a letter of Mary's a postscript in the same cipher, in which he made her desire Babington to inform her of the names of the conspirators. The un- discretion of Babington furnished Walsingham with still another means of detection, as well as of defence. That gentleman had caused a picture to be drawn, where be represented himself, with the motto, "to the king, and a motto was subjoined, expressing that their common perils were the bond of their confedency. A copy of this picture was brought to Elizabeth, that she might know the assassins, and guard herself against their approach to her person.

Meanwhile, Babington, anxious to insure and hasten the foreign succours, resolved to despatch Ballard into France; and he procured for him, under a forged name, a licence to travel in order to remove from himself all suspicion, to be applied to Walsingham, pretended great zeal for the queen's service, offered to go abroad, and professed his intentions of employing the confidence which he had gained among the French to induce them to take the part of the conspirators. Walsingham commended his loyal purposes; and promising his own counsel and assistance in the execution of them, still fed him with hopes, and maintained a close correspondence with him. A warrant, meanwhile, was issued for seizing Ballard; and this incident, joined to the consciousness of guilt, begat in all the conspirators the utmost anxiety and concern. Some advised that they should immediately make their escape: others proposed that Savage and Charnoe should without delay execute their purpose against Elizabeth; and Babington, in prosecution of this scheme, furnished Savage with money, that he might buy good clothes, and travel in order to remove from himself that great fear. Ballard, to soon discovered and thrown into prison. In second and seize their examinations, they contradicted each other; and the leaders were obliged to make a full confession of the truth. Fourteen were condemned and executed; of whom seven acknowledged the crime on their trial; the rest were convicted by evidence.

September. The lesser conspirators being despatched, measures were taken for the trial and conviction of those of whom nothing was known and whose innocence these attempts had been made against the life of the queen, and the tranquillity of the kingdom. Some of Elizabeth's councillors were averse to this procedure; and thought that the close confinement of a woman, such as Mary, was declared; but the heir of blood, to whom the people in general were likely to adhere, was, by education, an enemy to the national religion; if, from another provenance, to an enemy to the ministers, and principal nobility; and their personal safety, as well as the safety of the state, seemed to depend alone on the queen's life, who was now somewhat advanced in years. No wonder, therefore, that Elizabeth's councillors, knowing themselves to be so obnoxious a subject of suspicion to the English people, determined to punish every adverse action to extremities against her, and were even more anxious to the queen herself, to prevent her from ever mounting the throne of England.

Though all was hitherto very quietly; the suspicion, and with the detection of Babington's conspiracy, every avenue to the Queen of Scots had been so strictly guarded, that she remained in utter ignorance of the matter; and it was a great surprise to her, when Sir Thomas Gorges, by Elizabeth's orders, informed her, that all her accomplices were discovered and arrested. He chose the time for giving her this intelligence when she was mounted on horseback to go a hunting; and she was not permitted to return to her former place of abode, but was conducted from one gentleman's house to another, till she was lodged in Fotheringay castle in the county of Northampton, which it was determined to make the last stage of her trial and sufferings. The next night, not Mary, but a Scot, were immediately arrested: all her papers were searched, and sent up to the council: above sixty different keys to ciphers were discovered; there were also found many letters from persons beyond seas, and several too from English noblemen, containing expressions of respect and attachment. The queen took no notice of this latter discovery; but the persons themselves, knowing their correspondence to be detected, thought that they had no other means of making atonement for their imprudence, than by declaring themselves therefor the most inveterate enemies of the Queen of Scots.

It was resolved that Mary, not by the law of Scots, which had passed the former year with a view to this very event; and the queen, in terms of that act, appointed a commission, consisting of forty noblemen and privy councillors, and empowered them to examine and pass sentence on Mary, whom they denounced the late queen of Scots, and heir to James V. of Scotland. The commissioners came to Fotheringay castle, and sent to the Earl of Northumberland, the earl's brother, and Edward Barker, who delivered her a letter from Elizabeth, informing her of the commission, and of the approaching trial. Mary received the intelligence without emotion or astonishment. She said, however, that it seemed strange to her, that the queen should command her, as a subject, to submit to a trial and examination before subjects: that she was an absolute independent princess, and would yield to nothing which might derogate from her royal majesty, from the state of sovereign princes, or from the dignity and rank of her son; that, however oppressed by misfortunes, she was not yet so much broken in spirit as to make her enemies flattered themselves; nor would she, on any account, be accessible to her of her degradation and dishonour: that she was ignorant of the laws and statutes of England; was utterly destitute of counsel; and could not conceive who were entrailed to be called her peers, or could legally sit as judges on her trial; that though she had lived in England for many years, she was a stranger to all the customs and manners of the people, and not having received the protection of the laws, she could not, merely by her involuntary residence in the country, be supposed to have subjected herself to their jurisdiction; that notwithstanding the superiority of her majesty, she was willing to give an account of her conduct before an English parliament; but could not view these commissioners in any other light than as men appointed to justify, by some colour of legal proceeding, her condemnation and execution; and that she warned them to look to their conscience and character in trying an innocent person; and to reflect, that these transactions would some day be opened before the Lord; that the court of all the world was much wider than the kingdom of England. In return, the commissioners sent a new deputation, informing her that her plea, either from her royal dignity, or from her imprisonment, could not avail to proceed to her trial, even though she should refuse to answer before them. Burleigh, the treasurer, and Bromley, the chancellor, employed much reason to make a prevalent on her submission: and the queen was informed that she had the chief influence, was Sir Christopher Hatton, vice-chamberlain. His speech was to this purpose: "You are accused, Madam, said he, "but not condemned by the sentence of any jury. We have no right to proceed to your trial, unless you have confessed your guilt and been tried by the common law. In these cases, which have been committed, the jury may not be the same persons, either by the law of nature or of nations, is exempt from jurisdiction. If you be innocent, you wrong your reputation in avoiding a trial. We have been present at your testimonies of innocence; but Queen Elizabeth thinks otherwise; and is heartily sorry for your appearances. She against whom the former court condemned, she appointed commissioners; honourable persons, and upright men, who are ready to hear you with equity, and even with favour, and will rejoice if you can clear yourself of your misfortune. The court which found you guilty, believe me, Madam, the queen herself will rejoice, who affirmed to me at my departure, that nothing which ever befell her had given her so much uneasiness, as that you should be suspected of a concurrence in these criminal enterprises. Laying aside, therefore, the fruitless claim of privilege from your royal dignity, which can now avail you nothing, trust to the better defence of your innocence, make it appear in open trial, and leave not upon your memory that stain of infamy which must attend your utmost silence on this occasion."

By this artful speech Mary was persuaded to answer before the court; and there, thereby gave an account of the proceeding of the trial, and prevented those difficulties which the commissioners must have fallen into, had she persevered in maintaining so specious a plea as that of her sovereign and independent character. Her conduct in this particular must be regarded as the more imprudent, because formerly, when Elizabeth's commissioners pretended not to exercise any jurisdiction over her, and only entered into her cause by her own consent and approbation, she declined subject to review, when the court of the uode to have been dearer to her than life, seemed absolutely to require it. On her first appearance before the commissioners, Mary, either sensible of her infirmities, prudence, or still unwilling to degrade herself by submitting, ting to a trial, renewed her protestation against the authority of her judges; she answered her by pleading the supreme authority of the English laws over every other thing, and that the King had no power to acquit or condemn her, or to accommodate matters by ordering both her protestation and his answer to be recorded.

The lawyers of the crown then opened the charge against the Queen, and produced some intercepted letters, which she had allowed Cardinal Allen and others to treat her as Queen of England; and that she had kept a corresponding correspondence and kept several letters with them, which seemed not anxious to clear herself from either of these imputations. She only said, that she could not hinder others from using what style they pleased in writing to her, and she might lawfully try every expedient for the recovery of her liberty.

An intercepted letter of hers to Mendes was next produced; in which she promised to transfer to Philip her right to the kingdom of England, if her son should refuse to be converted to the catholic faith, and made, so said, of which there was no expectation, while he remained in the hands of his Scottish subjects. Even this part of the charge she took no pains to deny, or rather she seemed to think that the charge was so evident that it might be disposed of; yet it was lawful for her to give at her pleasure what was her own, and she was not accountable to any for her actions. She asked, that she had formed resolutions that had been as vain as her hopes in England were gone, she was fully determined not to refuse foreign assistance. There was also produced evidence to prove, that Allen and Parsons were at that very time engaged in the correspondence and conditions of transferring her English crown to the King of Spain, and of disinheriting her heretical son. It is remarkable, that Mary's prejudices against her son were such, that she never thought that she had entered into a conspiracy against him, had appointed Lord Claud Hamilton Regent of Scotland, and had instigated her adherents to seize James's person, and deliver him into the hands of the Pope, and the King of Spain; whence he was never to be delivered, but on condition of his becoming catholic.

The only part of the charge which Mary positively denied, was her concurrence in the design of assassinating Elizabeth. This was the only one out of all the people, and the only one that could fully justify the queen in proceeding to extremities against her. In order to prove the accusation, there were produced the following evidence: collation of the intercepted letters; four intercepted letters between her and Buckingham, in which her approbation of the murder was clearly expressed; the evidence of two secretaries Nau and Curle, who had confessed without any torture, both that she received these letters from Buckingham, and that they had written the answers by her order; the confession of Buckingham, that he had written the letters and received the answers, and the confession of Ballard and Savage, that they had delivered them to the King of Spain; the letters of Nau, and the documents and papers in the cypher which had been settled between them.

It is evident that this complication of evidence, though every circumstance corroborates the general conclusion, resolves itself into the consideration of two principal witnesses, who alone were certainly acquainted with their mistress's conspiracy in Buckingham's cipher, but who knew themselves exposed to all the rigours of imprisonment, torture, and death, in case of their meeting with evidence which might be required of them. In the case of an ordinary criminal, this proof, with all its disadvantages, would be esteemed legal, and even satisfactory, if not opposed by some other testimonies which might cramp out of the witnesses: but on the present trial, where the absolute power of the prosecutor convened with such important interests, and such a violent inclinative to have the princess condemned; the testimony of two witnesses, even from such men as these, upon such conditions, will be too strong probabilities, in order to remove all suspicion of tyranny and injustice. The proof against Mary, it must be confessed, is not destitute of this advantage; and it is difficult, if not impossible, in this case, to form any judgment without having an answer written in her name, and in the cipher concerted between them, without allowing that the matter had been communicated to that princess. Such is the light in which this matter was then and has since been, that every thing which could guide our judgment with regard to its value, no wonder, therefore, that the Queen of Scots, unassisted by counsel, and confounded by so extraordinary a trial, early and with a great ineffectual defence before the commissioners. Her reply consisted chiefly in her own denial: whatever force may be in that denial was much weakened by her positively affirming, when she was at last sent to the Tower, that she would never be acknowledged by the King of Spain; and that she had never been acknowledged by him; a fact, however, of which there remains not the least question. She asserted, that as Nau and Curle had taken an oath of secrecy and fidelity to her, her evidence would be quite equal to any other. appear to have some force, was her requiring that Nau and Curie should be confronted with her, and her affirming, that unless they came to her, she would not give her evidence against them. But that demand, however equitable, was not then supported by law in trials of high treason, and was often refused, even in other trials where the crown was prosecutor. The conduct of the House at this time was a novelty; that the species of treason there enumerated must be proved by two witnesses, confronted with the criminal. But Mary was not tried upon that act; and, indeed, the law never having been before made, it was always sure to refuse every indulgence beyond what the strict letter of the law, and the settled practice of the courts of justice, required of them. Not to mention, that these secretaries were not probably at Fotheringhay during the time of the trial, and could not, upon Mary's demand, be produced before the commissioners. There passed two incidents in this trial which may be worth notice. One was, that when Sarah and Eliz. was read in, in which mention was made of the Earl of Arundel and his brothers, on hearing their names, she broke into a sigh: "Alas!" said she, "what has the noble house of the first times, would scruple to employ. She affirmed with regard to the same letter, that it was easy to force the hand-writing and explorer of another: she was afraid that this was too familiar a practice with Walsingham, who, she also heard, had frequently practiced both against her and others. Walsingham, and his commissioners, rose up. He protested, that in his private capacity he had never acted any thing against the Queen of Scots; in his public capacity, he owned, that his concern was only to save her life, and to find out the persons in searching out, by every expediency, all designs against her sacred person, or her authority. For attaining that end, he would not only make use of the assistance of Esta-" ble, If not impossible, that a princess, of so much sense and spirit, should, in a land, where the greatest publics are composed of a very few persons, have a house with her, and that she had every opportunity of conferring with those, who could be the means of crowning her with the glory of her country. It was not in any case of treason that she could be saved, but in the second from the court of England, if it was discovered. He was so ignorant of the design, that he considered he must be disgrace, no account of his surname. Not to mention, that Mary's confederates and tools were on her side, and that the design of escape was to be put to her notice while she was engaged in her business, and therefore there was the time and place with the opposite persons. The second assertion is, that these two secretaries were previously treacherous, and that before his entering, Walsingham, made such a trust in the character of the madam's explorer as might involve her in the guilt of the conspiracy. But these two men had lived long with the queen of Scots, had been constantly trusted by her, and had never taken upon them selves either with her or her persons, that could make them leave them, or become criminals, which were not known with certainty from other quarters. The third assertion is, that the queen the sovereign of Scotland, and Curle, ever Gates, her letters or any answer; but the Walsingham, having delivered the, found a way. But the appearance implies the falsehood of the whole story, told by Gates, of Curle, of her and Walsingham's confederacy, and therefore the queen must have been, by her own persons, or her confederates, in allowing her servants to be killed. No mention, that as Nau and Curle never signed her letters, nor certified by seals, nor by the queen's, they would necessarily have been engaged, for her own part. But these three assertions are quite either of them. But Gates was present, and therefore the queen's letters were sufficiently her to the address of James. But Camden informs us, that Nau, even after that, per- probably were employed on some occasion: as a person and a violent enemy; she knew that she had been for assassinating her. It is quite a new subject, that she seems to have been more closely concerned in, than the court of Rome and the cardinal archbishop. Her own liberty and sovereignty were so near, that the queen would not be able to escape. Her charge and her arraignment were that she was a traitor. But she was accused by the same person to so many others, that she could give her own credit to what she was accused of, as to the letter of Walsingham, her sentence of death upon the Queen of Scots, against Mary, and confirmed it by their seals and subscriptions. The same day the sentence of death which the commissioners pronounced, was sent to the queen, and delivered to the sheriffs and the judges. That the sentence did not receive derogate from the title and honour of James, King of Scotland; but that he was in the same place, degree, and right, as if this sentence of death had been pronounced to the queen by any probability and met in the star-chamber at London; where, after taking the oaths of Mary's two secretaries, who voluntarily, without having any evidence given against them, confessed the letters before produced, they pronounced the sentence of death upon the Queen of Scots, against Mary, and confirmed it by their seals and subscriptions. The same day the sentence of death which the commissioners pronounced, was sent to the queen, and delivered to the sheriffs and the judges. The queen had now brought affairs with Mary to that situation which she had long ardently desired; and she found a plausible reason for executing vengeance on a competitor, from the beginning of her reign, who had ever equally dreaded and hated. But she was restrained from instantly gratifying her resentment, by several important considerations. She foresaw the invasion of Scotland, and the necessary dissolution of the union between the two crowns would be represented by the numerous particulars of Mary, and the reproach to which she herself might be exposed with all foreign princes, perhaps with all posterity. The rights of hospitality, of kindness, and sovereign majesty, seemed, in this case, to be absolute; it was all important, the sacrifice of generosity to interest, of clemency to revenge, might appear equally unbecoming a sovereign and a woman. Elizabeth, therefore, who was an excellent hypit was under delirium, but withdrew her eyes from what she could behold without the utmost reluctance and uneasiness. She was also willing, that by this unusual precaution the people should see the danger to which her present situation exposed her, and that she might be more strongly incited to take vengeance on the criminal whose restless intrigues and bloody conspiracies had so long exposed her to the most imminent perils.\(^{6}\)

The parliament answered the queen's expectations: the sentence of treason for which she had already been tried by both Houses; and an application was voted to obtain Elizabeth's consent to its publication and execution.\(^1\) She gave an answer, ambiguous, embarrassed; full of real artifice, and a noble display of her natural intelligence; signifying her extreme concern for danger to which her life was continually exposed; she declared her willingness to die, did she not foresee the great calamities which would thence fall upon the nation; she made professions of the greatest tenderness to her people; she displayed the clemency of her temper, and expressed her violent reluctance to execute the sentence against her unhappy kinswoman; she affirmed that the issue was uncertain by which she was to die, so far from being made to insinuate her, was only intended to give her warming beforehand not to engage in such attempts as must expose her to the penalties with which she was thus opened to the public; and in consequence of what she had said whether it was possible to hind any expedient, besides the death of the Queen of Scots, for securing the public tranquillity.\(^2\) The parliament, in obedience to her commands, took the measure which, so far as she believed, would find no other possible expedient. They retracted their solicitations, and entreaties, and arguments: they even renounced, that mercy to the Queen of Scots was cruelty to them, their subjects and children; and they affirmed, that it were injustice to deny execution of the law to any individual; much more to the whole body of the people, now unanimously and earnestly sung for this pledge of her parental care and tenderness. This second address set the present assembly into a very active motion: she complained of her own unfortunate situation; expressed her unevenness from their importance; renewed the professions of affection to her people; and dismissed the committee of parliament in an uncertainty what, after all this deliberation, might be her final resolution.\(^3\)

But though the queen affected reluctance to execute the sentence against Mary, she complied with the request of parliament in the form of the sentence which that body seem to have intended to be executed by that assembly, that they thought that her religion could never, while she was alive, attain a full settlement and security. Mary was nowise dismayed at this assurance; she perceived from the last circumstance mentioned to her; and insisted that since her death was demanded by the protestants for the establishment of their faith, she was really a martyr to her religion, and was entitled to all the merits attending that glorious character. She added, that the English had often imbrued their hands in the blood of their sovereigns: no wonder they exercised cruelty against her, who derived her descent from them; and she received orders to take down her canopy, and to serve her no longer with the respect due to sovereign princes. He told her that she was now to be considered as a dead person, and it may be supposed that no such emotion was not produced nor in her any seeming emotion. She only replied, that she received her royal character from the hands of the Almainly, and no earthly power was ever able to become her executioner.

The Queen of Scots wrote her last letter to Elizabeth; full of dignity, without departing from that spirit of meekness and of charity which appeared suitable to this concluding scene of her unfortunate life. She preferred no petition for averring the fatal sentence: on the contrary, she expressed her gratitude to Heaven for thus bringing to a speedy period her sad and lamentable pilgrimage. She requested some favours of Elizabeth, and entreated her, not that she might be excused from her sentence, but that she might receive the comic act of death with tranquillity: she complained of her own unfortunate situation; expressed her unevenness from their importance; renewed the professions of affection to her people; and dismissed the committee of parliament in an uncertainty what, after all this deliberation, might be her final resolution.

\(^{1}\) The parliament granted the queen a supply of a subsidy and two fifteenths. They adjourned, and met again on the 23rd of February, and ordered the execution of the Queen of Scots, when her plans some remarkable incidents, which it may be proper to relate here. The queen, according to him, expressed her apprehension of the necessity of a seaward, and the monstrous effect of the English fleet, and the hand of the House and army. should be satistied with her innocent blood, her body, which it was determined should never enjoy rest while her soul was united to it, might be consigned to her servants, and be conveyed by them into France, there to repose in a catholic land, with the sacred relics of her mother. In Scotland, however, the septuples of her ancestors were violated, and the churches either demolished or profaned; and in England, where she might be interred among the ancient kings, her own and Elizabeth's progenitors, she could not have been deprived of being interred in the grave with those rites and ceremonies which her religion required. She requested that no one might have the power of inflicting a private death upon her, without Elizabeth's knowledge; but that her execution would be public, and attended by her ancient servants, who might bear testimony of her perseverance in the faith, and of her submission to the will of Heaven. She begged that these servants might afterwards be allowed to depart without soever they pleased, and might enjoy those liberties which she should bequeath them. And she conjured her to grant these favours by their near kindred; by the soul and memory of Henry VII, the common ancestor of both; and by the royal dignity, of which they equally participated. Elizabeth made no answer to this letter; being unwilling to give Mary a refusal in her present situation, and feeling inconveniences from granting some of her requests.

While the Queen of Scots thus prepared herself to meet her fate, great efforts were made by foreign powers with Elizabeth, to prevent the execution of the sentence pronounced against her. Besides employing L'Aubespine, the French resident at London, a creature of the house of Guise, Henry sent over Belliere, with a profound intention of interfering for the life of Mary. The Duke of Guise and the league at that time threatened very near the king's authority; and Elizabeth knew, that though that monarch might, from decency and policy, think himself obliged to interpose publicly in behalf of the Queen of Scotland, he knew, that her execution would be public, and attended by her ancient servants, who might bear testimony of her perseverance in the faith, and of her submission to the will of Heaven. She begged that these servants might afterwards be allowed to depart without soever they pleased, and might enjoy those liberties which
she should bequeath them. And she conjured her to grant these favours by their near kindred; by the soul and
memory of Henry VII, the common ancestor of both; and
by the royal dignity, of which they equally participated. Elizabeth made no answer to this letter; being unwilling to give Mary a refusal in her present situation, and feeling inconveniences from granting some of her requests.

The present incidents set these dispositions of the clergy in a full light. James, observing the fixed purpose of Mary to die, ordered prayers to be said for Mary in all the churches; and, knowing the contemptuous humour of the ecclesiastics, he took care that the form of the petition should be most cautious, as well as humane and charitable: he might pleased that the Queen of Scots, whom he call Mary, was united to the light of his truth, and save her from the apparent danger with which she was threatened. But, excepting the king's own chaplains, and one clergymen more, all the preachers refused to pollute their churches by these prayers for a papist, and would not so much as prefer a petition for her conversion. James, unwilling or unable to punish this disobedience, and desirous of gaining the preachers an opportunity of amending their fault, appointed a new church for the purposes of Mary, and summoned her, that he might at least secure himself from any insult in his own presence, he desired the Archbishop of St.
Andrews to officiate before him. In order to disappoint this purpose, the clergy instigated one Couper, a young man who had not yet received holy orders, to take possession of the pulpit early in the morning, and to exclude the prelate. When the king came to church, and saw the pulpit occupied by Couper, he called to him from his seat, and told him that the place was destined for another; yet since he was there, if he would obey the charge given, and remember the queen in his prayers, he might proceed to pray in his own church, with all the advantages of the Spirit of God should direct him. This answer sufficiently instructed James in his purpose; and he commanded him to leave the pulpit. As Couper seemed not disposed to obey, the captain of the guard went to pull him from his place; upon which the young man cried aloud, That this day would be a witness against the king in the great day of the Lord; and he denounced a woe upon the inhabitants of Edinburgh for permitting him to be treated in that manner. The audience at first appeared desirous to take part with him; but the sermon of the prelate brought them over to a more dutiful and more humane disposition.

Elizabeth, when solicited, either by James or by foreign princes, to pardon the Queen of Scots, seemed always determined to execute the sentence against her; but when her ministers urged her to interpose no more delays, her temper and her hesitation returned; her humanity could not allow her to embrace such violent and sangamary measures; and she was touched with compassion for the misfortunes, and with respect for the dignity, of the unhappy prisoner. The couriers, sensibly of the motives of the same, urged again the necessity of grace; and it was stated that the treatment of that princess in England had been, on her first reception, such

as sound reason and policy required: and if she had been governed by principles of equity, she would not have refused willingly to acquiesce in it; that the obvious inconveniences, either of allowing her to retire into France, or of restoring her by force to her throne, in opposition to the resolution of the nation, as has been already observed, had established the queen to detain her in England till time should offer some opportunity of serving her, without danger to the kingdom, or to the protestant religion; that her usage there had been such as became her rank; her own servants in considerable numbers had been permitted to attend her; exercise had been allowed her for health, and all access of company for amusement; and these inducements would in time have been carried further, if by her subsequent conduct she had appeared worthy of them: that after she had instigated the rebellion of Northumberland, the conspiracy of Norfolk, the bull of excommunication of Pope Pius, an invasion from Flanders; after she had seduced the queen's friends, and incited every enemy, foreign and domestic, against her; it became necessary to treat her as a most dangerous rival, and to render her confinement more strict and rigorous; that the queen, notwithstanding the required provocations, had, in her favour, rejected the importance of her parliaments, and the advice of her sagacious ministers; and was still, in hopes of her amendment, determined in delay coming to the last extremity against her: that Mary, even in this extremity, retained so high and unconquerable a spirit, that she acted as conqueror to the crown, and allowed her partisans everywhere; and in her very letters, and to her secretaries, she wrote of Elizabeth, the only true sovereign: that even, allowing her to be still the queen's equal in rank and dignity, self-defence was permitted by a law of nature, which could never be abrogated; and even one, still more a queen, had sufficient jurisdiction over an enemy, who by open violence, and still more, who by secret treachery, threatened the utmost danger against her life: that the general conjunctions of the enemy to extirpate the protestant religion was no longer a secret; and as the sole resource of the latter persecuted sect lay in Elizabeth, so the chief hope which the former entertained of final success, consisted in her person and in the title of the Queen of Scots: that this was no more than obvious; and, between these two princes; and, rendering the life of one the death of the other, pointed out to Elizabeth the path, which either regard to self-preservation, or to the happiness of her people, should direct her to pursue; and that necessity, more powerful than policy, thus demanded of the queen that resolution which equity would authorize, and which duty prescribed.

When Elizabeth thought that as many importunities had been used, and as much delay interposed, as decency required, she at last determined to carry the sentence into execution; but even in this final resolution she could not pass over a weakness of a sin exemplify the sin of artifice. In order to alarm the vulgar, rumours were previously dispersed that the Spanish fleet was arrived in Milford Haven; that the Scots had made an irruption into England; that the Duke of Guise was landed in Sussex with a strong army; that the Queen of Scots was escaped from prison, and had raised an army; that the northern counties had begun an insurrection; that there was a new conspiracy on foot to assassinate the queen, and to lay her prostrate in a manner of weakness and infirmity, as her manner usually was, and her wonted cheerfulness did not even desert her on this occasion. She comforted her servants under the affliction which overwhelmed them, and which was too violent for them to conceal it from her. Turning to Burgham, her physician, she asked, whether he did not remark the great and invincible force of truth? "They pretend," said she, "that I must die because I conspired against the queen's life: but the Earl of Kent avowed, that there was no other cause of the queen's death, than the apprehensions which, if I should live, they entertain for their religion. My constancy in the faith is that they knew they could not gratify her more than by serving her without waiting till she died, and to serve her without waiting for death alone." my real crime: the rest is only a colour, invented by interested and designing men." Towards the end of supper, she called in all her servants, and drank to them: they pledged her; in order, on their knees, and crawled her pardon for any past neglect of their duty: she deigned, in return, to ask their pardon for her officers towards them; and a plentiful effusion of tears attended this last solemn farewell.

Mary's care of her servants was the sole remaining affair which employed her concern. She preferred her will, in which she had provided for them by legacies: she ordered the inventory of her goods, clothes, and jewels to be brought her; and she wrote down the names of those to whom she bequeathed each particular: to some she distributed money with her own hands; and she adapted the recompense to their different degrees of merit and merit. She wrote also letters of recommendation to her servants to the French king, and to her cousin, the Duke of Guise, whom she made the chief executor of her testament. At her wended time she went to bed; slept some hours; and then rising, spent the rest of the night in prayer. Having foreseen the difficulty of executing the rites of her religion, she had had the precaution to obtain a consecrated host from the hands of Pope Pass; and she had reserved the unopened vestments of her anointing; but this expedition she supplied, as much as she could, the want of a priest and confessor, who was refused her.*

Towards the morning she dressed herself in a rich habit of silk and velvet, the only one which she had reserved to herself. Her hands and feet were bare, though carefully covered, and she had left to them this dress rather than the plume garb which she wore the day before; but it was necessary for her to appear at the ensuing solemnity in a decent habit.

Thomas Andrews, sheriff of the county, entered the room, and informed her that the hour was come, and that he must attend her to the place of execution. She replied, that she was ready, and added, addressed to her servants: she leaned on two of Sir Annas Paulat's guards, because of her infirmity in her limbs; and she followed the sherif with a serene and composed countenance. In passing through a hall which was hung with tapestry, she was met by the Earls of Shrewsbury and Kent, Sir Annas Paulat, Sir Drue Drury, and many other gentlemen of distinction. Here she also found Sir Andrew Melvil, her steward, whom flung himself on his knees before her; and, wringing his hands, cried aloud, "Ah, Madam! unhappy me! what man was ever before the messenger of such heavy tidings as I must carry, when I shall return to my native country, and shall report that I saw my gracious queen and mistress行为不端, andihad prevented faceto speech; and Mary too felt herself moved more from sympathy than affliction. "Cease, my good servant," said she, "cease to lament: thou hast cause rather to rejoice, than to mourn for any thing thou sawest the truth and justness of Mary Stuart receive their long-expected period and completion. Know," continued she, "good servant, that all the world at best is vanity, and subject still to more sorrow than a whole ocean of tears is able to bewail. But I pray thee carry this message from me, that I die a true woman to my religion, and unattainable in my affections to Scotland and to France. Heaven forgive them that have long desired my end, and have thirsted for my blood as the dust panther after the water-locust! O God, added she, "thou art the Author of truth, and truth itself, thou knowest the immost recesses of my heart: thou knowest that I was ever desirous to preserve an entire union between Scotland and England, and to oblige the source of all these fatal disorders! But recommend me, Melvil, to my son, and tell him, that, notwithstanding all my distresses, I have done nothing prejudicial to the state and interest to my nation; for whom I wish not the least sorrow, or weeping eyes, and face bedewed with tears, she kissed him. "And so," said she, "good Melvil, farewell: once again farewell, good Melvil; and grant the assistance of thy prayers to thy queen and mistress."

She then knelt down, and cast her eyes heavenward, crossed her hands, bent her head, and made a petition in behalf of her servants, that they might be well treated, be allowed to enjoy the presents which she had made them, and be sent safely into their own country. Having received a favourable answer, she pre-that the hand of death was upon her, the axe was laid to the root of the tree, the throne of the great Judge of heaven was erected, the book of her life was spread wide, and the particular sentence and judgment was ready to be pronounced upon her; and that it was now, during this important moment, in her choice, either to rise to the resurrection of life, and hear that joyful salutation, or fall upon this scene of desolation, replete with sorrow and anguish; and to suffer that dreadful denunciation, Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire.

Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.

During this discourse, Mary could not sometimes for bear betraying her impatience, by interrupting the preacher; and the dean, finding that she had profited nothing by his lecture, at last bade her change her opinion, repent her of her former wickedness, and settle her faith upon this ground, that she was not so much under the ungrateful conduct of her husband, seduced by the treacherous counsels of one in whom she reposed confidence, transported by the violence of her own temper, which never could so naturally understand, in the unutterable distress, she was betrayed into actions which may with some difficulty be accounted for, but which admit of no apology, nor even of alleviation. An enumeration of her qualities might carry the appearance of a panegyric; an account of her conduct in some parts wea the aspect of severe satire and invective.

Her numerous misfortunes, the solitude of her long and tedious captivity, and the persecutions to which she had been exposed on account of her religion, had wrought her up to a degree of boggery during her inter years; and such were the prevalent spirit and principles of the age, that it was the less wonder, if her zeal, her resentment, and her interest uniting, reduced her to extremest misfortunes, which comparators, actuated only by the first of these motives, had formed against the life of Elizabeth.

When the queen was informed of Mary's execution, she could not forbear expressing her uneasiness, Mary's character, her constancy and induration. Her countenance changed; her speech faltered and failed her; for a long time her sorrow was so deep that she could not express it, but stood fixed like a statue in silence, of absolute astonishment. After her grief was able to find vent, it burst out into loud wealings and lamentations; she put herself in deep mourning for this deplorable event; and she was seen perpetually bathed in tears, and surrounded only by her maids and women. None of her ministers or court counselors desired to approach or if any had such temerity, she chased them from her with the most violent expressions of rage and resentment: they had all of them been guilty of an unpardonable crime, in putting to death her dear sister and kinswoman, contrary to her fixed purpose, of which they were sufficiently apprised and acquainted.

No sooner was her sorrow so much abated as to leave room for reflection, than she wrote a letter of apology to the King of Scots, and sent it by Sir Robert Cary, son of Lord Hunsdon. She there told him, that she wished he knew, but not felt, the unutterable grief which she experienced on learning of this event; of feeling her grief and trepidation; and her head was severed from her body at two strokes by the executeor. He instantly held it up to the spectators, streaming with blood, and agitated with the executioner's assurance of her approbation; an exclamation, "So perish all Queen Elizabeth's enemies!" The Earl of Kent alone replied, "Amen!" The attention of all the other spectators was fixed on the melancholy scene before them; and zeal and flattery alike gave place to present pity and admiration of the expiring princess.

Mary's character, age, and notes of her captivity in England, Mary, Queen of Scots; a woman of great accomplishments both of body and mind, natural as well as acquired; but unfortunate in her life, and during one period very unhappy in her conduct. The beauty of her person, and grace of her air, combined to make her the most amiable of women, and the charming of her address and conversation added the impression which her lovely figure made on the hearts of all beholders. Ambitious and active in her temper, yet inclined to cheerfulness and serenity; the particular sentence and judgment was ready to be pronounced upon her, yet polite, and gentle, and affable in her demeanour; she seemed to partake only so much of the male virtues as to render her estimable, without relinquishing those of her sex. In order to form a just idea of her character, we must set aside one part of her conduct, while she abandon-same purpose. He said, That he was much surprised to hear of the violent resolutions taken in Scotland, and of the passion discovered by a prince of so much judgment and temper as James: that a war founded merely on the principle of revenge, and that too on account of an act of justice which necessity had extorted, would for ever be stra-chamber for his misdemeanour. The secretary was confounded; and, being sensible of the danger which must attend his entrance into a contest with the queen, he expressed penitence for his error, and submitted very patiently to be railed at by those very councillors whose permission had induced him to incur the guilt, and who had promised to countenance and protect him. He contended, in a sort before, the same argument during the queen's pleasure, and to pay a fine of ten thousand pounds. He remained a long time in custody, and the fine, though it reduced him to beggary, was rigorously levied upon him. All the favour which he received and obtained from the queen, was sending him small supplies from time to time to keep him from perishing in necessity. He privately wrote an apology to his friend Walsingham, which contains many curious particulars. Drury, he said, had been demonstrating with the queen in Mary's behalf; and immediately after their departure, she commanded him, of her own accord, to deliver her the warrant for the execution of that princess. She signed it readily, and ordered it to be sealed with the great seal of England. She appeared in such good humour on the occasion, that she said to him in a jocular manner, "Go, tell all this to Walsingham, who is now such, though I fear he will die of sorrow when he hears of it." She added, that though she had so long delayed the execution, lest she should seem to be actuated by malice or cruelty, she was all along sensible of the necessity and wisdom of reducing Drury and Paulet, that they had not before eased her of this trouble; and she expressed her desire that Walsingham would bring them to compliance in that particular. She was so bent on this purpose, that she order, to the great astonishment, whether any letter had come from Paulet, with regard to the service expected of him! Davison showed her Paulet's letter, in which that gentleman positively refused to act any thing which might tend to break the union of the crown and jurisdiction of the queen fell into a passion, and accused Paulet as well as Drury of perfidy; because, having taken the oath of association, in which they had bound themselves to prevent such wars, the French yet refused to lend their hand on this occasion. "But others," she said, "will be found less scrupulous." Davison adds, that nothing but the consent and exhortations of the whole council could have engaged him to send off the warrant: he was well aware of his danger; and remembered that the queen, after having ordered the execution of the Duke of Norfolk, had endeavoured, in a like manner, to throw the whole blame and odium of that action upon Lord Burleigh."1

Elizabeth's dissimulation was so gross that it could deceive nobody who was not previously resolved to be blinded; but as James's concern for his mother was certain, and he now most strongly, and cordially, discharged the highest resentment, and refused to admit Cary into his presence. He recalled his ambassadors from England; and seemed to breathe nothing but war and vengeance. The states of Scotland, being assembled, took part in his anger; and preached that they were ready to spend their lives and fortunes in revenge of his mother's death, and in defence of his title to the crown of England. Many of the nobility instigated him to arms; Lord Sinclair, when the couriers appeared in deep mourning, presented himself to the king arrayed in complete armour, and said, that this was the proper mourning for the queen. The council were impatient to make an alliance with the King of Spain, to lay immediate claim to the crown of England, and to prevent the ruin which, from his mother's example, he might conclude would certainly, if Elizabeth's power prevailed, overwhelm his persons and his kingdom: the queen was sensible of the danger attending these councils; and after allowing James some decent interval to vent his grief and anger, she employed her emissaries to pacify him, and to set before him the interests of peace, of which she feared four which might induce him to live in amity with her.

4th March. Walsingham wrote to Lord Thirlstone, James's secretary, a judicious letter to the thereby afford James a decent pretence for renewing his animosity with her, on which their mutual interests so much depended.

While Elizabeth insured tranquillity from the attempts of her nearest neighbour, she was not negligent of more distant dangers. Hearing that Philip, though he seemed to dissemble the daily insults and injuries which he received from the English, was meditating a voyage against a great navy to attack her; she sent Sir Francis Drake with a fleet to intercept his supplies, to pillage his coast, and to destroy his shipping. Drake carried out four capital ships of the enemy, and twenty-six great and small, with which the London merchants, in hopes of sharing in the plunder, had supplied him. Having learned from the fleet at Cadiz, how the English intended to attack him, he bent his course to the former harbour, and boldly, as well as fortunately, made an attack on the enemy. He obliged six galleys, which made head against him, to take shelter under the forts; he burned about a hundred vessels laden with ammunition and naval stores; and he destroyed a great ship of the Marquis of Santa Croce. Thence he set sail for Cadiz. Vainly had the king at Deventer, having attacked on that premonitory, with three other fortresses. He next insulted Lisbon; and finding that the merchants, who had engaged entirely in expectation of profit, were discouraged, he sent his first assault of the Terceras, with an intention of lying in wait for a rich carryack which was expected in those parts. He was so fortunate as to meet with his prize; and by this short expedition, in which the public bore so small a share, the adversary was so severely smitten, that the English seamen learned to despise the great unwieldy ships of the enemy, the naval preparations of Spain were destroyed, the intended expedition against England was retarded, and the queen thereby had leisure to take more secure measures against that formidable invasion.3

This year, Thomas Cavendish, a gentleman of Devonshire, who had disputed a good estate by living the life of a gentleman, being resolved to repair his fortune at the expense of the Spaniards, fitted out three ships at Plymouth, one of a hundred and twenty tons, another of sixty, and a third of forty; and with these small vessels he ventured into the South Sea, and committed great depredations on the Spaniards. He took nineteen vessels, some of which were richly laden; and, returning by the Cape of Good Hope, he came to London, and entered the river in a kind of triumph. The city crowded to the bank, to see him, and a silk, his sails were of damask, his top-sail clotli of gold; and his prizes were esteemed the richest that ever had been brought into England.4

The land enterprises of the English were not, during this campaign, so advantageous or honourable to the nation. The important place of Deventer was intrusted by Leicester to William Stanley, with a garrison of twelve hundred English; and this gentleman, being a catholic, was alarmed at the discovery of Haltginton's conspirac)'. He became apprehensive lest every one of his religion should thenceforth be treated with distrust in England. He entered into a correspondence with the Spaniards, betwixt the city to them for a sum of money, and engaged the whole garrison to desert him with the Spanish service. Roland York, who commanded a fort near Zutphen, imitated his example; and the Hollander, formerly disgusted with Leicester, and suspicious of the English, broke out into loud complaints against the imprisonment, if not the treachery, of his administration. Soon after, he himself arrived in the Low Countries; but his conduct was no wise calculated to give them satisfaction, or to remove the suspicions which they had entertained against him. The Prince of Parma having besieged Sluyes, Leicester attempted to relieve the place, first by sea, then by land; but failing in both the pursuit, and he charged his bad success to the ill behaviour of the Hollander, they were equally free in reflections upon his conduct. The breach between them became wider every day: they slighted his authority, opposed his measures, and neglected his counsels; while he, endeavouring, by an impetuous diligence and by violence, to recover that influence which he had lost by his impudent and ill-concerted measures. He was even suspected by the Dutch of a design to usurp upon their common interest. He perceived, however, that his plan had begun to extend towards the queen herself. That princess had made some advances towards a peace with Spain. A congress had opened at Bourbourg, a village near Gravelines, and though the two courts, especially that of Spain, had no other intention than to amuse each of them its enemy by negociation, and mutually relax the preparations for defence or attack, the Dutch, who were determined on no terms to return under the Spanish yoke, became impatient, and their liberty should be secured to the political interests of England.5 But the queen, who knew the importance of her alliance with the States during the present juncture, was resolved to give them entire satisfaction by recalling Leicester, and commanding him to resign his government. Maurice, son of the late Prince of Orange, a youth of twenty years of age, was elected by the States governor in his place; and Peregrine de la Court, Lord Willoughby was appointed by the queen commander of the English forces. The measures of these two generals were much embarrassed by the malignity of the writer of their history, who had left a faction behind him, and who, in the midst of his difficulties and disasters, still attempted to disturb all the operations of the States. As soon as Elizabeth received intelligence of these disorders, she took care to redress them; and she obliged all the partisans of England to fall into unanymty with Prince Maurice.6 But though the king continued to entertain hopes and views of winning back the favour of his queen, he had another project of his own, which, far from bringing him to the queen, lost her confidence for some time, and was even committed to custodv.

Sir Christopher Hatton was another favourite who at this time received some marks of her regard. Though he had never followed the profession of the law, he was made chancellor in the place of Bromley, deceased; but, notwithstanding all the expectations and perhaps wishes of the lawyers, he behaved in a manner so unmannerly of that station: his good natural capacity supplied the place of experience and study; and his decisions were not found deficient either in point of equity or judgment. His enemies had contributed to his promotion, in hopes that his absence would remove the evil which the ungracious, but crafty readiness of chancellory, would gradually estrange the queen from him, and give them an opportunity of undermining him in her favour.

The little intrigues and cabals of the court were silenced by the account, which came from all quarters, of the vast preparations made by the Spaniards for the invasion of England, and for the en- terprise against that kingdom. Philip, though he had not yet declared war, on account of the hostilities which Elizabeth every where committed upon him, had long harboured a secret and violent desire of revenge against her. His ambition also, and the hopes of extending his empire, were much encouraged by the present prosperous state of his affairs; by the conquest of Portugal, the acquisition of the East-Indian commerce and settlements, and the yearly importation of vast treasures from America. The point on which he rested his highest glory, the perpetual object of his policy, was to support orthodoxy and exterminate heresy; and as the power and credit of Elizabeth were the chief bulwark of the protestants, he hoped, if he could subdue that princess, to acquire the eternal renown of subduing the whole Christian world in the Catholic communion. Above all, his indignation against his revolted subjects in the Netherlands had encouraged that insurrection, and who, by their vicinity, were so well enabled to support the Hollander, that he could never hope to reduce these rebels while the power of that kingdom remained entire and unbroken. To subdue England seemed a necessary preparative to the re-establishment of his authority in the Netherlands: and notwithstanding appearances, the former was in itself, as a great, very important, so a thorough, undertaking than the latter. That kingdom lay nearer Spain than the Low Countries, and was more exposed to invasions from that quarter; after an enemy had once obtained entrance, the people of the Indies was so habituated to further force, by art or nature; a long peace had deprived it of all military discipline and experience; and the catholics, in which it still abounded, would be ready, it was hoped, to join any invader who should free them from those persecutions under which they laboured, and should revenge the death of the Queen of Scots, un whom they had fixed all their affections. The fate of England must be decided in one battle at sea, and another at land; and what comparison between the English and Spaniards, either in point of naval force, or in the numbers, reputation, and veteran bravery of their armies? Besides the acquisition of so great a kingdom, success against England insured the immediate submission of the Hollander, who, attacked on every hand, and deprived of all support, must yield their stubborn necks to that yoke which they had so long resisted. Happily this conquest, as it was of the utmost importance to the interests of Spain, was not at present opposed by the jealousy of other powers, naturally so much interested to prevent the success of the enterprise.
A truce was lately concluded with the Turks; the empire was in the hands of a friend and near ally; and France, the perpetual rival of Spain, was engaged in other commotions, that she had no leisure to pay attention to her foreign interests. This favourable opportunity, therefore, which ought never again present itself, must be seized; the measures must be concerted for the further conducted in Europe, to which the present greatness and prosperity of the Spaniards seemed so fully to entitle them. These hopes and motives engaged Philip, notwithstanding his cautious temper, to undertake this hazardous enterprise; and though the prince, now created by the Pope, Duke of Parma, when consulted, opposed the attempts, he at last represented the necessity of resolving possession of some sea-port town in the Netherlands, which might afford a retreat to the Spanish navy, it was determined by the catholic monarch to proceed immediately; no the execution of so ambitious project. During some time he had been secretly on the design, but as soon as the resolution was fully taken, every part of his vast empire resounded with the noise of armaments, and all his ministers, privates, and admirals, were employed in preparations. The Marquis of Santa Cruz, sea officer of great reputation and experience, was destined to command the fleet; and by his counsels were the naval preparations conducted. In all the ports of Armadilla, Sicily, Naples, Spain, and Portugal, artisans were employed in building vessels of uncommon size and force; naval stores was bought at a great expense; provisions amassed; armies levied and quartered in the maritime towns of Spain; and plans had for fitting out such a fleet and embarkation as had never before had its equal in Europe. The military preparations in Flanders were no less formidable. Troops from all quarters were every week employed to reinforce the Duke of Parma. Capanu and Spinelli conducted forces from Italy; the Marques of Borguia, a prince of the house of Austra, levied troops in Germany; the Walloon and Burgundian regiments were completed or augmented; the Spanish infantry was supplied with recruits; and an army of thirty-four thousand men was assembled in the Netherlands, and kept in readiness to be transported into England.
The Duke of Parma employed all the carpenters whom he could find in the Flanders, to build ships for the conquest of the coasts of the Baltic; and he built at Dunkirk and Newport, but especially at Antwerp, a great number of boats and flat-bottomed vessels, for the transporting of his infantry and cavalry. The most renowned nobility and princes of Italy and Spain were ambitious of sharing in the honour of this great enterprise. Don Amaduss of Savoy, Don John of Medicus, Vespasian Gonzaga, Duke of Sibbonetta, and the Duke of Parma, hastened to join the army under the Duke of Parma. About two thousand volunteers, in the exaltation of the cause, were induced to enlist in the service. No doubts were entertained, but such vast preparations, conducted by officers of such cons-sume skill, must finally be successful. And the pride of Philip, in the possession of his power, and with vain hopes, had already deformed the name the Invinc-able Armada.

News of these extraordinary preparations soon reached the court of London; and notwithstanding the secrecy of the Spaniards, England and their adherents to this force, in the Indies, it was easily concluded, that they meant to make some effort against England. Preparations to this end were set on foot. The queen had foreseen the invasion, and finding that she must now contend for her crown with the whole force of Spain, she made preparations for resistance; and was she dismayed with that power, by which all Europe apprehended she must of necessity be overwhelmed.
Her force indeed seemed very unequal to resist so potent an enemy. All the sailors in England amounted at that time to about fourteen thousand men. a The size of the English shipping was in general so small, that except a few of the vessels of England, it was not at present possible to oppose by the jealousy of other powers, naturally so much interested to prevent the success of the enterprise. A truce was lately concluded with the Turks; the empire was in the hands of a friend and near ally; and France,
the perpetual rival of Spain, was engaged in other commotions, that she had no leisure to pay attention to her foreign interests. This favourable opportunity, therefore, which ought never again present itself, must be seized; the measures must be concerted for the further conducted in Europe, to which the present greatness and prosperity of the Spaniards seemed so fully to entitle them. These hopes and motives engaged Philip, notwithstanding his cautious temper, to undertake this hazardous enterprise; and though the prince, now created by the Pope, Duke of Parma, when consulted, opposed the attempts, he at last represented the necessity of resolvings possession of some sea-port town in the Netherlands, which might afford a retreat to the Spanish navy, it was determined by the catholic monarch to proceed immediately; no the execution of so ambitious project. During
some time he had been secretly on the design, but as soon as the resolution was fully taken, every part of his vast empire resounded with the noise of armaments, and
all his ministers, privates, and admirals, were employed in preparations. The Marquis of Santa Cruz, sea officer of great reputation and experience, was destined bensions, when they considered the force of fifty thousand venerable Spaniards, commanded by experienced officers, under the Duke of Parma, the most consummate general of the age; and considered his formidable adventure with the military power, which England, not enervated by peace, but long distanced to war, must muster up against it.

The chief support of the kingdom seemed to consist in the vigour and prescience of the queen's conduct; who,

undeterred by the greatest dangers, all attacks on her with tranquillity, animated her people to a steady resistance, and employed every resource which either her domestic situation or her foreign alliances could afford her.

She sent Sainct-Hubert, her first lord of the bedchamber, to the king to remain attached to her, and to consider the danger which at present menaced his sovereignty no less than her own, from the ambition of the Spanish tyrant; 3

the ambassador found James well disposed to cultivate a union with England, and that prince even kept himself prepared to march with the force of his whole kingdom to the assistance of Elizabeth. Her authority with the King of Denmark, and the tie of their common religion, engaged this monarch, upon her application, to seize a squadron of ships which Philip had bought or hired in the Danish harbours: the Flanne Towns, though not at that time on good terms with Elizabeth, were induced by the same interest to join against her; they loaded their vessels in their ports, that they became useless to the purpose of invading England. All the protestants throughout Europe regarded this enterprise as the critical event, which was to determine their cases for ever. England was not then able, by reason of their distance, to join her force to that of Elizabeth, they kept their eyes fixed on her conduct and fortune, and beheld with admiration, the imperial countenance with which she encountered that dreadful tempest, which was every moment advancing towards her.

The queen also was sensible that, next to the general persecutions which she enjoyed, and the confidence which her subjects reposed in her prudent government, the firmest support of her throne consisted in the general zeal of the people for the protestant religion, and the severe penalties which they had imbibed against popery. She took care, on the present occasion, to revive in the nation

this attachment to their own sect, and this asseveration of the opposite. The English were reminded of their former danger from the tyranny of Spain; all the barbarities exercised by Mary against the protestants were ascribed to the counsels of that bigot and impious nation: the bloody massacres in the Indies, the unremitting executions in the Low Countries, the horrid cruelties and iniquities of the Spanish Armada, with which the nation was so dreadful a tempest, was every moment advancing towards her.

But while the queen, in this critical emergence, roused the animosity of the nation against popery, she treated the partisans of that sect with moderation, and gave not way to an undistinguishingly fury against them. Though she knew that Sixtus Quintus, the present Pope, famous for his capacity and his tyranny, had fulfilled a new buck of enmity, that of enmity, had despoiled her, had absolved her subjects from their oaths of allegiance, had published a crusade against England, and had granted penitential indulgences to every one engaged in the present invasion; yet she did not believe that any such criminal acts could be so blinded, as to sacrifice to bigotry their duty to their sovereign, and the liberty and independence of their native country. She rejected all violent counsels, by which she was urged to seek pretexts for despaching the leaders of that party: she would not even confine any considerable number of them; and the catholics, sensible of this good usage, generally expressed great zeal for the public service. Some gentlemen of that sect, conscious that they could not justly expect any trust or authority, entered themselves as volunteers in the fleet or army, or some equipped ships at their own charge, and gave the command of these vessels to protestants: others were active in animating their tenants, and vassals, and neighbours, to the very service and support of the queen. Elizabeth, therefore, for the present all party distinctions, seemed to prepare themselves with order as well as vigour to resist the violence of these invaders.

The more to exalt the martial spirit of the nation, the queen appeared on horseback in the camp at Tilsbury; and riding through the lines, discovered a cheerful and animated countenance, exhorted the soldiers to remember their duty to their country and their religion, and pressed her intention, though a woman, to lead them herself into the field against the enemy, and rather to perish in battle than survive the ruin and slavery of her people. 4 By this spiritual tale the true spirit of the soldiery, was revived: an attachment to her person became a kind of enchantment among them; and they asked one another,

Whether it were possible that Englishmen could abandon this glorious cause, could display less fortitude than appeared in their actions, when every danger was expected to be laid liable to be reimbursed by the defence of their heroic princess ?

The Spanish Armada was ready in the beginning of May; but, the moment it was preparing to sail, the Marquis of Santa Cruz, the Admiral, was seized with a fever, of which he soon after died. The vice-admiral, the Duke of Paliano, by a strange concurrence of accidents, at the very moment that he was to go to sea, was seized with a fever, and was accounted dead. The king pointed for admiral the Duke of Medina Sidonia, a nobleman of great family, but unexperienced in action, and entirely unacquainted with sea affairs. Alcarede was appointed vice-admiral. This misfortune, besides the loss of so great an officer as Santa Cruz, retarded the sailing of the Armada, and gave the English more time for their preparations to oppose them. At last, the Spanish fleet, full of hopes and slumber, set sail from Las-bon; but next day met with a violent tempest, which scattered the ships, sunk some of the smallest, and forced the rest to take shelter in the Grome, where they waited till they could be refitted. When news of this event was received, Elizabeth was full of satisfaction, and expected that the design of an invasion was disappointed for this summer; and, being always ready to lay hold on every pretext for saving money, she made Walsingham write to the admiral, directing him to take up some of the larger ships, and to discharge the seamen: but Lord Effingham, who was not so sanguine in his hopes, used the freedom to disobey these orders; and he begged leave to retain all the ships in service, though it should be at his own expense. 5 He took advantage of a north wind, and sailed toward the coast of Spain, with an intention of attacking the enemy in their harbours; but the wind changing to the south, he became apprehensive lest they might have succeeded, and, by passing him at sea, invade England, and expose the armament of the fleet. He returned therefore with the utmost expedition to Plymouth, and lay at anchor in that harbour.

Then, after all, the means of the Armada were repaired, and the Spaniards with fresh hopes set out again to 1 It made him some promises which she never fulfilled, to give him domestic power; and, in the interval of his absence, to declare all his wealth and feeble condition. 2 I am a man, though of the order of a king or sovereign prince; and of a king of England too: and think foul sent that Parma or Spain, or any prince of Europe, should dare to insult the honour and independence of my realm in which, rather than any dishonour should grow by me, I myself will take upon me: I myself will be your general, and for your victory, and for your victor in the field. I know already, by your fortitude, that you have done of merits and services greater than any other age; and, in a time of greater enterprise, I shall be able to say, and you to do, more for your country. I shall be able to say: Your virtue, your courage, your money, your arms, and your orders: if the victor in the field is not a noble and worthy subject; and dreading your obedience in my general, by your command in the several provinces of my kingdom, some have had a famous victory over those enemies of my God, of my kingdom, and of my people. 3 Camden, p. 543. 4 2 H sea, in prosecution of their enterprise. The fleet consisted of a hundred and thirty vessels, of which near a hundred were galleons, and were of greater size than any ever before used in England. It was composed of the Armada, on board of which were two hundred and ninety-five soldiers, eight thousand four hundred and fifty-six mariners, two thousand and eighty-eight galley-slaves, and two thousand six hundred and thirty great pieces of brass ordnance. It was victualled for two months, and was attended by sixty large ships called caravels, and ten salves with six guns a-piece.1

The plan formed by the King of Spain was, that the Armada should sail to the coast opposite to Dunkirk and Nieuport, and thence, by following along the coasts of France or Flanders, the vessels, which might obstruct the passage, (for it never was supposed they could make opposition,) should join themselves with the Duke of Parma, should thence make sail to the Thames, and having landed the whole Spanish army, thus complete at one blow the entire conquest of England. In prosecution of this scheme, Philip gave orders to the Duke of Medina, that, in passing along the channel, he should sail as near the coast of France as he could with safety; that he should by this policy avoid meeting with the English fleet; and, keeping in view the main enterprise, should neglect all smaller successes, which might prove an obstacle, or even interpose a delay, to the event of a katedron; and, when the Armada was under sail, they took a fisherman, who informed them that the English admiral had been lately at sea, had heard of the tempest which scattered the Armada, had retired back into the Channel, and no longer could in navigation this season, had laid up his ships, and discharged most of the seamen. From this false intelligence the Duke of Medina conceived the great facility of attacking and destroying the English ships in harbour; and he was tempted by the prospect of so decisive an advantage to break his orders, and make sail directly for Plymouth: a resolution which proved the safety of England. The English Lizard was the first land made by the Armada, which, with its attendant vessels, took it for the Ram-head near Plymouth, they bore out to sea with an intention of returning next day, and attacking the English navy. They were descried by Farring, a Scottish pirate, who was moving in those seas, and who immediately set sail to inform the English admiral of their approach:2 another fortunate event which contributed extremely to the safety of the fleet. Farring had just time to get out of port, when he saw the Spanish vessels come on full sail over him, disjointed, in the form of a crescent, and stretching the distance of seven miles from the extremity of one division to that of the other.

The writers of that age raise their style by a pompous description of this spectacle; the most magnificent that had ever appeared upon the ocean; infusing equal terror and admiration into the minds of all beholders. The lofty masts, the swolling sails, and the towering prows of the Spanish galleons, seem impossible to be justly painted but by assuming the colours of poetry; and an eloquent historian of Italy, in imitation of Camden, has asserted that the Armada, though the ships bore every sail, yet advanced with a slow motion; as if the ocean greased with supporting, and the winds were tired with impelling, so enormous a weight.3 The truth however is, that the largest of the Spanish vessels would scarcely pass for third rates in the English service. They were divided from the deck to the hold into two decks, or so ill-governed, that they were quite unwieldy, and could not sail upon a wind, nor tack on occasion, nor be managed in stormy weather by the seamen. Neither the mechanics of ship-building nor the experience of mariners had attained so great perfection as could serve for the security and government of such bulky vessels; and the English, who had already experience how unreservable they commonly were, beheld without dismay their tremendous progress.

Fillingham gave orders not to come to close fight with the Spaniards, where the size of the ships, he suspected, and the numbers of the soldiers, would be a disadvantage to the English; but to cannonade them at a distance, and to wait the opportunity which wends, currents, or various accidents, must afford him, of intercepting some scattered vessels of the enemy. Nor was it long before the event answered his expectations. About two hundred and eighteen thousand of the Spanish army, consisting of a considerable part of the Spanish money, took fire by accident; and while all hands were employed in extinguishing the flames, she fell behind the rest of the Armada: the great galleon of Andalusa was detained by the sprit of her three hundred yards; and both the vessels were taken, after some resistance, by Sir Francis Drake. As the Armada advanced up the channel, the English hung upon its rear, and still infested it with skirmishes. Each fleet had its principal object, the English to the coast, and courage to the English; and the latter soon found, that even in close fight the size of the Spanish ships was no advantage to them. Their bulk exposed them the more to the fire of the enemy; while their cannon, placed too high, shot over the heads of the English. The alarm having now reached the coast of England, the nobility and gentry hastened out with their vessels from every harbour, and reinforced the admiral. The Earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland, Sir Thomas Cecil, Sir Robert Cecil, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Thomas Vavasour, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Sir Charles Blount, with many others, distinguished themselves by this generous and disinterested service. The whole number of the vessels, drawn from the juncture of those ships, amounted to a hundred and forty sail.

The Armada had now reached Calais, and cast anchor before the place to lay victual, and for the soldiers to disembark. A Spaniard, who had gotten intelligence of their approach, would put to sea and join his forces to them. The English admiral directed here a successful stratagem upon the Spaniards. He took eight of his smaller ships, and filling them with all combustible materials, sent them one after another into the midst of the enemy. The Spaniards fancied that they were fire-ships of the same contrivance with a famous vessel which had lately done so much execution in the Schelde, near Antwerp; and their vessels, with their sails and rigging, and to seek out with the greatest disorder and precipitation. The English fell upon them next morning while in confusion; and, besides doing great damage to other ships, they took or destroyed about twelve of the enemy.

By this time it was become apparent, that the intention for which these preparations were made by the Spaniards was entirely frustrated. The vessels provided by the Duke of Parma were made for transporting soldiers, not for fighting; and in the Angelic, as Sir Francis Drake truly observed, positively refused to expose his flourishing army to such apparent hazard; while the English not only were able to keep the sea, but seemed even to triumph over their enem}- The Spanish admiral found in many encounters, that while he lost so considerable a part of his own navy, he had destroyed only one small vessel of the English; and he foresaw, that by continuing so unequal a combat, he must draw inevitable destruction on all the remainder. He prepared therefore to return homewards; but as the wind was contrary to his passage through the channel, he resolved to sail northwards, and making the tour of the island, reach the Spanish harbours by the ocean. The English fleet followed him during some time; and had not their ammunition fallen short, by the negligence of the officers in supplying them, they had obliged the whole Armada to surrender at discretion. The Duke of Medina had only two galleons, and these half-sunk, was rescued by the advice of his confessor. This conclusion of the enterprise would have been more glorious to the English; but the event proved almost equally fatal to the Spaniards. A violent tempest overtook the Armada after it had passed the Orkneys: the ships had already fatigue, and so disposed by their discontent, that they filled all Spain with accounts of the desperate value of the English, and of the tempestuous violence of that ocean which surrounds them.

Next, and the dishonourable conclusion of an enterprise which had been preparing for three years, which had exhausted the revenue and force of Spain, and which had long filled all Europe with anxiety or expectation. Philip, who was a slave to his ambition, but had no idea of military enterprise, began at length to feel the horror of the mortifying event which blasted all his hopes, than he fell on his knees, and rendering thanks for the gracious dispensation of Providence, expressed his joy that the crown was not lost the power of the House of Austria. The Spaniards, so often blessed this holy crusade, and foretold its insupportable success, were somewhat at a loss to account for the victory gained over the Catholic monarch by excommunication, which would have obtained from the joy of the present success, and from the general sense of the queen's necessities. Some members objected to this heavy charge, on account of the great burden of loans which had been already accumulated. Elizabeth foresaw, that this House of Commons, like all the foregoing, would be governed by the purport; and therefore, to obviate their objections, she offered them a supply of two subsidies and four fifteenths, payable in four years.

This is the first instance that subsidies were doubled in order to raise money; and the Commons had bin encompassed by a money bill, without obtaining from the joy of the present success, and from the general sense of the queen's necessities. Some members objected to this heavy charge, on account of the great burden of loans which had been already accumulated. Elizabeth foresaw, that this House of Commons, like all the foregoing, would be governed by the purport; and therefore, to obviate their objections, she offered them a supply of two subsidies and four fifteenths, payable in four years.

Which power and commandment from her majesty, which we have not yet received, I take it (passing remonstrances) that we are freed from the cause of necessity. And the cause of necessity is the dangerous estate of the commonwealth. The state of the spencer is not inferior to the present market price; so that purveyance besides the slavery of it, was always regarded as a great burden, and, being arbitrary and casual, was liable to great abuses. There may be a ready answer, that the money courtiers of Elizabeth, supported by the king's letter of one reparation to render this prerogative very to the people; and the Commons had, last session, found it necessary to pass a bill for regulating these exactions: but the bill was lost in the Committee of this House. There were many abuses in these purveyances: and this new bill begat a new attempt for redress; and the same bill was now revived, and again sent up to the House of Commons, together with a bill for some new regulations in the revenue of excise; and therefore the bill ordered for them a message from the upper House, desiring them to appoint a committee for a conference. At this conference, the Commons informed them, that the queen, by a message delivered by Lord Burleigh, had expressed her displeasure that the Commons should presume to touch on her prerogative. If there were any abuses, she said, either in imposing purveyances, or in the practice of the court of exchequer, her majesty was both able and willing to provide due reformation; and therefore she chose not to have any interference from the Commons as to matters of this kind.

A parliament. Commons, like all the foregoing, would be governed by the purport; and therefore, to obviate their objections, she offered them a supply of two subsidies and four fifteenths, payable in four years.

The imperious conduct of Elizabeth appeared still more clearly in another parliamentary transaction. The right of purveyance was an ancient prerogative, by which the officers of her household, at least on the Chambre d'Orléans, were permitted the abuses of purveyances to be redressed.

Essex, a nobleman of promising hopes, who, fired with the thirst of military honour, had secretly, unknown to the queen, stolen from England, here joined the adventurers; and it was then agreed by them all to take a ship and make sail for Portugal, the main object of the enterprise.

The English landed at Panache, a sea-port town, twelve leagues from Lisbon; and Norris led the army to that capital; where, by a singular good fortune, there was no great state of the city, and no watch kept about it; and thus the inhabitants bore a tolerable account to the captain, none of them durst declare in favour of the invaders.

The English army, however, made themselves masters of the suburbs, which abounded with riches of all kinds; but as they desired to conclude the advantage of the Portuguese, and were more intent on honour than profit, they observed a strict discipline, and abstained from all plunder.

Meanwhile they found their ammunition and that of Drake's must, but found themselves at a single cannon to make a breach in the walls; the admiral had not been able to pass some fortresses which guarded the river; there was no appearance of an insurrection in their favour; and in the hope of a plunder and search, they seized them as lawful prize, though they belonged to the Hanse Towns, a neutral power.

They sailed thence to Vigo, which they took and burned; and, having ravaged the country around, they set sail and arrived in England.

Above half of these gallant adventurers perished by sickness, famine, fatigue, and the sword; and England reaped more honour than profit from this extraordinary enterprise.

It is in consequence of this and other expeditions undertaken on board the fleet, that only those hundred and fifty survived those multiplied disasters.

When these ships were on their voyage homewards, they met with the Earl of Cumberland, who was outward bound, with a fleet of seven sail, all equipped at London, except one ship of war which the queen had lent him.

That nobleman supplied Sir Francis Drake with some provisions; a generosity which saved the lives of many of the adventurers, their ships having suffered severely. Cumberland sailed towards the Terceiras, and took several prizes from the enemy; but the richest, valued at a hundred thousand pounds, perished in the winter following, by the enterprise of a Frenchman, a negro, who was appointed governor of the island in Cornwall. Many of these adventurers were killed in a rash attempt at the Terceiras; a great mortality seized the rest; and it was with difficulty that the few hands which remained were taken back to London.

Though the signal advantages gained over the Spaniards, and the spirit thence infused in the word, or his property (which perforce he was but loath to part with, and bad for the promotion of his own family, and not to sell) took from him, and that at a just price, but under the value, and confess to recover his money, he shall have either the rate of twelve pence in the pound above for present of his due payment upon such hard condition. Nay, further, they are grown to that extremity, as is affirmed, though it be scarce credible, that in such persons all things are credulous, that they will take double pence, more when the decrees is strict, and again the second time when the money is paid. For the second, and they are so severe, touching the quantity which they take far above the value of the goods, as divers gentlemen of possession of ships, and other matters quite value. There is no way, (as it is observed) that for ships and goods, or whatever they may make their trade more securely, so what they thereby divers statutes do directly prejudice, whereby they may be well and at.

And so that by making a resolution of that which is taken, the advantage of all the ships, and bright the dollars worth, they, to the end to observe their duties, utterly to abstain from any dealings, either of buying or selling, in yourselves and your servants, to which of your majesty, to the third sort of abuse, which is of the unlawful manner of taking, where in that point is a bound, and where it is not so, and that the questration that is in the case, otherwise might have arisen, though rather an exasperation of some of the parts than a prosecution of the whole body; to the end that the more that is taken, the more should be delivered, and the goods delivered; and that they may have their trade more securely, so what they thereby divers statutes do directly prejudice, whereby they may be well and at.

into the English, gave Elizabeth great security during the rest of her reign, she could not forbear keeping an anxious eye on Scotland, whose situation rendered its revolutions always of importance to her. It might have been expected, that this high-spirited queen, who knew so well what a brave danger, would not have retained that malignant jealousy towards her heir, with which, during the life-time of Mary, she had been so much agitated. James had indeed succeeded to all the claims of his mother; but he had not succeeded to her prudence. Security, whatever it was, he could alone render these claims dangerous.* And as the queen was now well advanced in years, and enjoyed an uncontrolled authority over her subjects, it was not likely that the King of Scots, who wore of an indolent unambitious temper, would ever give her any disturbance in her possession of the throne. Yet all these circumstances could not remove her numerous suspicions: and so far from satisfying the nation by a settlement of the succession, or a declaration of James's title, she was as anxious to prevent every incident which might in anywise raise his credit, or procure him the regard of the English, as if he had been her immediate rival and competitor. Most of his ministers and favourites were her pensioners; and as she was desirous to hinder him from marrying and having children, she obliged them to throw obstacles in the way of every alliance, even the most reasonable, which could be offered him; and during some years she succeeded in this malingerant policy. He had fixed on the elder daughter of the King of Denmark, who, being a remote prince and not powerful, could give her no advantage; yet did she so artfully manage the whole affair, as to make it favourable to the interests of her husband. She met with no other impediment, the impatience of delay, married his daughter to the Duke of Brunswick. James then renewed his suit to the younger princess; and still found obstacles from the intrigues of Elizabeth, who, merely with a view of interposing delay, proposed to him the sister of the King of Navarre, a princess much older than himself, and entirely destitute of fortune. The young king, besides the desire of securing herself, by this present marriage, was unable to choose between two illustrious attempts too frequent among his subjects, had been so watched by the rigid austerity of the ecclesiastics, that he had another inducement to marry, which is not so usual with monarchs. His impatience therefore broke through all the politics of Elizabeth: the articles of marriage were settled: the ceremony was performed by proxy, and the princess embarked for Scotland; but was driven by a storm into a port of Norway. The tempest, and some others which happened near the same time, were universally believed in Scotland and Denmark to have proceeded from a combination of the Scottish and Danish witches; and the dying confession of the criminals was supposed by the English to have confirmed the truth of it. James, however, though a great believer in sorcery, was not deterred by this incident from taking a voyage in order to conduct his bride home: he arrived in Norway; carried the queen above Copen-hagen; and, having passed the winter in that city, he brought her next spring to Scotland, where they were joyfully received by the people. The clergy alone, who never neglected an opportunity of vexing their prince, made opposition to the queen's coronation, on account of the ceremony of anointing her, which they alleged was either a Jewish or a popish rite, and therefore utterly antichristian and unlawful. But James was as much bent on the ceremony as they were averse to it; and the papists, much confused thereby, and many intrigues, his authority, which had not often happened, at last prevailed over their opposition. a a situation where, though her affairs still required attention, and found employment for her active spirit, she was removed from all danger of any immediate revolution, and might regard the efforts of her enemies with some degree of confidence and security. Her successful and prudent administration had gained her, together with the admixture of foreigners, the affections of her own subjects; and after the death of the Queen of Scots, even the catholics, however discontented, pretended not to dispute her title, or adhere to any cause as her own; and James, not hurried by his factious nobility and ecclesiastics, possessed at home very little authority; and was solicitous to remain on good terms with Elizabeth and the English nation, in hopes that time and tranquillity would soon secure him that rich succession to which his birth entitled him. The Hollander, though overmatched in their contest with Spain, still made an obstinate resistance; and such was their unconquerable antipathy to their old masters, and such the prudent conduct of young Maurice, their governor, that the subduing of that small territory, if at all possible, must be the work of years, and the result of many and great successes. Philip, who, in his powerful effort against England, had been transported by resentment and ambition beyond his usual cautious maxims, was now disabled, and still more discouraged, from adventuring again on such hazardous enterprises. The situation also of England began to be most favourable to her; and events, which before had been his attention; but notwithstanding all his artifices, and force, and expense, the events in that kingdom proved every day more contrary to his expectations, and more injurious to himself and his designs, than to England.

The violence of the league having constraining Henry to declare war against the hugenots, these religiousists seemed exposed to the utmost danger; and Elizabeth, sensible of the intimate connection between her own interests and those of that party, had supported the King of Navarre by her negotiations in Germany, and by large sums of money, which she returned for levying another army. This great prince, not discouraged by the superiority of his enemies, took the field; and in the year 1587 gained at Contras a complete victory over the army of the French king; but as his allies, the Germans, were at the same time discomfited by the army of the league, under the Duke of Guise, his situation, notwithstanding his victory, seemed still as desperate as ever. The chief advantage which he reaped by this diversity of success arose from the dissensions which by that time took place in his own court. The inhabitants of Paris, intoxicated with admiration of Guise, and strongly prejudiced against their king, whose intentions had become suspicious to them, took arms, and obliged Henry to fly for his safety to the Netherlands. James, however, who, though a great believer in sorcery, was not deterred by this incident from taking a voyage in order to conduct his bride home: he arrived in Norway; carried the queen above Copen-hagen; and, having passed the winter in that city, he brought her next spring to Scotland, where they were joyfully received by the people. The clergy alone, who never neglected an opportunity of vexing their prince, made opposition to the queen's coronation, on account of the ceremony of anointing her, which they alleged was either a Jewish or a popish rite, and therefore utterly antichristian and unlawful. But James was as much bent on the ceremony as they were averse to it; and the papists, much confused thereby, and many intrigues, his authority, which had not often happened, at last prevailed over their opposition. a lum: the ecclesiastics and the preachers filled all places with excursions against his name; and the most powerful cities and most opulent provinces appeared to combine in a resolution, either of resisting monarchy, or of changing their monarch. Henry, finding slender resources among his catholic subjects, was constrained to enter into a confederacy with the hugonots and the King of Navarre: he enlisted large bodies of Swiss infantry and cavalry, andsecuring himself by the nominal title of chief nobility, he assembled by these means an army of near forty thousand men, and advanced to the gates of Paris ready to crush the league, and subdue all his enemies. The resolution of the swiss, however, inured the course of these great events. Jacques Clement, a Dominican friar, inflamed by that bloody spirit of bigotry which distasteth this century and a great part of the following year, all as was the world, embraced the resolution of sacrificing his own life in order to save the church from the persecutions of an heretical tyrant; and being Murder of Men, admitted under some pretext to the king's presence, he gave that prince a mortal thrust, and was immediately put to death by the courtiers, who hastily revenged the murder of their sovereign. This memorable incident happened on the first of August 1539.

Arrest a state of great anxiety and many difficulties, Elizabeth had at length reached

The King of Navarre, next heir to the crown, assumed the government by the title of Henry IV. but succeeded to much greater difficulties than those which surrounded his predecessor. The prejudices entertained against his religion made a great part of the nobility immediately desert him; and this was encouraged by the promises of an assembly, and by the king of Spain, to whom the Swiss entertained views, either of dismembering the French monarchy, or of annexing the whole to his own dominions. In these distressful circumstances, Henry addressed himself to Elizabeth, who, with her whole dependance, contributed to his assistance, and to oppose the progress of the catholic league, and of Philip, her inveterate and dangerous enemies. To prevent the desertion of the Swiss and German neutral subjects, he made him a present of twenty-two thousand pounds, a greater sum than, as he declared, he had ever before seen: and she sent him a reinforcement of four thousand men under Lord Wiloughby, an adherent of the protestant party, who joined the Swiss at Dessau. Strengthened by these supplies, Henry marched directly to Paris; and, having taken the suburbs sword in hand, he abandoned them to be pillaged by his soldiers. He employed the body of English in many other enterprises; and still found them a powerful and useful corps, by the correspondence of their service being elapsd, he dismissed them with many high commendations. Sir William Drury, Sir Thomas Baskerville, and Sir John Boroughs, acquired reputations in this campaign, and revived in France the ancient fame of English valor.

Progress of the War. The army which Henry, next campaign, raised at the head of Lord Willoughby, led into the field, was much inferior to that of the league; but as it was composed of the chief nobility of France, he feared not to encounter his enemies in a pitched battle at Yvre; and he gained a complete victory over them. This success enabled him to blockade Paris, and he reduced that capital to the last extremity of famine; when the Duke of Parma, in consequence of orders from Philip, marched to the relief of the league, and obliged Henry to raise the blockade. Having performed this important service, he returned to the Low Countries; and, by his cautious policy, preserved the civil war, performed those long marches in the face of the enemy, without affording the French monarch that opportunity which he sought of giving him battle, or so much as putting him to the expense of a siege: the Dutch, which he sustained, was in the Low Countries; where Prince Maurice took advantage of his absence, and recoved some places which the Duke of Parma had formerly conquered from the States.

The situation of Henry's affairs, though promising, was not so well advanced or established as to make the queen discontinue her succour; and she was still more confirmed in the resolution of supporting him by some advantages gained by the King of Spain. The Duke of Mercure, governor of Brittany, was induced by the promise of being declared for the league; and finding himself hard pressed by Henry's forces, he had been obliged, in order to secure himself, to introduce some Spanish troops into the sea-port towns of Brittany, and to divert all the danger; and foresew that the Spaniards, besides infesting the English commerce by privateers, might employ these harbours as the seat of their naval preparations, and might more easily from that quarter, than from Portugal, project an invasion of England. She concluded therefore a new treaty with Henry, in which she engaged to send over three thousand men, to be employed in the reduction of Brittany; and she stipulated that her charges should, in a twelvemonth, or as soon as the enemy was expelled, be refunded her. These forces were commanded by Sir John Norris, and under him by his brother Sir Richard. Sir Henry, and by Anthony Trigger, was at the head of a small body which garrisoned Despe, and a squadron of ships, under the command of Sir Henry Palmer, lay upon the coast of France, and intercepted all the vessels belonging to the Spaniards or the leaguers. The Dutch forces were here beforehand by any treaty or agreement; and Henry, who found it necessary to lay aside the projected enterprise against Brittany, persuaded the English commanders to unite their forces with his, under the pretext which he carried into Picardy. Notwithstanding the disgust which Elizabeth received from this disappointment, he laid before her a plan for expelling the leaguers from Normandy, which was put into execution, and supported by four thousand men, to assist him in that enterprise. The Earl of Essex was appointed general of these forces; a young nobleman, who, by many exterior accomplishments, and the many real ones, was admirably fitted in favour with Elizabeth, and seemed to occupy that place in her affections, which Leicester, now deceased, had so long enjoyed. Essex, impatient for military fame, was extremely unequipped for the time at Despe unemployed; and, had not the orders which he received from his mistress been so positive, he would gladly have accepted Henry's invitation, and have marched to join the French army now in Champagne. This plan of operations was also projected by the French ambassador, but she rejected it with great displeasure; and she threatened immediately to recall her troops, if Henry should persevere any longer in his present practice, of breaking all concert with her, and attending to nothing but his own interests. Urged by these motives, the French king at last led his army into Normandy, and laid siege to Honen, which he reduced to great difficulties. But the league, unable of themselves to take the field against him, had again recourse to the Duke of Parma, who received orders to march to their relief. He executed this enterprise with his usual abilities and success; and, for the present, frustrated the projects of Henry and Elizabeth. This process, who kept still in view the interests of her own kingdom in all her foreign transactions, was impatient under these disappointments, blamed Henry for his negligence in the execution of treaties, and complained, that the English forces were a shame and reproach to her great enterprise. It is probable, however, that their own ardent courage, and their desire of distinguishing themselves in so celebrated a theatre of war, were the causes why they so often engaged. The only force that Thomas Randolph, who had been employed by the queen in several embassy to Scotland, as also the Earl of Warwick, elder brother to Elizabeth, e Rymer, t. v., p. 116.

support Henry against the league and the Spaniards; and she formed a new treaty with him, in which she agreed never to make peace with Philip but by common consent; she promised to send him a new supply of four thousand men; and, in stipulation to that end, in a twelfmth, to employ these forces, joined to a body of French troops, in an expedition against Brittany, and to consign to her hands a sea-port town of that province, for a re-treat to the English. About the impossibility of fulfilling some of these articles, and the imprudence of fulfilling others; but, finding them rigidly insisted on by Elizabeth, he accepted of her succours, and trusted that he could one day have occasion to thank her for his execution in fulfilling his part of the treaty. This campaign was the least successful of all those which he had yet carried on against the league.

During these military operations in France, Elizabeth employed her naval power against Spain. Philip, and endeavoured to intercept his West-Indian treasures, the source of that greatness which rendered him so formidable to all his neighbours. She sent a squadron of seven ships against the Spanish. Thomas Howard, for this service; but the king of Spain, informed of her purpose, fitted out a great force of fifty-five sail, and despatched them to escort the Indian fleet. They were met by a squadron, under the command of Sir Richard Greene, the vice-admiral, who refused to make his escape by flight, they took one vessel, the first English ship of war that had yet fallen into the hands of the Spaniards. The rest of the squadron retreated safely. The death of Henry, the Duke of Orleans, rendered her expectations, but pleasing themselves with the idea that their attempt had not been altogether fruitless in hurting the enemy. The Indian fleet had been so long detained in the Havannah from the fear of the English, that they were obliged at last to set sail in an improper season, and most of them perished by shipwreck ere they reached the Spanish harbours.

The Earl of Cumberland made a like unsuccessful attempt in 1623. He sent out one ship of the queen, and seven other vessels equipped at his own expense, but the prizes which he made did not compensate the charges.

The spirit of these expensive and hazardous adventures was very prevalent in England. Sir Walter Raleigh, who had enjoyed great favour with the queen, finding his interest to decline, determined to recover her good graces by some important undertaking; and as his reputation was so great, the number of those who were willing to engage with him as volunteers in an attempt on the West Indies. The fleet was detained so long in the channel by contrary winds, that the season was lost; Raleigh, finding himself in a difficult situation, succeeded to the command, and made a privateering voyage against the Spaniards. He took one rich carrack near the island of Flores, and destroyed another.

About the same time Thomas Whelen, a Londoner, took two Spanish ships, which, besides fourteen hundred chests of quicksilver, contained about two millions of bull's ducatsones; a commodity useless to the English, but which had cost the king of Spain three hundred thousand florins, and would have been sold by him in the Indies for five millions.

This war did great damage to Spain; but it was attended with considerable expense to England; and Elizabeth's ministers, instead of it, she had spent in Flanders and France, and on her naval expeditons, above one million two hundred thousand pounds; a charge, which notwithstanding her extrune frugality, was too burdensome for her narrow revenues to support. She summoned therefore a parliament in order to obtain supply: but she either thought her authority so established that she needed the advice of no concurrence in return, or she rated her power and prerogative above money: for there never was any parliament whom she treated in a more haughty manner, whom she made more sensible of their own weakness than she was ex-} tend to their own condemnation; and where every one who refused entire satisfaction to the commission was imprisoned, without relief or remedy. This motion was seconded by some members; but the ministers and privy councillors opposed it, and voted the objections, circumstances which ensued. The queen sent for the speaker, and after requiring him to deliver to her Morrice's bill, she told him that it was in her power to call parliament; in her power to dissolve it at pleasure; in her power to advert or disunite to any determination which they should form: that her purpose in summoning this parliament was two-fold; to have laws enacted for the further enforcement of uniformity and to provide for the defence of the nation against the exorbitant power of Spain: that these two points ought, therefore, to be the object of their deliberations: she had enjoined them already, by the mouth of the lord keeper, to meddle neither with matters of state nor of religion; and she wondered how any one could be so assuming as to attempt a subject so expressly contrary to her prohibition; that she was highly offended with this presumption; and took the present opportunity to reiterate the commands given by the keeper, and to require that no bill, regarding either state affairs, or reformation in causes ecclesiastical, be exhibited in the House: and that, in particular, she charged the speaker, upon his alleging that if any such bills were offered, she should refuse them a reading, and not so much as permit them to be debated by the members. This command from the queen was submitted to without further question. Morrice was summoned itself by a messenger, charged from his office of chancellor of the duchy, incapacitated from any practice in his profession as a common lawyer, and kept some years prisoner in Tilbury castle.

The queen having thus expressly pointed out both what the House should not do, the Commons were as obsequious to the one as to the other of her injunctions. They passed a law against recusants; such a law as was suited to the severe character of Elizabeth, and to the persecution of ages. It was intended, in order to uproot her majesty's subjects in their due obedience; and was meant, as the preamble declares, to obviate such inconveniences and perils as might grow from the wicked practices of sedition sectaries and disloyal subjects: for these two species of criminals were always at that time con- founded together, as equally dangerous to the peace of society. It was enacted, that any person above sixteen years of age, who obstinately refused during the space of a month to go and public worship, should be committed to the prison; that if, after being condemned for this offence, he persist three months in his refusal, he must abjure the realm; and that if he either refuse this condition, or return after his conversion, he should suffer capitally as a felon without benefit of clergy. This law bore equally hard upon the puritans and upon the catholics; and, had it not been imposed by the queen's authority, it was certainly, in that respect, much contrary to the private sentiments and inclinations of the majority in the House of Commons. Very little opposition, however, appears there to have been openly made to it.1

The expenses of the war with Spain having reduced the queen to great difficulties, the grant of subsidies seems to have been the most important business of this parliament: and it was a signal proof of the high spirit of Elizabeth, that, while conscious of a present dependence on the Commons, she did not trouble herself much about the dilatory treatment of them, and covered her weakness under such a lofty appearance of superiority. The Commons readily voted two subsidies and four fifteenths; but, this sum not appearing sufficient to the court, an unusual expedient was fallen upon to induce them to make an enlargement in their concessions. The peers informed the Commons, in a conference, that they could not give their consent to the same proceeding, because it was a pity to weaken the stands of the queen at such times: they therefore proposed a grant of three subsidies and six fifteenths; and desired a further conference in order to persuade the Commons to agree to this meas-ELIZABETH.

He desired therefore some supply from her of men and money; but though she had reason to deem the prosecution of the three popish ears a common cause, she never could be prevailed on to grant him the least assistance.

The tenth part of this letter, which all but contains an entertaining detail respecting the French king and the States, would have sufficed to execute this purpose, more immediately essential to her security: but she seems ever to have borne some degree of hatred to the English, whom she regarded both as her and as the son of Mary, her hated rival and competitor.

So far from giving James assistance to prosecute the catholic conspirators, the queen rather contributed to increase his iniquities by the turbulent disposition of the Earl of Bothwell, a nobleman descended from a natural son of James V. Bothwell more than once attempted to render himself master of the king's person; and being expelled the kingdom for these traitorous enterprises, he took shelter in England, was secretly protected by the queen, and lurked near the borders where his power lay, with a view of still committing some new violence. He succeeded at last in an attempt on the king, and, by the mediation of the English ambassador, imposed disadvantageous terms on that prince: but James, by the authority of the convention of states, annulled this agreement as extorted by violence; again expelled Bothwell; and, finding him in England, insensibly influenced by the pretending ignorance of the place of his retreat, never executed the treaties, by which he was bound to deliver up all rebels and fugitives to the King of Scotland.

During these disorders, increased by the refractory disposition of the ecclesiastics, which had been instigated and encouraged in the Protestants, the former remained in suspense; but at last the parliament passed an act of attainder against them, A. D. 1591. and the king prepared himself to execute it by force of arms. The nobleman, though they obtained a victory over the Earl of Argyll, who acted by the king's commission, found themselves hard pressed by James himself, and agreed, on certain terms, to leave the kingdom. Bothwell, being detected in a conspiracy with them, forfeited the favour of Elizabeth; and was obliged to take shelter, first in France, then in Italy, where he died some years after in great poverty.

The established authority of the Queen secured her from all such attempts as James was exposed to from the mutinous disposition of his subjects; and her enemies found no other means of giving her domestic disturbance than by such traitorous and pernicious machinations as could hardly have been thought possible in the principles of the enemy which she bestrode, and the bounds of her power. Rodrigo Lopez, a Jew, domestic physician to the king, being imprisoned on suspicion, confessed that he had received a bribe to poison her from a gentleman who had succeeded, when he was deceased, in the government of the Netherland; but he maintained that he had no other intention than to cheat Philip of his money, and never meant to fulfil his engagement. He was, however, executed for his conspiracy; and the queen complained to Philip of these dishonourable attempts of his ministers, but could obtain no satisfaction.

York and Williams, two English traitors, were afterwards executed for a conspiracy with Ibarra, equally atrocious.

Instead of avenging herself, by retaliating in a like manner, Elizabeth sought a more honourable vengeance, by supporting the King of France, and assisting him in finally breaking the force of the league, which, after the conversion of that monarch, went down to decay, and was threatened with speedy ruin and dissolution. Norris commanded the English forces in Brittany, and assisted at the taking of Morlaix, Quimperlecotrin, and Brest, two towns garrisoned by the Spanish forces. In every victory, however, they had so long enjoyed domestic peace, discovered a strong military disposition; and the queen, though herself a heroine, found more frequent occasion to revive her generals for encouraging their temerity, than to congratulate them on their success. So Sir Martin Frobisher, her brave admiral, perished with many others before Brest. Morlaix had been promised to the English for a place of retreat; but the Duke d'Aumout, the French general, eluded this promise, by making it be inserted in the capitulation, that none but catholics should be admitted into that city.

A.D. 1593. This campaign, the French king, who had long carried on hostilities with Philip, was at last provoked, by the taking of Chatelet and Doulevant, and the attack of Cambrai, to declare war against that monarch. Elizabeth, being threatened with a new invasion in England, and with an insurrection in Ireland, recalled most of her forces, and sent Norris to command in that latter kingdom. Finding, also, that the French league was almost entirely dissolved, and that the most considerable leaders had made an accommodation with their prince, she thought that he could well support himself by his own force and valour; and she began to be more sparing in his cause of the blood and treasure of her subjects.

Some disgusts which she had received from the States, joined to the remonstrances of her frugal minister Burleigh, made her also inclined to diminish her charge on that side; and she even demanded, by her ambassador, Sir Thomas Bodley, to be reimbursed all the money which she had expended in supporting them. The

A.D. 1596. States, besides alleging the condition of the treaty, by which they were not bound to repay her till the conclusion of a peace, pleaded their present poverty and distress, the great prosperity of the Spaniards, and the difficulty in supporting the war, much more in saving money to discharge their encumbrances. After much negotiation, a new treaty was formed; by which the States engaged, to supply the queen immediately to the charge of the English auxiliaries, computed at forty thousand pounds a-year; to pay her annually twenty thousand pounds for some years; to assist her with a certain number of ships; and to conclude no peace or treaty without her consent. They also bound themselves, not finishing a peace with Spain, to pay her annually the sum of a hundred thousand pounds for four years; but on this condition, that the pay-ments should be laid on all subjects, and that they should be supplied, though at their own charge, with a body of four thousand auxiliaries from England.

The queen still retained in her hands the cautions towns, which were a great check on the rising power of the States; and she committed the important trust of Flushing to Sir Francis Vere, a brave officer, who had distinguished himself by his valour in the Low Countries. She gave him the preference to Essex, who expected so honourable a command; and though this subpoena was daily rising both in reputation with the people, and favour with herself, the queen, who was commonly reserved in the advancement of her courtiers, thought proper, on this occasion, to shew her love. Sir Thomas Baskerville was sent over to France, at the head of two thousand English, with which Elizabeth, by a new treaty concluded with Henry, engaged to supply that prince. Some stipulations for mutual assurances were formed by the treaty; and all former engagements were renewed.

A.D. 1597. This body of English were maintained at the expense of the French king; yet did Henry esteem the supply of considerable advantage, on account of the great reputation acquired by the English, in so many fortunate enterprises undertaken against the common enemy. In the great battle of Tournholt, gained this campaign by Prince Maurice, the English auxiliaries, under Sir Francis Vere and Sir Robert Sydney, which was the signal victory by daunted the Spaniards, and Edward Prince Augustus, who had three ships and a pinnace, by the merchants of London; and was more fortunate in his adventure. He took thirty-nine ships of the enemy; and, not content with this success, he made an attack on Fernambouc in Brazil, that new great treasure house of the enemy. As he approached the shore he saw it lined with great numbers of the enemy; but, nowise daunted at this appearance, he placed the stoutest of his men in boats, and ordered them to charge with much violence on the land, and took many of them in pieces. By this bold action he both deprived his men of all resource but in victory, and terrified the enemy, who fled after a short resistance. He returned home with the treasure which he had so bravely acquired. In 1595, Sir Walter Raleigh, who had now forlorn the queen's friendship, by an intrigue with a maid of honour, and who had been thrown into prison for this misentries, had sooner recovered his liberty than he was pulled by his active and enterprising genius to attempt so great an action. The success of the first Spanish adventurers against Mexico and Peru had begotten an extreme avidity in Europe; and a prepossession universally took place, that in the inland parts of South America, called Guiana, a country as yet undiscovered, there were mines and treasures far exceeding any which Cortex or Pizarro had met with. Raleigh, whose turn of mind was somewhat romantic and extravagant, made it a point of his own honour, to see this country, and published an account of the country, full of the grosses and most palpable lies that were ever attempted to be imposed on the credulity of mankind.

The same year Sir Francis Drake and Sir John Hawkins undertook a more important expedition against the Spanish settlements in America; and they carried with them six ships of the queen's, and twenty more, which either were fitted out at their own expense, or fitted them by private interest. Sir Thomas Baskerville was appointed commander of the land forces, which they carried on board. Their first design was to attempt Porto Rico, where, they knew, a rich carack was at that time stationed; but as they had not preserved the requisite secrecy, a pinnace, having strayed from the fleet, was taken by the Spaniards, and betrayed the intentions of the English. Preparations were made in that island for their reception; and the English fleet, notwithstanding the brave assault which they made on the enemy, was repulsed with loss. Hawkins soon after died; and Drake pursued his voyage to Nombre di Dios, on the isthmus of Darien; where, having landed his men, he proceeded onward to Panama, with a view of plundering that place, or, if he found such a scheme practicable, of keeping and fortifying it. But he met not with the same facility which had attended his first enterprises in those parts. The Spaniards, taught by experience, had everywhere forlorn the passes, and had stationed troops in the woods, who so infested the English by continual alarms and skirmishes, that they were obliged to return, without being able to effect any thing. Drake himself, from the interment of the climate, the fatigues of his journey, and the vexation of his disappointment, was seized with a distemper, of which he soon after died. Sir Thomas Baskerville took the command of the fleet, which was now in a weak condition, and, after having fought a battle near Cuba, with a Spanish fleet, of which the event was not decisive, he returned to England. The Spaniards suffered some loss from this enterprise; but the English reaped no profit from it.

The bad success of this enterprise in the Indies made the English rather attempt the Spanish dominions in Europe, where, they heard, Philip was making great preparations for a new invasion of England. A powerful fleet was equipped at Lubeck, and arrived in the Spanish dominions, composed of seventy vessels, seventeen of which were capital ships of war; the rest tenders and small vessels; twenty ships were added by the Hollanders. In this fleet there were five thousand and sixty soldiers, a thousand volunteers, and six thou-Indian fleet; but the great success, in the enterprise of Cadiz, had covered all their miscarriages: and that princess, though she admired the lofty genius of Essex, could not forbear expressing an esteem for the other officers. The admiral was exalted. The Earl of Nottingham's motion gave great disgust to Essex. In the preamble of the patent it was said, that the new dignity was conferred on him on account of his good services, in taking Cadiz, and destroying the fleet that had been with ships; all whereunto he pretended to belong solely to himself: and he offered to maintain this plea by single combat against the Earl of Nottingham, or his sons, or any of his kindred.

The achievements in the subsequent year proved not so fortunate; but in the English, when they sailed off to the westward, the English Philip had still reason to see the great hazard and disadvantage of that war in which he was engaged, and the superiority which the English, by their naval power, and their situation, had acquired over him. The queen having received intelligence that the Spaniards, though their fleets were so much shattered and destroyed by the expedition to Cadiz, were preparing a squadron at Ferrol and the Grone, and were marching troops thither, with a view of making a descent in Ireland, was resolved to prevent their enterprise, and to destroy the shipping in these harbours. She prepared a large fleet, of a hundred and twenty sail, of which seventeen were her own ships, forty-three were vessels of men-of-war, and thirty-nine were victuallers: she embarked on board this fleet five thousand new-levied soldiers, and added a thousand veteran troops, whom Sir Francis Vere brought from the Netherlands. The Earl of Essex himself conducted the expedition. The king, and sea forces, was at the head of one squadron: Lord Thomas Howard was appointed vice-admiral of another: Sir Walter Raleigh of the third: Lord Mountjoy commanded the land forces under Essex. Vere was appointed marshal: Sir George Carew lieutenant of the ordnance, and Sir Christopher Blount first colonel. The Earls of Rutland and Southampoton, the Lords Grey, Cromwell, and Redes, with several other persons of distinction, embarked to keep in the naval forces. Essex declared his resolution either to destroy the new Armada, which threatened England, or to persist in the attempt.

This powerful fleet set sail from Plymouth; but were no sooner out of harbour than they met with a furious storm, which shattered and dispersed them; and before they could be refitted, Essex found that their provisions were so far spent, that it would be impracticable to carry on so numerous an army along with them. He dismissed, therefore, all the soldiers, except the thousand veterans under Vere; and laying aside all thoughts of attacking Ferrol and the Grone, he confined the object of his expedition to the intercepting the Indian fleet; which had at first been considered only as the second enterprise which he was to attempt.

The Indian fleet in that age, by reason of the imperfection of navigation, had a stated course as well as season, both in their going out and in their return; and there were certain islands at which, as at fixed stages, they always touched, and where they took in water and provisions. The Azores being one of these places, where about this time the fleet was expected, Essex went his course thither; and he informed Raleigh, that he, on his arrival, intended to attack Faya, one of these islands. By some accident the squadrons were separated; and Raleigh, arriving first before Faya, thought it more prudent, after waiting some time till the general, to begin the attack alone, lest the inhabitants should, by further delay, have leisure to make preparations for their defence. He succeeded in the enterprise; but Essex, jealous of Raleigh, expressed great displeasure at his conduct, and considered it as an intention of robbing the general of the glory which attended that action: he cashiered, therefore, Sydney, Brev, Berry, and others, who had concurred in the attempt; and wrote to Raleigh, that he, as the chief officer, was not to have the credit of the victory.

The fleet, however, was returned to Plymouth, where it was expected to arrive in the month of June; but the king was heard, that the fleet had been taken into the hands of the Spanish admiral, and that they were unfortunately met by a very few ships. He complained much to the queen of their want of spirit in this enterprise; nor was she pleased that they had returned without attempting to intercept the passionate, was soon appeased, and both received Raleigh into favour, and restored the other officers to their commands. This incident, however, though the quarrel was seemingly accommodated, was the first foundation of that violent animosity which afterwards took place between these two gallant commandants.

Essex made next a disposition proper for intercepting the Italian galleons; and Sir William Monson, whose station from the want of remonstrance of the more correct in the matter, was left to conduct that business, and to resort to those means which he thought proper, to intercept the commerce of the crown. They complained, that the Lords failed in civility to them, by receiving their messages sitting, with their hats on; and that the keeper returned an answer in the same negligent posturé: but the upper House proved, that the lower House had been guilty in that respect, and that no remonstrance had been made whatever, and the usage of parliament, to any more respect.

Some amendments had been made by the Lords, to a bill sent up by the Commons; and these amendments were written on parchment, and returned with the bill to the Commons. The lower House took umbrage at the novelty: they pretended that these amendments ought to have been written on paper, not on parchment: and they complained of this innovation to the Peers. The Peers replied, that they expected not such a frivolous objection from the gravity of the House; and that it was not material whether the amendments were written on parchment or on paper, in the form of motions, or of propositions, that they were not entitled by custom, and the usage of parliament, to any more respect.

An application was made, by way of petition, to the Secretary of State, Sir Thomas Egerton, for a further and more ample provision for the ensuing war: an abuse which had arisen to an enormous height; and they received a gracious though a general answer, for which they returned their thanks and acknowledgments. But not to give them too much encouragement in such applications, she told them, in the speech which she delivered at their dissolution, "That with regard to these patents, she hoped that her dutiful and loving subjects would not make a disadvantage of them, as the Arts of the sea, in the hands of the Prince, the gentleman, and the principal and head pearl in her crown and disdain; but that they would rather leave these matters to her disposal." The Commons also took notice, this session, of some transactions in the court of high commission; but not till they had previously obtained permission from her Majesty to that purpose. Elizabeth had reason to foresee that parliamentary supplies would now become more necessary than ever; and the chief burden of the war with Spain would thereupon lie upon England. She had received an offer of peace with Philip; but before he would proceed to a negotiation, he gave notice that the intelligence of the necessity of the war was the act of his subjects. She feared that, if possible, a general pacification might be made, by common agreement. These two powers sent ambassadors to France, in order to reconcile against peace; the Queen, Sir Robert Cecil and Henry Herbert; the States, Justin Nassau and John Barneveld. Henry said to these ministers, That his early education had been amidst war and danger, and he had passed the whole course of his life either in arms or in military preparations; that after the peace which he had given of his alacrity in the field, no one could doubt but he would willingly, for his part, have continued in a course of life to which he was now habituated, till the common enemy were reduced to such a condition, as to be able to make war upon his allies; that he was not parts of his people, nothing but the most invincible necessity, could ever induce him to think of a separate peace with Philip, or make him embrace measures not light, and never yet plentiful.—If there be any who are able to share the spoils of the peace, the reasons employed by this speaker are so singular, that they may be worth very little. But that would be, the maintenance of this dignity; for my father, dying, left me a younger brother, and nothing to me but my bare annually bequeath, growing to man's estate, and some small practice of the law, I took a wife, by whom I have had children; and she has been able to preserve, in spite of the devil, the Pope, and the Spanish tyrant, and all the miserable deceivers of all her enemies: that in this contest she had disbursed a sum triple to all the parliamentary supplies granted her, and, besides expending her ordinary revenues, had been beguiled to sell the crown lands: and she told them, that she could not doubt but her subjects, in a cause where their own honour and interest were so deeply concerned, would willingly contribute to such moderate supplies as should be found necessary for the common defence? The entirely conformable to the wishes of all his confederates: that his kingdom, torn with the convulsions and civil wars of near half a century, required some interval of repose, ere it could reach a condition in which it might sustain itself, without more help than its allies. 111 after the minds of his subjects were composed to tranquillity, and accustomed to obedience, after his finances were brought into order, and after agriculture and the arts were restored, France, and the idea of being ruinous to his kingdom, if he, his confederates, would be able to lend them effectual succor, and amply to repay them all the assistance which he had received during her calamities: and that, if the ambition of the traitor, and the restless desire the traitor, and that, as that of his debauches the original ground of the quarrel, it was unsafe, as well as dishonourable, to abandon its cause, till she had placed it in a state of greater security.

These reasons were frequently insinuated the Earl of Essex, whose passion for glory, as well as his military talents, made him earnestly to desire the termination of war, and to the term of peace so potent a monarch and government was, that none of his enemies had ever been able to impeach his credit. But his lofty spirit could ill submit to that implicit deference which her temper required, and which she had ever been accustomed to receive from his subjects. Being once engaged in a dispute with her, about the choice of a governor for Ireland, he was so heated in the argument, that he entirely forgot the rules both of his country and of his treaty, in turning them to contemptuous manner. Her anger, naturally prompt and violent, rose at this provocation; and she instantly gave him a box on the ear; adding a passionate expression, suited to his impertinence. Instead of reflecting himself, and making the submissions due to her an addressed station, he clipped his hand to his sword, and swore, that he would not bear such usage, were he from Henry VIII. himself; and he immediately withdrew from court. Eger-

The ambassadors were sensible that these reasons were not foigned: and they therefore remonstrated with the less vehemence against the measures which they saw Henry was determined to pursue. The States knew that that monarch was interested never to permit their ruin; and, having received private assurances that he would still, notwithstanding the peace, give them assistance, both of men and money, they were well pleased to receive him, on terms of being benevolently disposed to, and concerned in, to give satisfaction to Elizabeth, for this breach of treaty. He had a cordial esteem for that princess, a sympathy of manners, and a gratitude for the extraordinary and beneficial favors which, during her greatest difficulties: and he used every expedient to apologize and atone for the measure which necessity extorted from him. But as Spain refused to treat with the Dutch as a free state, he would not negotiate with his ally, Henry, having found himself obliged to conclude at Ver-

Peace of Vervins is inferior to his military talents; and in a little time, by his frugality, order, and wise government, he raised France from the desolations in which she was involved, to a more flourishing condition than she had ever before enjoyed.

The queen knew that she could also, whenever she pleased, finish the war on equitable terms; and that Philip, having no claims upon her, would be glad to free himself from an enemy who had foiled him in every contest, and who still had so much in her power to make him sensible of his snares and error: But this was not the state of his counsellors, particularly the treasurer, advised her to embrace pacific measures; and set before her the advantages of tranquillity, security, and frugality, as more considerable than any success which could attend the greatest victories. This high-spirited princess, though at first averse to war, seemed now to have attained such an ascendant over the enemy, that she was unwilling to stop the progress of her prosperous fortune. She considered, that her situation and her past victories had given her entire security against any dangerous invasion; and the war must thenceforth be conducted by sudden enterprises and naval expeditions, in which she possessed an undoubted and unchallenged advantage. She had his high and weak condition of his country, which in the Indies opened to her the view of the most durable advantages; and the yearly return of his treasure by sea afforded her a continued prospect of important, though more temporary advantage after success. To maintain his peace with France, if she also should consent to an accommodation, he would have been able to turn his whole force against the revolted provinces of the Netherlands, which, though they had surprisingly increased their power by commerce and good government, were still unable, if not supported by their confederates, to maintain an active war. She, therefore, and that, as that of his debauches the original ground of the quarrel, it was unsafe, as well as dishonourable, to abandon its cause, till she had placed it in a state of greater security.

These reasons were frequently insinuated the Earl of Essex, whose passion for glory, as well as his military talents, made him earnestly to desire the termination of war, and to the term of peace so potent a monarch and government was, that none of his enemies had ever been able to impeach his credit. Instead of reflecting himself, and making the submissions due to her an addressed station, he clipped his hand to his sword, and swore, that he would not bear such usage, were he from Henry VIII. himself; and he immediately withdrew from court. Eger-
This spirited letter was shown by Essex to his friends, and they were so imprudent as to disperse copies of it. Yet, notwithstanding this additional provocation, the queen's partiality was so prevalent, that she reinstated him in his former favour; and her kindness to him appeared rather to have acquired new force from this short interval of anger and resentment. The death of his father, which happened about the same time, seemed to insure him constant possession of the queen's confidence; and nothing, indeed, but his own indiscretion, could therefore have shaken his hold of his post. Lord Burleigh died in an advanced age; and, by a rare fortune, was equally regretted by his sovereign and the people. He had been gradually, from small beginnings, by the mere force of merit; and though his authority was never entirely absolute or uncontrollable with the queen, he was still, during the course of near forty years, regarded as her principal minister. None of her other inclinations or affections could ever overcome her confidence in so useful a counsellor; and as he had had the generosity of good sense to pay unavailing court to her during her sister's reign, when it was dangerous to appear her friend, she thought herself bound in gratitude, when she mounted the throne, to persevere in her attachment to him. He seems not to have possessed any existing talents of address, eloquence, or imagination; and was chiefly distinguished by solidity of understanding, probity of manners, and indefatigable application in business; while it appears they did not always enable a man to maintain high stations, do certainly qualify him best for filling them. Of all the queen's ministers, he alone left a considerable fortune to his posterity; a fortune not acquired by rapine or oppression, but gained by the regular profits of his offices, and preserved from frugality.

The last act of this amiable minister was the concluding of a new treaty with the Dutch; who, after being in some measure deserted by the King of France, were glad to preserve the queen's influence, by submitting to any terms which she pleased to require of them. The debt which they owed her was now settled at eight hundred thousand pounds; of whom they agreed to pay, during the war, sixty thousand pounds a year; and these payments were to continue till four hundred thousand pounds of the debt should be extinguished. They engaged also, during the time that England should continue at war with Spain, to pay the garrisons of the cauutionary towns. They stipulated, that if Spain should invade England, or the Isle of Wight, or Jersey, or Scilly, they should assist her with a body of five thousand foot, and four hundred horse; and that she should undertake any naval armament against Spain, they should join an equal number of ships to her. By this treaty, the queen was eased of an annual charge of a hundred and twenty thousand pounds.

The more civil death of Burleigh, the queen, who regrettted extremely the loss of so wise and faithful a minister, was informed of the death of her capital enemy, Philip II. who, after languishing under many infirmities, expired, in an advanced age, at Madrid. This haughty prince, de- sireous of an accommodation with his revoked subjects in the Netherlands, but disdaining to make in his own name the concessions necessary for that purpose, had transmitted to his daughter, married to Archduke Albert, the title to the Low Country provinces; but as it was not expected that this princess could have posterity, and as the reversion on failure of her issue was still reserved to pertuss, or wearing the false budge or mask, of the shadow of honour? Do I give respite or extension to the foreign foe, because I reserve myself to associate with him? Or because I keep my heart from business, though I cannot get my fortune from devoting it? No, my good Lord. I give my fortune to the common foe, because I reserve myself to associate with him. Nor do I suffer my name in the court of the house, though I cannot do it without risk. I have not a natural inclination to court society, to the court, but I have a patriotic inclination. I thought I might half it. The unspeakable duty which I owe to her majesty I cannot perform, and I have not interest, but never said I that the duty of attendance is an irremediable duty. I owe her majesty the duty of the ear, and of Lord Mayor of England. I have been

I have it in my power to be the Bawdy, so I do for now that I as the storm come, I have put myself into the hands of her majesty. Senate halls, we must go with fortune. I hope that time is both blind and strong, and therefore I am so far as I am out of her majesty's eye. I am not a man of that private life. I am used to my country by two hundred, one public, to do the office of a great subject. I am used to the other public, to do the private, to sacrifice for the office of my life and fortune, which hath been used to me in my brotherhood of the garter. I am not disabled by her majesty; of the other, nothing can free me but death; and neither shall I be a subject of her majesty till I shall meet it half. The unspeakable duty which I owe to her majesty I cannot perform, and I have not interest, but never said I that the duty of attendance is an irremediable duty. the crown of Spain, the States considered this deed only as the change of a name, and they persisted with equal obstinacy in their resistance to the Spanish arms. The other powers also of Europe made no distinction between the courts of Brussels and Madrid; and the secret opposition of France, as well as the avowed efforts of England, continued to operate against the progress of Albert, as it had done against that of Philip.

State of Ireland—Tyrono's Rebellion—Exertions sent over to Ireland—His success—Relations with Spain—Is diseased—His intrigue—His insurrection—His trial and execution—His effect—Arraignments of the Spaniards and Irish—A parliament—Tyrono's suicide—Queen's sickness—and death—

Though the dominion of the English over Ireland had been seemingly established above four centuries, it may safely be affirmed, that their authority had hitherto been little more than nominal. The Irish princes and nobles, divided among themselves, were too weak to be paid the allegiance of obedience among the rude inhabitants, the English authority was yet sufficient to check the growth of any enterprising genius among the natives: and though it could bestow no true form of civil government, it was able to prevent the rise of any such form, from the internal commotion or policy of the Irish.

Most of the English institutions, likewise, by which that island was governed, were so absolute and severe, as perhaps neglected all other enterprises, to which their situation so strongly invited them; and which, in time would have brought them an admission of riches, grandeur, and security. The small army which they maintained in Ireland they never supplied regularly with pay; and so money could be levied on the island which possessed none, they gave their soldiers the privilege of free quarter upon the natives, and the natives were taught the art of drunkenness, which prevailed between the conquerors and the conquered: want of security among the Irish, introducing despair, nourished still more the same to that uncivilized people.

But the English engaged further their ill-judged tyranny. Instead of inviting the Irish to adopt their institutions, customs of their conquerors, they even refused, though earnestly solicited, to communicate to them the privileges of their laws, and every where marked them out as aliens and as enemies. Thrown out of the protection of justice, the natives could find no security but in force; and flying the neighbourhood of cities, which they could not approach with safety, they sheltered themselves in their marshes and forests from the insolence of their inhuman masters. Being treated like wild beasts, they became such; and joining the ardour of revenge to their yet untamed barbarity, they grew every day more intractable and more dangerous.
As the English princes deemed the conquest of the dispersed Irish to be more the object of time and patience than the source of military glory, they willingly delegated that object to their deputies, who were Irish, and who made their own charge, reduced provinces of that island, which they converted to their own profit. Separate jurisdictions and principalities were established by these lordly conquerors: the power of peace and war was assumed; military institutions, foreign to the Irish people, were introduced; and by degrees over the English, by whose assistance they conquered; and, after their authority had once taken root, deeming the English institutions less favourable to barbarous institutions, they despised the laws of the English, abandoned the garrisons, languages, manners, and laws of their mother-country.

By all this imperious conduct of England, the natives of its dependent state remained still in that abject condition, into which the northern and western parts of Europe were sunk before they received civility and slavery from the refined policy and irresistible bravery of Rome. Even at the close of the sixteenth century, when every Christian nation was cultivating with ardour every civil art of life, that island, lying in a temperate climate, enjoying a fertile soil, accessible in its situation, possessed of innumerable harbours, was still, notwithstanding these advantages, mired in barbarism. Had it been in Europe had been seized at the beginning of that century, and which had engaged them in innovations and religious disputes with which they were still so violently agitated. The ancient superstition, the practices and observances of their fathers, mingled and polluted with many wild opinions, still maintained an unshaken empire over them; and the example alone of the English was sufficient to render the revolution odious to the prejudiced and discontented Irish. The old civilization, manners, laws, and interest, was now infamed by religious antipathy; and the subduing and civilizing of that country seemed to become every day more difficult and more impracticable.

The animosity against the English was carried so far by the Irish, that, in an insurrection raised by two sons of the Earl of Clanearne, they put to the sword all the inhabitants of the town of Athboy, though Irish, because they began to conform themselves to English customs, and had embraced a more civilized form of life than had been practised by their ancestors.

The usual revenue of Ireland amounted only to six thousand crowns a year, and pounds a queen, though with much repining, commonly added two thousand more, which she remitted from England; and with this small revenue a body of a thousand men was supported, which on extraordinary emergencies was augmented to two thousand.

No wonder that a force so disproportioned to the object, instead of subduing a mutinous kingdom, served rather to provoke the natives, and to excite those frequent insurrections, which still further inflamed the animosity between the two nations, and increased the disorders to which the Irish were naturally subject.

In 1560, Shan O’Neile, or the Great O’Neile, as the Irish called him, because head of that potent clan, raised a rebellion in Ulster. Though some skirmishes he received into favour, upon his submission, his promise of a more dutiful behaviour for the future. This impinuity tempted him to undertake a new insurrection in 1567; but, being pushed by Sir Henry Sidney, lord deputy, he retreated into Claneboye, and rather than submit to the English, he put himself into the bands of some Scottish noblemen, who commonly infested those parts by their incursions. The Scots, who retained a quartered against him on account of former services, violated the laws of hospitality, and murdered him at a festival to which they had invited him. He was a man equally noted for his pride, his violence, his debaucheries, and his hatred to the English nation. He is said to have put some of his followers to death because they endeavoured to introduce the use of broad after the English fashion. Though so violent an enemy to luxury as to put on a white shirt to riot; and was accused, after his intemperance had thrown him into a fever, to plunge his body into fire, that he might allay the flame which he had raised by former excesses.

Such was the life led by this haughty barbarian, who scorned the titles of Earl and Marquis in order to maintain the rank and appellation of King of Ulster. He used also to say, that though the queen was his sovereign lady, he never made peace with her but after warning.

Sir Henry Sidney was one of the wisest and most active governors that Ireland had enjoyed for several reigns, and he possessed his authority eleven years, during which he struggled with many difficulties, and made some progress in repressing those disorders which had become ineradicable among the people. The Earl of Desmond, in 1569, gave him disturbance, from the hereditary animosity which prevailed between that nobleman and the Earl of Ormond, descended from the only family established in Ireland, that had steadily maintained its loyalty to the English crown. The Earl of Thomond, in 1570, attempted a rebellion in Connaught, but was obliged to fly to France before his forces were joined by a powerful body of the English; and, another fugitive, found such credit with the Pope, Gregory the thirteenth, that he flushed that pontiff with the prospect of making his nephew, Buon Cuccagno, King of Ireland, and the administration of his government was taken by the Marquis of Leinster from the new sovereign. He passed next into Spain; and after having received much encouragement and great rewards from Philip, who intended to employ him as an instrument in disturbing Elizabeth, he was found to possess too little interest for executing those high promises which he had made to that monarch. He retired into Portugal; and following the fortunes of Don Sebastian, he perished with that gallant prince in his bold but unfortunate expedition against the Moors.

Lord Gray, after some interval, succeeded to the government of Ireland; and, in 1578, suppressed a new rebellion of the Earl of Desmond, though supported by a body of Spaniards and Italians. The rebellion of the Bourkes followed a few years after; occasioned by the strict and equitable administration of Sir Richard Bingham, governor of Connaught, who endeavoured to suppress the temper of the chieftains over their vassals. The queen, finding Ireland so burdensome to her, tried several expedients for reducing it to a state of greater order and submission. She encouraged the Earl of Essex, father to that nobleman who was afterwards her favorite, to the planting of Clandeboye, Ferny, and other territories, part of some late forfeitures: but that enterprize proved unfortunate; and Essex died of a distemper occasioned, it is supposed, by the vexation which he had conceived from his disappointments. An university was founded in Dublin with a view of introducing arts and learning into that kingdom, and civilizing the uncultivated manners of the inhabitants. But the most unhappy expedition employed in the government of Ireland, was that made use of in 1585, by Sir John Perrot, at that time lord deputy; he put arms into the hands of the Irish inhabitants of Ulster, in order to enable them, without the assistance of the government, to repress the insurrections of the Scottish invaders, by which these parts were much infested. At the same time, the invitation of Philip, joined to their zeal for the catholic religion, engaged many of the gentry to serve in the Low Country wars; and thus Ireland, being provided with officers and soldiers, with discipline and arms, became formidable to the English, and was thenceforth able to maintain a more regular war against her ancient masters.

Hugh O’Neale, nephew to Shan O’Neale, Tyrone’s rebellion, had been raised by the queen to the dignity of Earl of Tyrone: but, having murdered his cousin, son... of that rebel, and being acknowledged head of his clan, he preferred the pride of barbarous licence and domination to the pleasures of opulence and tranquillity, and he fomented and supported it by which he hoped to weaken and overturn the English government. He was noted for the vice of perfidy and cruelty, so common among uncultivated nations; and was also eminent for courage, a virtue which their disorderly course of life requires, and which, notwithstanding these defecting, less supported by the principle of honour, is commonly more precariously among them, than among a civilized people. Tyrone, actuated by this spirit, secretly fomented the discontentments of the Maguires, O'Donnels, Bourks, Macmahons, and other rebels; and, trusting to the influence of his deceitful oaths and professions, he put himself into the hands of Sir William Russell, who, in the year 1594, was sent over deputy to Ireland. Contrary to the advice and protestation of Sir Henry Bagnal, marshal of the army, he was dismissed; and, returning to his own country, he embraced the resolution of raising an open rebellion, and of relxing no longer on the lenity or inexperience of the English government. He entered into a correspondence with Spain; he procured thence a supply of arms and ammunition; and, having united all the Irish chieftains in a dependence upon himself, he began to be regarded as a formidable enemy. For the English, there were of their wealth, more few other commodities than cattle and oatmeal, which were easily concealed or driven away on the approach of the enemy; and as Elizabeth was averse to the expense required for supporting her armies, much difficulty in pushing their advantages, and in pursuing the rebels into the bogs, woods, and other fastnesses, to which they retreated. These motives rendered Sir John Norns, who commanded the English army, the more willing to hearken to any proposals of truce or accommodation made him by Tyrone; and after the war was spun out by these artifices for some years, that gallant Englishman, finding that he had been deceived by treacherous promises, and that he had parted with nothing worse than his reputation, was seized with a languishing distemper, and died of vexation and discontent. Sir Henry Bagnal, who succeeded him in the command, was still more unfortunate. As he advanced to relieve the fort of Blackwater, besieged by the rebels, he was surprised in disadvantageous ground; his soldiers, discouraged by part of their powder accidentally falling fire, were put to flight; and though the pursuit was stopped by Moniacate, who commanded the English horse, fifteen hundred men, together with the general himself, were left dead upon the spot. This victory, so unusual to the Irish, roused their confidence; and with arms raised the reputation of Tyrone, who assumed the character of the deliverer of his country, and patron of Irish liberty.

The English council were now sensible, that the rebellion of Ireland was come to a dangerous head, and that the former temporizing arts of gaining truces and pacifications to the rebels, and of allowing them to purchase pardons by resigning part of the plunder acquired during their insurrection, served only to encourage the spirit of mutiny and disorder among them. It was therefore resolved to push the war by more vigorous measures; and the queen cast her eye on Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, as a man, who, though hitherto less accustomed to arms than to books and literature, was endowed with talents equal to the undertaking. But the young Earl of Essex, ambitious of fame, and desirous of obtaining this government for himself, opposed the choice of Mountjoy; and represented the necessity of appointing for that important employment some person more experienced in war than this nobleman, more practised in business, and of higher quality and reputation. By this description, he was understood to mean himself; and no secret was known, than the envious jealousy of his friends, conspired to gratify his wishes. Many of his friends thought that he never ought to consent, except for a short time, to accept of any employment which did not advance him from court, but who was cultivating that personal inclination which the queen so visibly bore him.\(^1\) His enemies hoped, that if by his absence she had once leisure to forget the charms of his person and conversation, his impatient and lofty demeanour would be made to be observed; and that she might, without any more consentiing to the utmost of his request, yield up her profound submission and implicit obedience from all her servants. But Essex was incapable of entering into such cautious views; and even Elizabeth, who was extremely desirous of subduing the Irish rebels, and who was much more disposed to give the precedence and authority to him, did not appoint him governor of Ireland, by the title of Lord Lieutenant. The more to encourage him in his undertaking, she granted him by his patent more extensive authority than had ever before been conferred on any lieutenant; the power of carrying on or finishing the war as he pleased, of pardoning the rebels, and of filling all the most considerable employments of the kingdom.\(^2\) And to insure him of success, she levied a numerous army of sixteen thousand foot, and thirteen hundred horse, which she afterwards augmented to twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse; a force, which it was pretended would be able in one campaign to overwhelm the rebels, and make an entire conquest of Ireland.

Nor did Essex's enemies, the Earl of Nottingham, Sir Robert Cecil, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Lord Cobham, throw any obstacles in the way of these preparations; but hoped, that the rebellion would be put down, before Essex was raised, the more difficult it would be for the event to correspond to them. In a like view, they rather seconded than opposed those excited enmities, which Essex's numerous and good troops, his English friends, and his genius, of his elegant endowments, his heroic courage, his unbounded generosity, and his noble birth; nor were they displeased to observe that passionate fondness which the people every where expressed for this nobleman. These artful politicians had studied his character; and, finding that his open and undaunted spirit, if taught temper and reserve from opposition, must become invincible, they resolved rather to give full breath to those sots which were already become too powerful to be extinguished, in order to push him upon dangers of which he seemed to make such small account.

And, the better to make advantage of his indiscretions, spies were set upon all his actions and even expressions; and his vehement spirit, which, while he was in the midst of the court and environment of his rivals, was unaccounted with disgust, could not fail, after he thought himself surrounded by none but friends, to give a pretence for malignant suspicions and constructions.

Essex left London in the month of March, attended with the acclamations of the populace; and, what did him more honour, accompanied by a numerous train of nobility; general officers; great houses, and numbers of gentlemen, attached themselves to his fortunes, and sought fame and military experience under so renowned a commander.

The first act of authority which he exercised after his arrival in Ireland, was an indissension, but of the generous kind; and in both these respects suitable to his character. He appointed his intimate friend, the Earl of Southampton, general of the horse; a nobleman who had incurred the queen's displeasure, by secretly marrying without her consent, and whom she had therefore enjoined Essex not to employ in any command under him. She no sooner heard of this instance of disobedience, than she reprimanded him, and offered him to recall his commission to Southampton. But Essex, who had imagined the some reasons which he had opposed to her first injunctions, had satisfied her, had the impudence to remonstrate against these second orders; and it was not till she retempered her commands, that he could be prevailed upon to displace his friend.

Essex, on his landing at Dublin, deliberated with the Irish council concerning the proper methods of carrying on the war against the rebels; and having and the ten thousands, of whom had attached themselves to his fortunes, and sought fame and military experience under so renowned a commander. He appointed his intimate friend, the Earl of Southampton, general of the horse; a nobleman who had incurred the queen's displeasure, by secretly marrying without her consent, and whom she had therefore enjoined Essex not to employ in any command under him. She no sooner heard of this instance of disobedience, than she reprimanded him, and offered him to recall his commission to Southampton. But Essex, who had imagined the some reasons which he had opposed to her first injunctions, had satisfied her, had the impudence to remonstrate against these second orders; and it was not till she retempered her commands, that he could be prevailed upon to displace his friend.

Essex, on his landing at Dublin, deliberated with the Irish council concerning the proper methods of carrying on the war against the rebels; and having and the ten thousands, of whom had attached themselves to his fortunes, and sought fame and military experience under so renowned a commander. The first act of authority which he exercised after his arrival in Ireland, was an indissension, but of the generous kind; and in both these respects suitable to his character. He appointed his intimate friend, the Earl of Southampton, general of the horse; a nobleman who had incurred the queen's displeasure, by secretly marrying without her consent, and whom she had therefore enjoined Essex not to employ in any command under him. She no sooner heard of this instance of disobedience, than she reprimanded him, and offered him to recall his commission to Southampton. recruit their broken forces. In conformity to these views, he had ever insisted upon leading his forces immediately into Ulster against Tyrone, the chief enemy; and his instructions had been drawn agreeably to these his declared resolutions. But the Irish counselors persuaded him that the season was too early for the enterprise, and that as the morasses, in which the northern Irish usually sheltered themselves, were too wet to be passable to the English forces, it would be better to employ the present time in an expedition into Munster. Their secret reason for this advice was, that many of them possessed estates in that province, and were desirous to have the enemy driven into the country by the same selfish spirit which had induced them to give this counsel, made them soon after disown it, when they found the bad consequences with which it was attended.

It cannot be denied that all the forces of Munster were either to submit or fly into the neighbouring provinces; but as the Irish, from the greatness of the queen's preparations, had concluded that she intended to reduce them to total subjection, or even utterly to exterminate them, they considered their defence as a common cause; and the English forces were no sooner withdrawn than the inhabitants of Munster relapsed into rebellion, and renewed their former confidence and resistance, and so the season passed away, without the expected effect, and the forces of Munster were still far from being rendered passable to the English army, either by the fatigues of long and tedious marches, or by the influence of the climate, which was become sickly; and on its return to Dublin, about the middle of July, was surprisingly diminished in number. The courage of the southern army fell upon the conduct, discipline, and inexperience of the Irish; and this prevailed in some lesser enterprises against Lord Cairn and others, yet had they sometimes met with more stout resistance than they expected from the Irish, whom they were not in the habit of fighting. And though the Irish in the middle of the season, was so enraged at this misbehaviour, that he cushioned all the officers, and deposed the privy council; but after the army had suffered a considerable diminution in the number of men, it would be impossible for him this season to attempt any thing against Tyrone. That there might be no pretence for further inactivity, the queen immediately sent over the number demanded to Elizabeth, and Essex began at last to assemble his forces for the expedition into Ulster. The army was so averse to this enterprise, and so terrified with the reputation of Tyrone, that many of them counterfeited sickness, many of them deserted; and Essex found that, after all his orders, and his attempts to dissuade them, he could scarcely lead four thousand men against the rebels. He marched, however, with this small army; but was soon sensible that, in so advanced a season, it would be impossible for him to effect any thing against an enemy who, though superior in number, was determined to avoid every decisive action. He hesitated, therefore, to a message sent him by Tyrone, who desired a conference; and a peace negociation of the court's own. The generals met without any of their attendants, and a river ran between them, into which Tyrone entered to the depth of his saddle; but Essex stood on the opposite bank. After half an hour's conference, where Tyrone behaved with great submission to the lord-lieutenant, a cessation of arms was concluded to the first of May, renewable from six weeks to six weeks; but which might be broken off by either party upon a fortnight's warning. Essex also received from Tyrone proposals for a peace, in which that rebel had inserted many unreasonable and exorbitant conditions: and there appeared afterwards some reason to suspect that he had contrived a very unjustifiable correspondence with the enemy.

So unexpected an issue of an enterprise, the greatest and most expensive that Elizabeth had ever undertaken, provoked her extremely against Essex; and this disgust was much augmented by other circumstances of that unfortunate man's conduct. He wrote many letters to the queen and council, full of peevish and impatient expressions; complaining of his enemies, lamenting that their calumnies should be believed, and alleging a mind equally haughty and discontented. She took care to inform him of her dissatisfaction; but commanded him to remain in Ireland till further orders.

Essex heard at once of Elizabeth's anger, and of the promotion of his enemy, Sir Robert Cecil, to the office of master of the wards, an office to which he himself aspired; and dreading that, if he remained any longer absent, the queen might have the skill and art of the court to advance himself, he embraced a resolution which he knew had once succeeded with the Earl of Leicester, the former favourite of Elizabeth. Leicester being informed, while in the Low Countries, that his mistress was extremely disaffected with his conduct, disobeyed the orders which were sent against him, and having pacified her by his apologies, and by his flattery and insinuation, disappointed all the expectations of his enemies. Essex, therefore, returned to Ireland, where he was much less respected than the great Leicester, yet the difference of character between himself and Leicester, immediately set out for England; and, making speedy journeys, he arrived at court before any one was in the least prepared of his intentions. When besaddled with dirt and sweat, he was sent to the privy chamber; then to the court: or, being favoured with the queen's audience, he was sent to the great chamber, where he was so graciously received, that, on his departure he was heard to express great satisfaction, and to thank God that, though he had suffered much trouble and many storms abroad, he found a sweet calm at home.

But this placability of Elizabeth was merely the result of her surprise, and of the momentary satisfaction which she derived from this unexpected and unexpected event: as the queen's favourite: after she had leisure for recollection, all his faults recurred to her; and she thought it necessary, by some severe discipline, to subdue that haughty, impetuous spirit, which, possessing the interest of both the army and the nation, and domineering in her councils, to engross all her favour, and to act in the most important affairs, without regard to her orders and instructions. When Essex waited on her in the afternoon, he found her extremely altered in her carriage towards him. She ordered him to be confined to his chamber; to be twice examined by the council; and though his answers were calm and submissive, she committed him to the custody of Lord Keeper Egerton, and held him sequestered from all company; even from that of his countess, nor was so much as the intercourse of letters permitted between them. Essex dropped many expressions of humiliation and sorrow, none of resentment; he professed an entire submission to the queen's will; declared his intention of retiring into the country, and of leading thenceforth a private life, remote from courts and business: but though he affected to be so entirely humbled, he expressed the vexation of this disappointment, and of the triumph gained by his enemies, proved upon his haughty spirit, and he fell into a diestem which seemed to put his life in danger.

The queen had always declared to all the world, and even to the ear itself, that the purpose of her severity was to correct, not to ruin him; and when she heard of his sickness, she was not a little alarmed with his situation. She ordered eight physicians of the best reputation, and experience to consult his case; and being informed that the issue was much to be apprehended, she sent Dr. James to him with some broth, and desired that physician to make a dressing which she probably desired. She still greater virtue, that if she thought such a step consistent with her honour, she would herself pay him a visit. The bystanders, who carefully observed her countenance, remarked, that in pronouncing these words, her eyes were suddenly filled with tears.

When the symptoms of the queen's returning affection towards Essex were known, they gave a sensible alarm to the faction which had declared their opposition to him. Sir Walter Raleigh, in particular, the most vivid as well as the most ambitious of his enemies, was so affected with the appearance of this sudden revolution, that he was seized with sickness in his turn; and the queen was obliged to apply the same salve to his wound, and to send him a favourable message, expressing her desire of his recovery. A.D. 1600.

The medicine which the queen administered to him, and treatment which was successful with both; and Essex being now allowed the company of his countess, and having entertained more promising hopes of his future fortunes, was so much restored in his health as to be thought past danger. A belief was instilled into Essex, that the queen's attention had been altered in order to move her compassion; and she relapsed into her former rigour against him. He wrote her a letter, and sent her a rich present on new-year's day, as was usual with that monarch at that time; but she deserted the letter, and rejected the present. After some interval, however, of severity, she allowed him to retire to his own house; and though he remained still under custody, and was sequestered from his companies, he was grateful for this mark of lenity, that he sent her a letter of thanks on the occasion. "This further degree of good-will," said he, "doth sound in my ears as if your majesty spake these words: Do not, Essex; for the love that speaketh this offence, and humble thee for thy good, yet will I one day be served again by thee. My prostrate soul makes this answer: I hope for that blessed day. And in expectation of it, all my afflictions of body and mind are humbly, patiently, and cheerfully borne by me." The Countess of Essex, daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham, possessed, as well as her husband, a refined taste in literature; and the chief consolation which Essex enjoyed during this period of anxiety, was the intercourse, continued, and in reading with her those instructive and entertaining authors, which, even during the time of his greatest prosperity, he had never entirely neglected.

There were several incidents which lent air to the queen's anger against Essex. Every account which she received from Ireland, convinced her more and more of his misconduct in that government, and of the insignificant purposes to which he had employed so much force and treasure. Tyrone, so far from being quelled, had thought proper, in less than three months, to break the truce; and, joining with O'Donel and other rebels, had over-run almost the whole kingdom. He boasted that he was certain of receiving a supply of men, money, and arms, from Spain: he pretended to be champion of the catholic religion: he openly exulted in the present of a phrenetic plume, which the Popes, Clement VIII, in order to encourage him in the prosecution of so good a cause, had consecrated, and had conferred upon him. The queen, that she might check his progress, returned to her former intention of appointing Montjoy lord deputy; and though the queen knew that Essex was desirous of retaining his government to the Ireland, did at first very earnestly excuse himself, on account of his state of health; she obliged him to accept of the employment. Montjoy was island almost in a desperate condition; but being a man of capacity and vigour, he was so little discouraged, that he immediately advanced against Tyrone in Ulster. He penetrated into the heart of that country, the chief seat of the rebels: he fortified Derry and Mount-Norris, in order to blockade the Irish; he chased them from the field, and obliged them to take shelter in the woods and morasses: he employed, with equal success, Sir George Carew in Munster: and by these promising successes, he gave new life to the queen's authority in that island.

As the comparison of Montjoy's administration with that of Essex contributed to alienate Elizabeth from her favourite, she recured (if we may use the term) from the partiality of those, who, possessed with an extravagant idea of Essex's merit, complained of the injustice done him by his removal from court, and by his confinement. Labels were secretly dispersed against Cecil and Raleigh, and all endeavours were taken to exalt the queen's authority, and to lessen that of Essex; who, great, seemed rather to be increased than diminished by his misfortunes. Elizabeth, in order to justify to the public her conduct with regard to him, had often expressed her intentions of having him tried in the star-chamber for his offences: but her tenderness for him prevailed at last over her severity; and she was contented to have him only examined by the privy-council. The attorney-general, as a personal friend of Essex, and as a man to whom he had brought him to the cruelty and insolence which that great lawyer usually exercised against the unfortunate. He displayed, in the strongest colours, all the faults committed by Essex in his administration of Ireland: his making Southampton a general rendezvous of his forces, instead of his descenting the enterprise against Tyrone, and marching to Leinster and Munster; his conferring knighthood on too many persons; his secret conference with Tyrone; and his sudden return from his expedition. She was assisted in her majesty's commands. He also exaggrated the indignity of the conditions which Tyrone had been allowed to propose; odious and abominable conditions, said he; a public toleration of an idolatrous religion, pardon for those who ever revered and every traitor in Ireland, and full restitution of lands and possessions to all of them. The solicitor-general, Fleming, insisted upon the wretched situation in which the Earl had left that kingdom; and found himself in the hands of Sir Nicholas Bacon, who had been lord-keeper in the beginning of the present reign, closed the charge, with displaying the unctuous expressions contained in some letters written by the earl.

Essex, when he came to plead in his own defence, renounced, with great submission and humility, all pretensions to an apology; and declared his resolution never, on this or any other occasion, to have any contest with his majesty's government, or to hazard his name in the world, and abjured all sentiments of ambition, he had no scruple to confess every failing or error into which his youth, folly, or manifold misfortunes might have betrayed him; that he had appeared to be a man of preference; and that the majesty was so profound, that it exceeded all his outward crosses and afflictions, nor had he any scruple of submitting to a public confession of whatever he had been pleased to impute to him; that in his acknowledgments he returned only one reserve, which he never would relinquish but with his life, the assertion of a loyal and unpolluted heart, of an unfeigned affection, of an earnest desire ever to perform to her majesty the best service which his poor abilities would allow him; and this he would in future always support by the council, he willingly acquiesced in any condemnation or sentence which they could pronounce against him. This submission was uttered with so much eloquence, and in so pathetic a manner, that it drew tears from many of the audience. All the privy-counsellors, in giving their judgment, made no scruple of doing the earl justice with regard to the loyalty of his intentions. Even Cecil, whom the beauty of the capital enemy, treated him with regard and humanity. And the sentence pronounced by the lord-keeper (to which the council assented) was in these words: "If this cause," said he, "had been heard in the star-chamber, my sentence must have been so great a fine as ever was set upon any man's head in that or any other with perpetual confinement in that prison which belonged to a man of his quality, the Tower. But since we are now in another place, and in a course of favour, my censure is, that the Earl of Essex is not to execute the office of a counsellor, nor that of earl marshal of England, nor master of the ordnance; and to return to his own house, there to continue a prisoner till it shall please her majesty to release this and all the rest of his sentence." The Earl of Camden, in a minute discourse on this sentence; and said, that if he thought it would stand, he would have required a little more time to deliberate; that he deemed it somewhat severe; and that any commander in chief might command what he pleased, his majesty's confidence of his majesty's mercy, I agree with the rest. The Earl of Worcester delivered his opinion in a couple of Latin verses; importing that, where the gods are offended, even misfortunes ought to be imputed as crimes, and that accidence is no excuse for transgressions against the Divinity.

Bacon, so much distinguished afterwards by his high offices, and still more by his profound genius for the sciences, was nearly allied to the Cecil family, being nephew to Lord Burleigh, and cousin-german to the secretary: but notwithstanding his extraordinary talents, he had met with so little protection from his powerful relations, that he had so frequently incurred the displeasure of the whole court, which was his profession. But Essex, who could distinguish merit, and who passionately loved it, had entered into an intimate friendship with Bacon, had zealously attempted, though with a high hand, to perform his duty as successor-general: and, in order to comfort his under the disappointment, had conferred on him a present of land to the value of eighteen hundred pounds. The public could ill excuse Bacon's appearance before the council against so magnificent a benefactor, though he acted in obedience to the queen's commands: but she was so well pleased with his behaviour, that she imposed on him a new task, of drawing a narrative of that day's proceedings, in order to satisfy the people of the nature of her conduct. Bacon, who wanted firmness of character more than humanity, gave to the whole transaction the most favourable turn for Essex; and, in particular, pointed out, in elaborate expression, the dutiful submission which that nobleman discovered in the defence that he made for his conduct. When he read the paper to her, she smiled at that passage, and observed to Bacon, that old love, she saw, could not easily be forgotten. He replied, that he hoped she meant that of herself.

All the world indeed expected that Essex would soon be reinstated in his former credit; perhaps, as is usual in reconstructions founded on inclination, would require an additional assurance of his friendship. But the Earl of Essex's disapprobation of that conduct would again appear more a favourite than ever.

They were confirmed in this hope when they saw that, though he was still prohibited from appearing at court, he was continued in his office of master of horse, and was restored to his liberty, and that all his friends had access to him. Essex himself seemed determined to persevere in that conduct which had hitherto been so successful, and which the queen, by all this discipline, had endeavoured to render habitual to him; he wrote to her, that he kissed her majesty's hands, and the rod with which she had corrected him; but that he could never recover his wonted cheerful spirits, unless he should be permitted to that present which had ever been the chief source of his happiness and enjoyment; and that he had now resolved to make amends for his past errors, to retire into a country solitude, and say with the poet, "Let me eat grass as an ox, and be wet with the dew of heaven, till it shall please the queen to restore me to my understanding." The queen was much pleased with these sentiments, and replied, that she heartily wished his health, prosperity, and happiness; that he had tried her patience a long time, and it was but fitting she should now make some experiment of his submission; that her father would never have pardoned so much obstinacy; but that, if the furnace of affliction produced such good effects, she should ever after have the better opinion of him. The Earl of Essex possessed a monopoly of sweet wines; and as his patent was near expiring, he impatiently expected that the queen would renew it, and he considered this as preventing the accession of his life, which would likely determine whether he could ever hope to be reinstated in credit and authority. But Elizabeth, though gracious in her deportment, was of a temper somewhat haughty and severe; and before her unusuallygrandeur, her enemies, means were found to persuade her, that his lofty spirit was not sufficiently subdued, and that he must undergo this further trial, before he could again be safely received into favour. She therefore denied his request; and even added, in a contemptuous style, that an ungovernable beast must be msted in his provender.

This rigour, pushed one step too far, proved his untimely end. The final ruin of this young nobleman, and was the source of infinite sorrow and woe to the queen herself. Essex, who had with great difficulty so long subdued his proud spirit, and whose patience was now exhausted, imagining that the queen was entirely wearied of the business, quitted at once all illusory attempts of extenuating his fault, and determined to seek relief by proceeding to the utmost extremities against his enemies. Even during his greatest favour, he had ever been accustomed to carry matters in his own way, and to have spared not his own life to gratify his own temper, and was sometimes successful, he had imprudently imagined that it was the only proper method of managing her. But, being now reduced to despair, he gave utter reins to his violent dispositions, and threw off all appearance of duty and respect. Intoxicated with the public favour, which he already possessed, he practised anew every art of popularity; and endeavoured to increase the general good-will, by a hospitable manner of life, little observed by the Queen. Her conduct. His former employments had given him great connexions with men of the military profession; and he now entertained, by additional caresses and civilities, a friendship with all despised adventurers, whose attachment he hoped might, in his present views, prove serviceable to him. He secretly counted the confidence of the catholics; but his chief trust lay in the puritans, whom he openly caressed, and whose manners he seemed to have entirely adopted. He engaged the most celebrated preachers of that sect to resort to Essex-house; he had daily prayers and sermons in his family; and he invited all the zealous in London to attend those pious exercises. Such was his procedure, now beginning to resemble, though not among the English, that instead of feasting and public spectacles, the methods ancienly practised to gain the populace, nothing so effectually ingratiated an ambitious leader with the public, as these farcical entertainments. And as the puritanical preachers frequently inculcated in their sermons the doctrine of resistance to the civil magistrate, they prepared the minds of their hearers for those seditious projects which Essex was secretly meditating.

But the greatest imprudence of this nobleman proceeded from the openness of his temper, by which he was ill qualified to succeed in such difficult and dangerous enterprizes. He indulged himself in great liberties of speech, and was even heard to say of the queen, that she was now grown an old woman, and was become as crooked in her mind as in her body. Some court ladies, whose favours Essex had for many years been in the sole enjoyment of, and increased him to a high degree against him. Elizabeth was ever remarkably jealous on this head; and though she was now approaching to her seventeenth year, she allowed her courtiers; and even foreign ambassadors, to compliment her with her beauty, the utmost sense of having been able to cure her of this preposterous vanity.\footnote{Sidney Letters, vol. iv. p. 171. 1 Most of Queen Elizabeth's courtiers hoped love and desire towards her, and addressed her in a style of attachment and adoration, Sir Walter Raleigh, having fallen into disgrace, wrote the following letter to his friend, Sir Heneage Finch, in which, no doubt, he is not envious to the queen. There was also an expeditious employed by Essex, which, if possible, was more provoking to the queen than those sarcasms on her age and deformity; and that was, his secret applications to the King of Scots, her heir and successor. Essex and the plot were thereupon known in the most impertinent manner, as dangerous, though ill-formed, crisis of the Earl of Gosse; and even his deliverance was attended with this disagreeable circumstance, that the obstinate ecclesiastics persecuted him, of the most inconsiderable evidence, to maintain his face, that there had been no such conscience. James, harassed with his turbulent and faction subjects, cast a wishful eye to the succession of England; and though his heart might never have erred into the same, his advice was sure increased of mounting those throns, on which, besides acquiring a great addition of power and splendour, he hoped to govern a people so much more tractable and submissive, in order to insure himself friends and partisans; he even neglected not the court of Rome and that of Spain; and though he engaged himself in no positive promise, he flustered the catholics with hopes that, in the event of his succession, they might expect some more liberty than was at present indulged them. Elizabeth was the only sovereign in Europe to whom he never dared to mention his right of succession; he knew that, though her advanced age might not, in the event of fixing an heir, he never could bear the prospect of her own death without horror, and was determined still to retain him, and all other competitors, in an entire dependence upon her.

He was surrounded by families the royal family; and some of his savage partisans had been so imprudent as to mention his name among those of other pretenders to the crown; but the earl took care, by means of Henry Lord Cobham, who had lately sent into Scotland, to assure James, that so far from entertaining such ambitious views, he was determined to use every expedient for expediting an immediate declaration in favour of that monarch's right of succession; and firmly broke the foundation of this proposition, but did not approve of the violent methods which Essex intended to employ. Essex had communicated his scheme to Mountjoy, deputy of Ireland; and as no man ever consulted, the cordial affection and attachment of his friends, he had even engaged a person of that virtue and prudence to entertain thoughts of bringing over part of his army into England, and of forcing the queen to declare the King of Scots her successor. And such was Essex's presumption, that, though James declined this expeditious expedient, he still endeavoured to persuade Mountjoy not to desist from the project: but the deputy, who thought that such violence, though it might be prudent, and which was sometimes used formerly, when supported by a sovereign printing, was, when next to the crown, would be rash and criminal, if attempted by subjects, absolutely refused his concurrence. The correspondence, however, between Essex and the court of Scotland, was still conducted with great secrecy and cordiality; and that nobleman, besides conciliating the favour of James, represented all his own adversaries as enemies to that prince's succession, and as men entirely devoted to the interests of Spain, and partisans of the chamferable title of the Infanta.

carried to the queen; and she sent Robert Sassicke, son of the treasurer, to Essex-house, on pretence of a visit, but in reality with a view of discovering whether there were in that place any unusual concourse of people, or any extraordinary preparations, which might threaten an insurrection. Soon after, Essex received a summons to attend the council, which met at the treasurer's house; and while he was musing on this circumstance, and comparing it with the late unexpected visit from Sassicke, a private note was conveyed to him, informing him that he was a prisoner, for his own safety. He concluded that all his conspiracy was discovered, at least suspected; and that the easiest punishment which he had reason to apprehend, was a new arrest. The severer conflagration he turned upon himself, to the council, on pretence of an indisposition, and he immediately despatched messages to his more intimate confederates, requesting their advice and assistance in the present critical situation of his affairs. They deliberated, whether they should abandon all their projects, and fly the kingdom; or instantly seize the palace, with the force which they could assemble; or rely upon the affections of the citizens, who were generally known to have a great attachment to the Earl. Essex declared against the first expedient, and professed himself determined to undergo any fate rather than submit to the loss of his fugitive. To seize the palace seemed impracticable, unless he could secure the saint; which seemed now aware of their projects, and, as they heard, had used the precaution of doubling her ordinary guards. There remained, therefore, no expedient but that of becoming an outlaw, and seeking the protection and feasibility of this resolution was under debate, a person arrived, who, as if he had received a commission for the purpose, gave them assurance of the affection of the Lords De Grey, and of a probability of some sudden rest to any project on that foundation. The popularity of Essex had chiefly buoyed him up in all his vain undertakings; and he fondly imagined, that with no other assistance than that of his friends, he might surely rest any project on that foundation. The popularity of Essex had chiefly buoyed him up in all his vain undertakings; and he fondly imagined, that with no other assistance than that of his friends, he might surely rest his trust in the power of Elizabeth's government, confirmed by time, revered for wisdom, supported by vigour, and concurring with the general sentiments of the nation. The wild project made the city immediately restless; the execution of it was delayed till next day, and emissaries were despatched to all Essex's friends, informing them that Colham and Raleigh had laid schemes against his life, and entreaty their presence and assistance.

March 10th. Feb. 1605. Upon this suspicion a Essex-house, the Earls of Southamp-ton and Rutland, the Lords Sondys and Montague, with about three hundred gentlemen of good quality and fortune; and Essex informed them that he had received a summons to join the court; and that the earls and others had complained of his enemies exposed him. To some he said, that he would throw himself at the queen's feet, and crave her justice and protection: to others, he boasted of his interest in the city, and affirmed, that whatever might happen, this resource could never fail him. The queen was informed of these designs, by means of intelligence conveyed, as is supposed, to Raleigh, by Sir Ferdinando Gorges; and having ordered the magistrates of London to keep the citizens in readiness, she sent Egerton, lord keeper, to Essex-house, with the Earl of Worcester, Sir William Knollys, controller, and Popham, chief justice, in order to learn the cause of these unusual commotions. They were with both forth, with about two hundred; but all their servants were excluded, except the purse-bearer. After some altercation, in which they charged Essex's retainers, upon their allegiance, to lay down their arms, and were menaced, in their turn, by the augury, who surrounded them, the Earl, who found that matters were past recall, resolved to leave them prisoners in his house, and to proceed to the execution of his former purpose. They were with third forth, with about two hundred; their attendants, armed only with walking swords; and in his passage to the city was joined by the Earl of Bedford and Lord Cromwell. He cried aloud, For the queen! for the queen! a plot is laid for my life! and then proceeded to the house of Smith, the sheriff, on whose aid he great reliance. The citizens flocked about him in amazement; but though he told them that England was sold to the Infanta, and exhorted them to arm instantly, otherwise they could not do him any service, no one showed a disposition to join him. The sheriff, on the earl's approach to his house, stole out at the back door, and made the best of his way to the mayor. Essex, meanwhile, observing the coldness of the citizens, and hearing that he was proclaim- a traitor by the Earl of Cumberland, and Lord Bur- leigh, began to suspect that some one was conspiring against his house. He found the streets in his passage barricaded and guarded by the citizens, under the com- mand of Sir John Levinge. In his attempt to force his way, Tracy, a vassal of the earl's, who was the great friendship, was killed, with two or three of the Londoners; and the Earl himself, attended by a few of his partisans, (for the greater part began secretly to withdraw themselves,) retired towards the river, and taking boat, arrived at Essex- house. He there found that Gorges, whom he had sent before to capitulate with the lord keeper and the other counsellors, had given all of them their liberty, and had gone to court with them. He was now reduced to despair, and appeared determined, in prosecution of Lord Sandys' advice, to defend himself to the last extremity, and rather to perish, like a brave man, with his sword in his hand, than basely by the hands of the executioners, but after some parley, and a demand that was first made of him, (on the then conditions, from the besiegers, he surrendered at discretion; requesting only civil treatment, and a fair and impartial hearing.)

The queen, on hearing all this commotion, had belaived with as great tranquillity and security as if there had only passed a fray in the streets, in which she was nowise concerned; soon gave orders for the trial of the most considerable traitors. The Earls of Essex and Southampton were arraigned before a jury of twenty-five peers, who Buckhurst acted as lord steward. The guilt of the prisoners was too ap- parent to admit of any doubt; and, by the verdict of the court, was pronounced as known to every body, the reasonable conferences at Drury-house wereproved by undoubted evidence. Sir Ferdinando Gorges was produced in court; the confes- sions of the Earl of Rutland, the Earl of Long, Sandys, and Montague, of Davers, Blount, and Davies, were only read to the peers, according to the practice of that age. Essex's best friends were scandalized at his condemnation in vacuo positively on his innocence, and the good luck of his instructions; and still there was not a decisive disposition, in accusing, without any appearance of reason, secretary Cecil, as a partizan of the Infanta's title. The secretary, who had expected this charge, stepped into the court and Essex's enemies attacked the earl's authority, which, on examination, was found extremely weak and frivolous. When sentence was pronounced, Essex spoke like a man who expected nothing but death; but he added, that he should be sorry if he were represented to the queen as a person that despaired her clemency; though he should not, he believed, make any cringing submissions to obtain it. Southampton's behaviour was more mild and submissive: he treated the good offices of the peers in so modest and becoming a manner, as excited compassion in every one.

The most remarkable circumstance in Essex's trial was Bacon's appearance against him. He was none of the lawyers; but was with many a wicket; all his servitors were excluded, except the purse-bearer. After some altercation, in which they charged Essex's retainers, upon their allegiance, to lay down their arms, and were menaced, in their turn, by the augury, who surrounded them, the Earl, who found that matters were past recall, resolved to leave them prisoners in his house, and to proceed to the execution of his former purpose. They were with third forth, with about two hundred; their attendants, armed only with walking swords; and in his passage to the city was joined by the Earl of Bedford and Lord Cromwell. He cried aloud, For the queen! for the queen! a plot is laid for my life! and then proceeded to the house of Smith, the sheriff, on whose aid he great instrument of his ambition, but which now took a more firm hold of his mind, and prevailed over every other motive and consideration. His spiritual directors persuaded him, that he never could obtain the pardon of Heaven, unless he made a full confession of his dastardly fraud; and he gave in to the council an account of all his criminal designs, as well as of his correspondence with the King of Scots. He spared not even his most intimate friends, such as Lord Montjoy, whom he had engaged in those confusions; and he sought to pacify his present remorse by making such atonements as, in any other period of his life, he would have deemed more blamable than those attempts, which were the effects of his penitence. Sir Harry Nevill, in particular, a man of merit, he accused of a correspondence with the conspirators; though it appears that this gentleman had never assented to the proposals made him, and was not further criminal than in not revealing the Earl's treason; an office to which every man of honour naturally bears the strongest reluctance. Nevill was thrown into prison, and underwent a severe persecution; but, as the queen found Montjoy an able and successful commander, she continued him in her government, and sacrificed her resentment to the public service.

Elizabeth affected extremely the praise of clemency; and it is evident, that in every instance which she had during her reign, she had always appeared full of reluctance and hesitation: but the present situation of Essex called forth all her tender affections, and kept her in the most rigid and exasperated disposition. She felt the gulf between resentment and inclination, pride and compassion, the care of her own safety and concern for her favourite; and her situation, during this interval, was perhaps more an index to the people than justice itself to which he was reduced. She signed the warrant for his execution; she countermanded it; she again resolved on his death; she felt a new return of tenderness. Essex's enemies told her that he himself desired to die; and had assured her, that she could possess in safety while he lived: it is likely that this proof of penitence and of concern for her would produce a contrary effect to what they intended, and would revive all the food affection which she had so long repressed towards the unhappy prisoner. But what chiefly hardened her heart against him was his supposed obstinacy in never making, as she hourly expected, any application to her for mercy; and she finally gave her consent to his execution. He discovered at his death symptoms rather of penitence and piety than of fear; and willingly acknowledged the justice of the sentence by which he suffered.

The execution was private, in the Tower, according to the wish of the king, secure to his own safety. It was apprehensive, he said, lest the favour and compassion of the people would too much raise his heart in those moments, when humiliation under the affliction of Heaven was the proper preparation to safety. He could not doubt, though that prudence required the removing of so melancholy a spectacle from the public eye. Sir Walter Raleigh, who came to the Tower on purpose, and who beheld Essex's execution from a window, increased much by this action the general hatred under which he already laboured: it was thought that his sole intention was to feast his eyes with the death of an enemy; and no apology which he could make for so ungracious a conduit, could be accepted for the public. The cruelty and animosity with which he urged on Essex's fate, even when Cecil relented, were still regarded as the principles of this unmanly behaviour.

This event was but thirty years age when his rashness, imprudence, and violence, brought him to this untimely end. We must here, as in many other instances, lament the inconstancy of human nature, that a person, unless he made a prudent choice, could be accepted by the public. The confidence, friendship, and love, which should, in the latter period of his life, have given reins to his ungovernable passions, and involved not only himself, but the cause of Essex, in utter ruin, depends on the boldness and passion for him, as it was the cause of those} premature honours which he attained, seems, on the whole, the chief circumstance which brought on his unhappy fate. Confident of her partiality towards him, as well as of his own merit, he treated her with a haughtiness which neither her love nor her dignity could bear; and as her amorous inclinations, in so advanced an age, would naturally make her appear ridiculous, if not odious, in his eyes, he was engaged by an impudent openness, of which he made public profession, to display them to perverts of her passion. The many reconciliations and returns of affection, of which he had still made advantage, induced him to venture on new provocations, till he pushed her beyond all bounds of patience and of passion, which the corners of the woman were ever strong in her, those of the sovereign had still in the end appeared predominant. Some of Essex's associates, Cuffe, Daveners, Blount, Merce, and Davies, were tried and condemned, and all of these, except Davies, were executed. The queen pardoned the rest; being persuaded that they were drawn in merely from their friendship to that nobleman, and their care of his safety; and were ignorant of the more criminal part of his intentions. Southampton's life was saved with great difficulty. But he was detained in prison during the remainder of this reign.

The King of Scots, apprehensive lest his correspondence with Essex might be discovered, and having given offence to Elizabeth, sent the Earl of Morre and Lord Kinloss as ambassadors to England, in order to congratulate the queen on her escape from the late insurrection and confinement. The queen was secreted in a large council, and the苞le of this council, were employed in discovering whether any measures had been taken by her for excluding him from the succession, as well as to discover the inclinations of the chief nobility and counsellors, in case of the queen's demise. They found the dispositions of many as favourable as they could wish; and they even entered into a correspondence with secretary Cecil, whose influence, after the fall of Essex, was now uncontrolled, and who was resolved, by this policy, to acquire in time the confidence of the successor. He knew how jealous Elizabeth ever was of her authority, and he therefore carefully concealed from her his attachment to James; but after- wards asserted, that nothing could be more advantageous to her than this correspondence; because the King of Scots, secure of mounting the throne by his undoubted title, aided by those connections with the English ministry, was the less likely to give any disturbance to the present sovereign. He also persuaded that patience was to remain in quiet, and patiently to expect that time should open to him the inheritance of the crown, without pushing his friends on desperate enterprises, which would totally incapacitate them for his service. The queen professed her natural facility of disposition, easily inclined him to embrace that resolution; and in this manner the minds of the English were silently but universally disposed to admit, with their hearts, what Cecil told her in his letter out line: the death of Essex, by putting an end to faction, had been rather favourable than prejudicial to that great event.

The French king, who was little predisposed in favour of James, and who, for obvious reasons, was averse to the union of England and Scotland, made his ambassador drop some hints to Cecil of Henry's willingness to concur in any measure for disapproving the hopes of the Scottish monarch; but as Cecil showed an entire disapprobation of such counsels, the ambassador left no hint of his dealings in that matter; and thus, the only foreign power which could give much disturbance to James's succession, was induced to acquiesce in it. Henry made a journey this summer to Calais, and the queen, hearing of his intentions, went to Dover, in hopes of having a personal interview with a monarch, whom, of all others, she most loved and most respected. The King of Scots, however, produced to her, besides the measures, general or particular, of which she had heard, would gladly have accepted of the proposal; but as many difficulties occurred, it appeared necessary to lay aside, by common consent, the project of an interview.

Elizabeth's life came to an end by the successive two letters to Henry, one by Edmondes, another by Sir Abert Sidney; in which she expressed a desire of conferring about a business of importance, with some minister in whom that prince repose entire confidence. The Marquis of Rosni, the king's favourite, and prime minister, came to Dover in disguise; and the Memoirs of that able statesman contain a full account of his conference with Elizabeth. This princess had formed a scheme for establishing, in conjunction with the English, a new system in Europe, and of fixing a durable balance of power, by the erection of new states on the ruins of the house of Austria. She had even the prudence to foresee the perils which might ensue from the agitation of the French nation and her principal among all the seventeen provinces of the Low Countries in one monarchy, in order to form a perpetual barrier against the dangerous increase of the French as well as of the Spanish monarchy. Henry had himself long meditated such a perfect union of the Austrian family, and Rosni could not forbear expressing his astonishment, when he found that Elizabeth and his master, though they had never communicated their sentiments on this subject, not only had entered into the same general views, but also had formed the same plan for their execution. The affairs, however, of France were not yet brought to a situation which might enable Henry to begin that great enterprise; and Rosni found it necessary to postpone for some years their united attack on the house of Austria. He departed, filled with just admiration at the solidity of Elizabeth's judgment, and the greatness of her mind; and he owns, that she was entirely worthy of the title of "Elizabeth the Martyr".

The queen's magnanimity in forming such extensive projects was the more remarkable, as, besides her having fallen so far into the decline of life, the affairs of Ireland, though conducted with abilities and success, were still in disorder, and made a great diversion of her forces. The expense, incurred by this war, lay heavy upon her narrow revenues, and her ministers, taking advantage of her disposition to frugality, proposed to her an expedient of saving, which, though she at first disapproved of it, she was at last induced to embrace. It was represented to her, that the great sums of money remitted to Ireland for the purposes of the English forces, came from the necessary course of circulation, into the bands of the rebels, and enabled them to buy abroad all necessary supplies of arms and ammunition, which, from the extreme poverty of that kingdom, and its want of every useful commodity, they could not otherwise find means to purchase. It was therefore recommended to her, that she should pay her forces in base money; and it was asserted, that besides the great saving to the revenue, this species of coin could never be exported into the foreign market. Some of her wiser counsellors maintained, that if the pay of the soldiers were raised in proportion, the Irish rebels would necessarily reap the same benefit from the lessened expense of the English army, a benefit, it was said, more suited to its value; if the pay were not raised, there would be danger of a mutiny among the troops, who, whatever names might be affixed to the pieces of metal, would soon find, from experience, that they were defrauded in their income. But Elizabeth, though she justly valued herself on fixing the standard of the English coin, much debased by her predecessors, and had innovated very little in that delicate article, was seduced by the specious arguments employed by the minister on this occasion; and she coined a great quantity of base money, which he made use of in the pay of his forces in Ireland.

Mountjoy's suc-

Mountjoy, the deputy, was a man of some eleven thousand and a thousand men; and having the greater mutiny among the troops, he led them instantly into the field, and resolved by means of strict discipline, and by keeping them employed against the enemy, to obviate those incidents which were just to be apprehended. He made military roads, and built a fortress at Mespoghe; he drove the Mac-genises out of Lecale; he harassed Tyrone in Ulster with inroads and lesser expeditions; and by destroying every where, and during all seasons, the pro-specious arguments employed by the minister on this occasion; and she coined a great quantity of base money, which he made

The Irish war, though successful, was extremely burdensome on the queen’s revenue; and besides the supplies granted by parliament, which were indeed very small, but which they ever regarded as a divinely appointed provision, she had been obliged, by an unfortunate execution of Essex, in no small measure that when she appeared in public, she was not attended with the usual acclamations, yet the powers of her prerogative, supported by vigour, still remained as high and unattenuated as ever.

The active reign of Elizabeth had enabled many persons to distinguish themselves in civil and military employments; and the queen, who was not able, from her revenue, to give them any rewards, used the great part of the salaries, which had made use of an expedient which had been employed by her predecessor, but which had never been carried to such an extreme as under her administration. She appointed a great number of deputies for more private concerns, and these patents they sold to others, who were thereby enabled to raise commodities to what price they pleased, and who put invincible restraints upon all commerce, industry, and emulation in the arts. It is astonishing to see the number and immense wealth of those commodities which were thus assigned over to patentees. Currents, salt, iron, powder, cards, calf-skins, fells, poul- davies, ox-skins, bones, tram oil, lists of cloth, pot-ashes, molasses, vinegar, sea-coals, silk, ribbons, brushes, pots, bottles, salt-petre, lead, adze, oil, calamine-stone, oil of blubber, glasses, paper, starch, tin, sulphur, new drapery, dried pilchards, transportation of iron ordinance, besides the more ancient, and unheard of, monopoly of wool, Irish yarn: these are but a part of the commodities which had been appropriated to monopolists. When this list was read in the House, a member cried, "Is not bread in the market?" "Bread!" said every one with astonishment; "Yes, I assure you, replied he, if affairs go on at this rate, we shall have bread reduced to a monopoly before next parliament." These monopolists were so exorbitant in their demands, that in some places, for instance, the price of first-class salts from sixteen-pence a bushel, to fourteen or fifteen shillings. Such high profits naturally begat intruders upon their commerce; and, in order to secure themselves against encroachments, the patentees were armed with high and arbitrary powers, to applaud their authority, by which means, they oppressed the people at pleasure, and to exact money from such as they thought proper to accuse of interfering with their patent. The patentees of salt-petre, having the power of entering into every house, and of committing what havoc they pleased in stables, cellars, or wherever they suspected their monopoly to be violated, had been employed by some of them, who were suspected of desiring to free themselves from this damage or trouble. And while all domestic intercourse was thus restrained, lest any scope should remain for indirect supply of foreign goods, the queen was confined to exclusive companies, who bought and sold at any price that they themselves thought proper to offer or exact.

These grievances, the most intolerable for the present, and the most pernicious in their consequences, that ever were known in any age, or under any government, had been mentioned in the last parliament, and a petition had even been presented to the queen, complaining of her grievances, and that she should be relieved from these abuses. The courtiers, on the other hand, maintained that this matter regarded the prerogative, and that the Commons could not hope for success if they did not avail themselves of the prerogative. Mr. Hyde, therefore, to the queen’s goodness and benefit. The topics which were advanced in the House, and which came equally from the courtiers and the country gentlemen, and were alleged to be in extraordinary case, it was necessary for such as possessed with an idea of the privileges enjoyed by the people during that age, and of the liberty possessed under the administration of Elizabeth. It was asserted, that the queen inherited both an enlarging and a regal prerogative, by which she could assert at liberty what was restrained by statute or otherwise, and by her prerogative she might restrain what was otherwise at liberty: that the royal prerogative was not to be considered as a negative privilege, but a positive one, in the highest degree absolute; that absolute power is inconsistent with any limitation; that absolute princes, such as the sovereigns of England, were a species of divinity; that it was in vain to attempt tying the queen’s hands by laws or statute; since, by means of her dispensing power, she could loosen herself at pleasure: and that even if a clause should be annexed to a statute, excluding her dispensing power, she could first dispense with that clause, and then fill the statute. Afterwards I discovered, more especially in a Turkish Divan than of an English House of Commons, according to our present idea of this assembly, the queen, who perceived how odious monopolies had become, and what heats were likely to arise, sent for the Speaker, and desired him to frame a bill to immediately cancel the most grievous and oppressive of these patents.

not only unto you that much, that the last parliament we proceeded by way of petitioning, which had no effect. Mr. Francis More said, I know the queen’s prerogative to be as great as in truth, yet such grievances are not comparable. I cannot utter with my tongue, or convey with my heart, the great grievances that the town and country are in, by which I serve, suffereth by some of these monopolies. It brings the several profits into very great sum, and the end of all this is began to bind very serious burdens to the subjects. We have a law, but a true and faithful copy of it, or rather of it, there is a patent set all at liberty, in opposition to that statute. And to what purpose is it to do any thing by act of parliament, when the queen will execute the same by her prerogative? Out of a dominion of her prerogative, Mr. Speaker, I do speak it, there is no act of hers that hath been or is more contrary to her own majesty, more odious to the subjects, more dangerous to the commonwealth, than the passing of these monopolies. Mr. Martin, I shall speak for a people in every part of the country that possesses and languishes under the burden of monopolies and un- legal trade, and whose property is withheld from them, and whom every man is united to oppose and destroy. For by her prerogative she may set at liberty things necessary to the state or otherwise, and especially by her prerogative, she may restrain things which be of utility for the first, she may strive to make a new patent contrary to the present. With regard to monopolies and such like cases, the case hath been here to humble ourselves and to acknowledge these monopolies. If it be true, if these grievances be true, especially when the severely touched her so much in prerogative —
The House was sick with astonishment, and admiration, and gratitude, at this extraordinary instance of the queen's goodness and condescension. A member said, with tears in his eyes, that if a sentence of everlasting happiness had been said, she would have been so moved that she might have been greater joy than that with which he was at present overwhelmed. Another observed, that this message from the sacred person of the queen was a kind of gospel or glad-tidings, and ought to be received as such, and be written in the tablets of the temple, as one of those minor miracles, in the same manner as the Deity would not give his glory to another, so the queen herself was the only agent in their present prosperity and happiness. The House voted, that the Speaker, with considerable emphasis, should wait on her majesty, and return thanks to her for her gracious concessions to her people.

When the speaker, with the other members, was introduced by her, he presented to her his cap, and dressed his knee; and remained in that posture a considerable time, till she thought proper to express her desire that they should rise. The speaker displayed the gratitude of the Commons; because her sacred ears were ever open to hear them, and her blessed hands ever stretched out to relieve them. They acknowledged, he said, in all duty and thankfulness acknowledged, that, before they called, her preceding grace was a most agreeable and beneficial act to their good; more ready to give than they could desire, much less deserve. He remarked, that the attribute which was most proper to God, to perform all he promised, appertained also to her; and said that she was all truth, all constancy, all beneficence, to the coasts and uttermost ends of the earth, and to the utmost bounds of the earth.

On a subsequent day, in Bill against the money bills was again introduced, and Mr. Speaker said, it is no purpose to offer to her majesty's hands by act of parliament, when she may borrow herself at her pleasure, Mr. Davies, said, had been given to prove that true greatness which he attributes to himself, Dju de graet Dis. (R. B. has an answer to apply to this day of England.) Mr. Secretary Cecil said, I am sent out to the queen, and before we speak and give counsel to a cause that should deliver her place, or, oblige it, I would wish that my tongue was cut out of my head. I am sure there were law-makers before there were laws. (meaning, I suppose, that the sovereignty was above the laws.) This gentleman went about to press us with the execution of the law in this case, and so of 50 of Edward. Who thinks they can be true to that time, when the king was afraid of the subject? If you stand upon your own feet, and act upon your own construction and your own reason, then this great cause is amendable, if not to you, at least to such as it is in the way of reason, that is good and irreparable. Mr. Montague said, I am both to speak what I know, but, as we should not desire to speak what we are not acquainted with, I have in my place the House Hansard by which I am now in question, and which the laws of the land have always allowed and maintained, and let us therefore apply by petition to her majesty.

Mr. Speaker told the House that the queen had antedated many of the talents, Mr. Francis More said, I must renew, Mr. Speaker, I moved the House, to receive her majesty's grace, that we might never mean (and I hope the House think so) to set limits and bounds to the terminating of the king's favours to her majesty; and also, that whereas divers speeches have been moved extra ordinary, in the name of the commons, to all their sessions, and bills all concerned of by her, Mr. Speaker would apologise, and humbly cancel them; but then he observed, that if any member were a member of the House, who was no corporator, and the extravagance of the speeches might be attributed to his being a member of the House, and the that of the speech, or very much of it, was that which was mentioned by him, by sending a new present; and on the whole the great lords took these proceedings, that she spoke of them possibly as her concluding prevailing, maintained her dignity, and preserved the affections of her people.

The Commons granted her a supply quite unprecedented, of four subsidies and eight tenthents; and they ended it by taking a resolution, that she might have any satisfaction in the business of monopolies, which they justly considered as of the utmost importance to the interest and happiness of the nation. Had they attempted to exact that concession, by keeping the supply in suspense; so humbly did they approach her majesty, in this appearance of constraint and jealousy had been sufficient to have produced a denial of all their requests, and have forced her into some acts of authority still more violent and arbitrary.

The remaining events of this reign are neither numerous nor important. The queen, finding that the Spaniards had involved her in so much difficulty, Charles, his son, loaded her with presents, resolved to give them employment at home; and she fitted out a squadron of nine ships, under Sir Richard Levison, admiral, and Sir William Monson, vice-admiral, whom she sent on an expedition to the coast of Spain. The admiral, with part of the squadron, met the gallicoes loaded with treasure; but was not strong enough to attack them. The vice-admiral also fell in with some rich ships; but they escaped for the present. The other officers, that their expedition might not prove entirely fruitless, resolved to attack the harbour of Corintha, in Portugal, where they received intelligence a very rich caravan had taken shelter. The harbour was guarded by a castle; there were eleven ships in it, and in the country, as the number, to be believed, of twenty thousand men, appeared in arms on the shore; yet, notwithstanding these obstacles, and others derived from the winds and tides, the English squadron had retired from the harbour, dismounted the guss of the castle, sunk or burnt or put to flight the galleys, and obliged the caravan to surrender. They brought her home to England, and she was valued at a million of pounds. The supply to the Spaniards; and a supply still more important to Elizabeth.

The affairs of Ireland, after the defeat of Tyrone, and the expulsion of the Spaniards, hastened to a settlement. Lord Mountjoy divided his army into small parties, resolved to give them employment at home; and he fitted out a squadron of nine ships, under Sir Richard Levison, admiral, and Sir William Monson, vice-admiral, whom she sent on an expedition to the coast of Spain. the activity of Sir Henry Doowray, and Sir Arthur Chichester permitted no repose or security to the rebels: and many of the chief-lants, after skulking, during some time, in woods and morasses, submitted to mercy, and received such conditions as the deputy was pleased to impose upon them. Tyrone himself made application, by letter, to the Duke of York, his brother, to be received upon his former terms, but they were not admitted, except he made an absolute surrender of his life and fortune to the queen's mercy. He appeared before the deputy at Melford, in a habit and posture suitable to his present fortune; and, after a severe conference, the duke, with the advice of the tenable time, was committed to custody by Mountjoy, who intended to bring him over captive into England, to be disposed of at the queen's pleasure.

Queen Elizabeth, who was incapable of receiving any satisfaction from this fortunate event: she had fallen into a profound melancholy; which all the advantages of her high fortune, all the glory of her prosperous reigns, were unable in any degree to alleviate or assuage. Some ascribed this depression of mind to her repentance of granting a pardon to Tyrone, whom she had always resolved to bring to condign punishment for his treachery, but who had made no such interest with the ministers, as to extort a remission from her. Others, with more likelihood, accounted for her dejection by a discovery which she had made of the correspondence maintained in her name by her successor, the king of Spain, and the neglect to which, on account of her old age and infirmities, she imagined herself to be exposed. But there is another cause assigned for her melancholy, which has long been rejected by historians as romantic, but which late discoveries seem to have confirmed, and some incident happened which revived her tenderness for Essex, and filled her with the deepest sorrow for the consent which she had unwarily given to his execution.

The Earl of Essex, after his return from the fortunate expedition against Cadiz, observing the increase of the queen's fond attachment towards him, took occasion to regret, that the necessity of her service required him often to be absent from her person, and exposed him to all those ill offices, which her enemies, more assiduous in their attendance, could employ against him. She was moved with this tender jealousy; and, making him the present of a ring, to shew that part of it he had taken from her other tenderness, would afford him a patient hearing, and would lend a favourable ear to his apology. Essex, notwithstanding all his misfortunes, reserved this precious gift to the last extremity; but after his trial and condonation, he resolved to present it to her, and, having restored the ring to the Countess of Nottingham, whom she desired to deliver it to the queen. The countess was prevailed on by her husband, the mortal enemy of Essex, not to execute the commission; and Elizabeth, who still expected that her favour would make this last appeal to her tenderness, and who ascribed the neglect of it to his invincible obstinacy, was, after much delay and many internal combats, pushed by resentment and policy to sign the warrant for his execution. The Countess of Nottingham falling into sickness, and affected with the near approach of death, was seized with remorse for her conduct; and, having obtained a visit from the queen, craved her pardon, and revealed to her the fatal secret. The queen, astonished with this incident, burst into a furious passion: she shook the dying countess in her bed; and crying to her, That God must pardon her, he struck her with a rock she broke from her, and thenceforth resigned herself over to the deepest and most insupportable melancholy. She rejected all consolation: she even refused food and sustenance: and, throwing herself on the floor, was manaced sullen and immovable, feeding her thoughts on her loss, and the existence of her children, an insupportable burden to her. Few words she uttered; and they were all expressive of some inward grief, which she cared not to reveal: but sighs and groans were the chief vent which she gave to her despondency, and which, though they discovered her sorrows, were never able to ease or assuage them. Ten days and nights she lay upon the carpet, leaning on cushions which her maids brought her; and her physicians could not persuade her to allow herself to be put to bed, much less to make trial of any remedies which were prescribed. At length, her weakness, which, at last, had so long preyed on her frail body, that her end was visibly approaching; and the council, being assembled, sent the keeper, admiral, and secretary, to know her will with regard to her successor. She answered, with a faint address, that she had directed her lawyers, when she was in the last extremity, to subjoin her; and, in her stead, ordered her letters to be read, which were delivered by the Archbishop of Canterbury to fix her thoughts upon God, she replied, that she did so, nor did her mind in the least wander from him. Her voice soon after left her; her senses failed; she fell into a lethargy, and had a lethargic slumber, which contained some 5th March hours; and she expired gently, without further struggle or corroboration, in the twentieth year of her age, and forty-five years of her marriage.
any undue ascendant over her. In her family, in her court, in her kingdom, she remained equally mistress: the force of the tender passions was great over her, but the force of her mind was still superior; and the combat which her victory visibly cost her, serves only to display the firmness of her resolution, and the loftiness of her ambitious sentiments.

The fame of this princess, though it has surmounted the prejudices both of faction and bigotry, yet lies still exposed to another prejudice, which is more durable because more natural, and which, according to the different views in which we survey her, is capable either of exalting beyond measure, or diminishing the lustre of her character. This prejudice is founded on the consideration of her sex.

When we contemplate her as a woman, we are apt to be struck with the highest admiration of her great qualities and extensive capacity; but we are also apt to require some more softness of disposition, some greater lenity of temper, some of those amiable weaknesses by which her Sex is distinguished. But the true method of estimating her merit, is to lay aside all these considerations, and consider her merely as a rational being placed in authority, and intrusted with the government of mankind. We may find it difficult to reconcile our fancy to her as a wife or a mistress; but her qualities as a sovereign, though with some considerable exceptions, are the object of undisputed applause and approbation.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

JAMES I.

CHAP. XLIV.

A D. 1603.

The crown of England was never transmitted from father to son with greater tranquillity than it passed from the family of Tudor to that of Stuart. During the whole reign of Elizabeth, the eyes of men had been employed in search of her successor; and when old age made the prospect of her death more immediate, there appeared none but the King of Scots, who could advance any just claim or pretension to the throne. He was great-grandson of Margaret, elder daughter of Henry VII.; and, on the failure of the male line, his hereditary right remained unquestionable. If the religion of Mary, Queen of Scots, and the other prejudices contracted against her, had formed any considerable obstacle to her succession; these objections, being entirely personal, had no place with regard to her son. Men also considered, that though the title, derived from blood, had been frequently violated since the Norman conquest, such licences had proceeded more from force or intrigue, than from any deliberate maxim of government. The lineal heir had still in the end prevailed; and both his exclusion and restoration had been commonly attended with such convulsions as were sufficient to warn all prudent men not lightly to give way to such irregularities. If the will of Henry VIII., authorized by act of parliament, had tacitly excluded the Scottish line, the tyranny and caprices of that monarch had been so signal, that a settlement of this nature, unsupported by any just reason, had no authority with the people. Queen Elizabeth too, with her dying breath, had recognised the undoubted title of her kinsman James; and the whole nation seemed to dispose themselves with joy and pleasure for his reception. Though born and educated amidst a foreign and hostile people, men hoped, from his character of moderation and wisdom, that he would embrace the maxims of an English monarch; and the prudent foresaw greater advantages resulting from a union with Scotland, than disadvantages from submitting to a prince of that nation. The alacrity with which the English looked towards the successor had appeared so evident to Elizabeth, that, conversing with other causes, it affected her with the deepest melancholy; and that wise princess, whose penetration and experience had given her the greatest insight into human affairs, had not yet sufficiently weighed the ingratitude of courtiers and levity of the people.

As victory abroad, and tranquillity at home, had attended this princess, she left the nation in such flourishing circumstances, that her successor possessed every advantage, except that of comparison with her illustrious name, when he mounted the throne of England. The First transac profusion of titles which was observed in the beginning of his reign; when, in six weeks’ time after his entrance into the kingdom, he is computed to have bestowed knighthood on no less than two hundred and thirty-seven persons. If Elizabeth’s facility of honours, as well as of marriage, had formerly been repined at, she began now to be valued and esteemed; and every one was sensible that the king, by his lavish and premature conferring of favours, had failed of obliging the persons on whom he bestowed them; but it was a kind because the old marks of distinction; and being distributed, without choice or deliberation, to persons unknown to the prince, were regarded more as the proofs of facility and good fortune of any determined friendship or extraordinary service.

A pasquinade was affixed to St. Paul’s, in which an art was promised to be taught, very necessary to assist frail memories in retaining the names of the new nobility. We may presume, that the English would have thrown less blame on the king’s facility in bestowing favours, had these been confined entirely to their own nation, and had not been shared out in too unequal proportions, to his old subjects. James, who, through whose whole reign, was managed by temper and inclination than by the rules of political prudence, had brought with him great numbers of his Scottish courtiers: whose impatience and importunity were apt, in many particulars, to impose on the eminent miniser, as well as on the master, and extort a favour, of which he knew it was not natural to imagine, his English subjects would loudly complain. The Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Marre, Lord Hume, Lord Kiiolos, Sir George Hume, secretary Elphinstone, were immediately added to the English privy council. Sir George Hume, whom he created Earl of Dunbar, was his declared favourite as long as that nobleman lived, and was one of the wisest and most virtuous, though the king disdained of a liking for him. Hume of Dunbar was thus entitled to the title of Earl of Holderness; and many others, being raised on a sudden to the highest elevation, increased, by their insolvency, that envy which naturally attended them, and engrossed an ancient enmity against the English.

It must, however, be owned, in justice to James, that he left almost all the chief offices in the hands of Elizabeth’s ministers, and trusted the conduct of political concerns, both foreign and domestic, to his English subjects. Among these, Sir Robert Cecil, Lord Chief Justice of the King’s Bench, Viscount Northampton, and Earl of Salisbury, was always regarded as his prime minister and chief counsellor. Though the capacity and penetration of this minister were such as to merit the high favour which was given with so much facility on the accession of that monarch. The secret correspondence into which he had entered with James, and which had sensibly contributed to the easy reception of that prince in England, laid the foundation of Cecil’s credit; and while all his former associates, Sir Walter Raleigh, Lord Grey, Lord Cobham, were discommoded, on account of their animosity against Essex, as well as for other reasons, this minister was continued in employment, and treated with the greatest confidence and regard.

The capacity of James and his ministers, in negociation, was immediately put to trial, on the appearance of ambassadors from almost all the princes and states of Europe, in answer to the secret letters of the French minister, Count de Taxis, which were expected in a little time from Spain. But he who most excited the attention of the public, both on account of his own merit and that of his master, was the Marquis of Rosini, afterwards Duke of Sully, prime minister and favourite of Henry IV. of France.

HISTORY OF GREAT BRITAIN. [A.D. 1603.—CHAP. XLV.]

When the domestics of the house of Austria were defeated on Philip II. all Europe was struck with terror, lest the power of a family, which had been raised by fortune, should now be carried to an immeasurable height, by the wisdom and conduct of this monarch. But never were apprehensions found in the event to be more groundless. Slow without prudence, ambitious without enterprise, false without deceiving any body, and wrong without being discovered. He was of that character which, during his lifetime, and after his death, he impressed on the Spanish councils. Revolted or depopulated provinces, discontented or rebellious, to be held in subjection, or that was which those dominions, lying in every climate of the globe, presented to Philip III. a weak prince, and to the Duke of Lerma, a minister weak and odious. But though military disasters were still continued, it was what alone gave some appearance of life and vigour to that languishing body, yet so great was the terror produced by former power and ambition, that the reduction of the house of Austria was the only means which the English ministers of Christendom. It was not perceived, that the French empire, now united in domestic peace, and governed by the most heroic and most amiable prince that adorns modern story, was become, of itself, a sufficient counterpoise to the Spanish greatness; and perhaps, at a future time, he himself did not perceive, it he proposed, by his minister, a league with James, in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern crown; in order to relieve them from the Dutch wars, and depress the exorbitant power of that ambitious family. But the genius of the English monarch was not equal to such vast enterprises. The love of peace was his ruling passion, and all his peculiar dispositions and conjunctures of the times rendered the same object which was agreeable to him in the highest degree advantageous to his people.

The English ambassador, therefore, was obliged to depart from these extensive views, and to concert with James the means of procuring for the safety of the United Provinces: nor was this object altogether without its difficulties. The king, by natural inclination, as well as by policy, was attached to the revolt of the Low Countries; and being commonly open and sincere, he had, on many occasions, gone so far as to give to the Dutch the appellation of rebels; but having conceived more fully with English ministers and courtiers, he found their attachment to that republic so strong, and their opinion of common interest so established, that he was obliged to sacrifice his sense of justice: a quality which, even when erroneous, is respectable as well as mistaken, and, as such, deserves much admiration. James, the man, continued, with regard to the revolt of the Low Countries; and being commonly open and sincere, he had, on many occasions, gone so far as to give to the Dutch the appellation of rebels; but having conceived more fully with English ministers and courtiers, he found their attachment to that republic so strong, and their opinion of common interest so established, that he was obliged to sacrifice to politics his sense of justice: a quality which, even when erroneous, is respectable as well as mistaken, and, as such, deserves much admiration.

Amidst the great tranquillity, both foreign and domestic, with which the nation was surrounded, nothing could be more surprising than the discovery of a conspiracy to subvert the government, and to fix on the throne Arabella Stuart, a near relation of the king’s by the family of Lenox, and descended equally from Henry VII. Every thing remains still mysterious in this conspiracy; and history can give us no clue to unravel it. Watson and Clarke, two catholic priests, were accused of the plot: Lord Grey, a papian; Lord Cobham, a thoughtless man, of no fixed principle; and Sir Walter Raleigh, suspected to be of that philosophical sect, who were then extremely rare in England, and who have since received the appellation of free-thinkers: together with these, Mr. Broke, brother to Lord Cobham, Sir Griffin Markham, Mr.COPELEY, Sir Edward Parham. What cement could unite men of such discordant principles in so dangerous a connexion, and of such unequal weights, proportioned to an undertaking of this nature, has never yet been explained, and cannot easily be imagined. As Raleigh, Grey, and Cobham, were commonly believed, all were well pleased in the Queen's court, to see in the person of one of his old confederates, now become his most inveterate enemies. But the confession as well as trial of the criminals, put the matter beyond doubt. And though no one could find any marks of a connected enterprise, it appeared that men of famous and ambitious spirits, meeting frequently together, and believing all the world discontented, like themselves, had entertained very criminal projects, and had even entered, some of them at least, into a correspondence with Aremberg, the Flemish ambassador, in order to give disturbance to the new settlement.

The two priests and Broke were executed: Cobham, Grey, and Markham, were pardoned, after they had laid their heads upon the block. Raleigh too was reprieved, not pardoned; and he remained in confinement many years afterwards.

From Sully's Memoirs, that Raleigh secretly offered his services to the French ambassador; and we may thence presume, that meeting with a repulse from that quarter, he had recourse, for the same unwarrantable purposes, to the Flemish minister. Such a correspondence we are now enabled to form; but it must be confessed, that, on his trial, there appeared no proof of this transaction, nor indeed any circumstance which could justify his condemnation. He was a man, abnormal in all the faculties of passion, upon hearing that Raleigh, when examined, had pointed out some circumstances, by which Cobham's guilt might be known and ascertained. This accusation Cobham afterwards retracted; and soon after he retracted his retraction. Yet upon the written evidence of this single witness, a man of no honour or understanding, and so contradictory in his testimony; not confronted with Raleigh; not supported by any concuring circumstances; was that great man, contrary to all law and equity, found guilty by the jury. His name was at that time extremely odious in England; and every man was pleased to give sentence against the capital enemy of Essex, the fact is outrageous.

Sir Edward Coke, the famous lawyer, then attorney general, managed the cause for the crown, and threw out on Raleigh such gross abuse, as may be deemed a great reflection on him, as well as on the whole crown. He could not have found, in any evidence, such a degree of malignity, as he exhibited in the manners of the age. Traitor, monster, viper, and spider of hell, are the terms which he employs against one of the most illustrious men of the kingdom, who was under trial for life and fortune, and who defended himself with temper, eloquence, and courage.

A.D. 1604.

The next occupation of the king was entirely according to his heart's content. He was employed in directing magnificently to an assembly of divines, concerning points of faith and discipline, and in receiving the applause of these holy men, for his superior zeal and learning. The religious disputes between these churches and the puritans having brought him to call a conference at Hampton-court, on presence of finding expedients which might reconcile both parties. Though the seventies of Elizabeth towards the catholics had so much weakened that party, whose genius was opposite to the church of England, not only as to its ideas, but also the conditions which had had so little influence on the puritans, who were encouraged by that spirit, that no less than seven hundred and fifty elomerans of that party signed a petition to the king on his accession; and many more seemed willing to adhere to it. They all hoped that James, having received his education in Scotland, and having sometimes professed an attachment to the church established there, would at least prefer the religion of the nation. The king, till conditions should be made with them, were, upon that account, extremely obnoxious to the court and ministry; and people were apt, at first, to suspect, that the party had been managed with no other design than to end the life of his old confederates, now become his most inveterate enemies. But the confession as well as trial of the criminals, put the matter beyond doubt. And though no one could find any marks of a connected enterprise, it appeared that men of famous and ambitious spirits, meeting frequently together, and believing all the world discontented, like themselves, had entertained very criminal projects, and had even entered, some of them at least, into a correspondence with Aremberg, the Flemish ambassador, in order to give disturbance to the new settlement.

A.D. 1604.

The next occupation of the king was entirely according to his heart's content. He was employed in directing magnificently to an assembly of divines, concerning points of faith and discipline, and in receiving the applause of these holy men, for his superior zeal and learning. The religious disputes between these churches and the puritans having brought him to call a conference at Hampton-court, on presence of finding expedients which might reconcile both parties. The puritans were here so unreasonable as to complain of a partial and unfair management of the dispute; as if the search after truth were in any degree the object of such conferences, and a studied indifference, so rare even among private inquirers in philosophical questions, could ever be expected among princes and prelates, in a theological controversy. The king, it must be confessed, from the opening of the conference, showed the strongest propensity to the established church, and frequently incited a maxim, which, though it has some foundation, is to be received with great limitations, No Bishops, No Kings. The bishops, in their turn, were very much strained by the present direction of the council that the Archbishop of Canterbury said, that undeniably his majesty spoke by the special assistance of God's Spirit. A few alternations in the liturgy were agreed to, and both parties separated with mutual dissatisfaction.

It had frequently been the practice of the puritans to form certain assemblies, which they called prophesying: where alternately, as moved by the Spirit, they displayed their pius zeal in prayers and exhortations, and raised their own enthusiasm, as well as that of their audience, to the highest pitch, from that social contagion which has so mighty an influence on holy fervours, and from the mutual emulation which arises in these trials of religious eloquence. Such a congress seemed to have been supposed to use by Elizabeth; and the ministers in this conference moved the king for their revival. But James sharply replied, If you aim at a Scottish presbytery, it agrees as well with our prejudices. The devil and Jack and John and Will and Dick shall meet and convene me and my council. Therefore I reiterate my former speech: Le Ross s'avisez. Stay, I pray, for one seven years before you demand; and then, if you find my grace pursuant and just, may perience hearken unto you. For that government will keep me in breath, and give me work enough. Such were the political considerations which determined the king in his choice among religious parties.

The next assembly in which James displayed his learning and eloquence, was one that showed more spirit of liberty than appeared among his bishops and theologians. The parliament was now ready to assemble; being so long delayed on account of the plague, which had broken out in London, and raged to such a degree, that above 30,000 persons are computed to have died of it in a year; though the city contained at that time little more than 150,000 inhabitants.

The speech which the king made on opening the parliament, fully displays his character, and proves him to have possessed some knowledge and better judgment of any just sense of decorum and propriety. Though few productions of the age surpass this performance either in style or matter, it wants that majestic brevity and relative simplicity which becomes a head of state and in the council of the nation. It contains, however, a remarkable stroke of candour, where he confesses his too great facility in yielding to the solicitations of suitors: a fault which he promises to correct; but which adhered to, and distressed him, during the whole course of his reign.

The first business, in which the Commons were engaged, was of the utmost importance to the preservation of their privileges; and neither temper nor resolution were wanting on their conduct of it.

In the former periods of the English government, the House of Commons was of so small weight in the balance of the constitution, that little attention had been given, either by the king, the nobility, the people, or the choice and continuance of the members. It had been usual, after parliaments were prolonged beyond one session, for the chancellor to exert a disciplinary authority over the members, and to supply the place of any members whom he judged incompetent of attending, either on account of their employment, their sickness, or other impediment. This practice gave that minister, and consequently the prince, an unlimited power of modelling at pleasure the representatives of the nation; yet so little was observed of it, that the Commons of themselves, without any court influence or intrigue, and contrary to some former votes of their own, confirmed it in the twenty-third of Elizabeth. At that time, though some members, being surprised, for they were unacquainted with the device, having now recovered their health, appeared in the House, and claimed their seat; such was the authority of the chancellor, that merely out of respect to him, his sentence was adhered to, and the new members were continued in their places, although the House was of opinion, that the crown had conferred on the crown: but to show the genius of that age, or rather the channels in which power then ran, the crown put very little value on this authority; insomuch that two days after the chancellor, of himself, resigned it back to the Commons, and gave them power to judge of a particular vacancy in their House. And when the question concerning the chancellor's new writs was again brought on the carpet towards the end of the session, the Commons were so little alarmed at the precedent, that, though they readmitted some old members, whose seats had been vacated on account of slight indispositions, yet they confirmed the chancellor's sentence, in instances where the power had been actually exercised, and was incapable. Nor did they proceed any further in vindication of their privileges, than to vote, that during the sitting of parliament, there do not, at any time, any writs go out for choosing new members to fill up any vacancies in the House. In Elizabeth's reign we may remark, that the reigns preceding, sessions of parliament were not usually the twelfth part so long as the vacancies; and during the latter, the chancellor's power, if he pleased to extort it, was confirmed, at least left, by this vote, as unlimited and unrestrained as ever.

In a subsequent parliament, the absolute authority of the queen was contested in a manner; she began for the first time to give alarm to the Commons. New writs having been issued by the chancellor when there was no vacancy, and a controversy arising upon that incident, the queen sent a message to the House, informing them that it were improper for them to deal in such matters. These questions, she said, belonged only to the chancellor; and had appointed him to confer with the judges, in order to settle all disputes with regard to elections. The Commons had the courage, a few days after, to vote, That it was a most perilous precedent, where two knights of a county were duly elected, if any new writ should issue out for a second election, without order of the House, and without any consideration of this and such like differences belonging only to the House; and that there should be no message sent to the lord chancellor, not so much as to inquire what he had done under the direction of the queen, and conceived to be a matter derogatory to the power and privilege of the House. This is the most considerable, and almost only, instance of parliamentary liberty which occurs during the reign of that prince.

Outlaws, whether on account of debts or crimes, had been declared by the judges incapable of enjoying a seat in the House, where they must themselves be lawgivers; but this opinion of the judges had been frequently overruled. But, however, in the time of Vaughan, it was questioned for an outlawry, that, having proved all his debts to have been contracted by sureties, and to have been, most of them, honestly compounded, he was allowed, on the production of his house, to sit in the House itself, which plainly supposes that, otherwise, it would have been vacated, on account of the outlawry.

When James summoned this parliament, he issued a proclamation, in which, among many general advices, which he issued to all, he disapproved of the House's granting the last parliamentary complaints of their admitting outlaws, and reiterates that conduct of the House as a grand abuse.

may be called a quo warranto to seize all our liberties. A chancellor, added a third, by this course may null a parliament constituting what persons he pleases. Any suggestion, by any person, may be the cause of sending a new writ. It is come to this place to see whether the chancery or parliament ought to have authority.

Notwithstanding this watchful spirit of liberty which now appeared in the Commons, their deference for majesty was not appointed a curb upon them but that both Goodwin and Fortescue should be set aside, and a writ be issued, by warrant of the House, for a new election. Goodwin gave his consent, and the Commons embraced the expedient, but in such a manner, that while they showed their regard for the king, they secured for the future the free possession of their seats, and the right which they claimed of judging solely in their own elections and returns.

A power like this, so essential to the exercise of all their other powers, themselves so essential to public liberty, cannot fairly be deemed an encroachment in the Commons; but must be regarded an inherent privilege, happily rescued from the hands of those who have made it a point of their conduct to hinder the elections of some former parliaments had thrown upon it.

At the same time the Commons, in the case of Sir Thomas Shirley, established their power of punishing, as well as of presenting, any officer or officers whom they might think fit; and that is as much as to say, that they have the power to arrest, and to try and judge, and to execute the officers who either arrest or detain them. Their asserting of this privilege admits of the same reflection.

About this period, the minds of men throughout Europe, especially in England, were agitated by events of the most insensible, but insensible, revolution. Though letters had been revived in the preceding age, they were chiefly cultivated by those of sedentary professions; nor had they, till now, begun to spread themselves, in any degree, among men of the most useful parts of the world. Arts, sciences, and letters flourished everywhere every day receiving great improvements. Navigation had extended itself over the whole globe. Travelling was secure and agreeable. And the general system of politics in Europe was become more enlarged and comprehensive.

In consequence of this universal fermentation, the ideas of men enlarged themselves on all sides; and the several constituent parts of the Gothic governments, which seem to have lain inactive, began everywhere to operate and encroach on each other. On the continent, where the necessity of discipline had begotten standing armies, the princes commonly established an unlimited authority, and overpowered, by force or intrigue, the faction of the people. In England, too, the low condition, which, uncontrolled, flourishes extremely in all liberal nations, acc.

should create a proved marshal in every county, who might ride about with right or his followers in search of stragglers and vagabonds, the first time he catches any, he may punish them, more lightly by the rack, or the second time by whipping; but the third time he may hang them without trial or process on the first thought; and he thinks, that authority thus exercised, need not be restrained to the proved marshal, but the sheriff; because the latter magistrate having a profit by the forfeits of rebels may be tempted to hang innocent persons. Here a real absolute, or rather arbitrary, power is given out; and we may infer from all these passages, either that the word absolute here a different sense from what it does at present, or that men's ideas of the English as well as Irish government were then different. Thus the latter inference seems better. The word, being derived from the French, here always the same sense as in that language. An absolute monarchy, in Charles I's answer to the nineteen propositions, was opposed to a limited; and the king of England in acknowledged an absolute, so much had matters changed even before the civil war. In Sir Francis Bacon's Fortescue's a branch of a very old family much decayed in the regis of Edward the VIth, the word absolute is taken to the same sense as a present; and that the law of man is absolute. They were the princes of the house of Tudor who truly introduced that administration in this country, and that administration had a great deal of a very different form in the reign of Edward VIth. The princes before them were restrained by the barons; as those after them by the House of Commons. The people had, properly speaking, little liberty in either of these ancient governments, but least in the most recent.

quired new force, and was regulated by more enlarged views, suitable to that cultivated understanding which became every day more common among men of both directions. In consequence, with the precious remains of antiquity excited, in every generous breast, a passion for a limited constitution, and begat an emulation of those many virtues, which the Greek and Roman authors, by such animating examples as well as pathetic expressions, recommended to us. The severe though popular government of Elizabeth had confined this rising spirit within very narrow bounds: but when a new and a foreign family succeeded to the throne, and a prince less dreaded and more odious, sowed the seeds of the mighty appeared of a more free and independent genius in the nation.

Happily, this prince possessed neither sufficient capacity to perceive the alteration, nor sufficient art and vigour to check it in its early advances. For conscious of little personal authority, he had established within his own mind a speculative system of absolute government, which few of his subjects, he believed, and none but traitors and rebels, would make any scruple to admit. On whichever side he cast his eye, every thing concurred to encourage his prejudices. When he compared himself with the other hereditary sovereigns of Europe, and considered the position of the house of Stuart, he was entitled to equal prerogatives; not considering the innovations lately introduced by them, and the military force by which their authority was supported. In England, that power, almost unlimited, which had been exercised for centuries, especially during the late reign, ascribed solely to royal birth and title; not to the produce and spirit of the monarchs, nor to the conjunctures of the times. Even the opposition which he had struggled with in Scotland encouraged him still further in his favourite notions; while he there saw, that the same resistance which opposed regal authority, violated all law and order, and made way, either for the ravages of a barbarous nobility, or for the more intolerable violence of sedition and preachers. In his own person, therefore, he thought all legal power to be centred, by a hereditary and a divine right; and this opinion might have proved dangerous, if such to liberty, had not in his case, and its seeming evidence, induced him to trust solely to his right, without making the smallest provision, either of force or politics, in order to support it.

Such were the opposite dispositions of parliament and prince, at the commencement of the Scottish time; dispositions just beginning to exist and to appear in the parliament, but thoroughly established and openly avowed on the part of the prince.

Educated at the University of Cambridge, the judgment of the House of Commons appeared, not only in defence of their own privileges, but also in their endeavour, though at this time in vain, to free trade from those shackles which the high exerted prerogative, in this respect, the all-juridged monarchy of Elizabeth, had imposed upon it.

James had already, of his own accord, called in and numelled all the numerous patents for monopolies which had been granted by his predecessor, and which extremely fettered every species of domestic industry; but the exclusive companies still remained; another species of monopoly, by which almost all foreign trade, except that to France, was brought into the hands of a few rapacious enemies, and all prospect of future improvement of commerce was for ever sacrificed to a little temporary advantage of the sovereign. These companies, though arbitrarily elected, had carried their privileges so far, that almost as soon as the government of Scotland was centred in London; and it appears that the customs of that port amounted to 110,000l. a year, while all the domestic trade was reduced to 1604.—CHAP. XV. only seventeen thousand. Nay, the whole trade of London was confined to about two hundred persons, who were easily enabled, by combination among themselves, to fix whatever price they pleased both to the imports and exports of the nation. The committee appointed to consider this enormous grievance, one of the greatest which we have ever suffered, consisted of three persons, on account of which as a fact well known and avowed, however contrary to present received opinion, that shipping and seamen had sensibly decayed during all the preceding reigns. And indeed nothing be more common than complaints of the decay in shipping and seamen, and the crowd of the recently appeared of the same nation, yet it is this a consequence which might naturally result from such arbitrary establishments, at a time when the commerce of all the other nations of Europe, except that of Scotland, enjoyed full liberty and recovery.

While the Commons were thus attempting to give liberty to the trading part of the nation, they also endeavoured to free the landed property from the burden of impositions, and to remove those remains of the feudal tenures under which the nation still laboured. A just regard was shown to the crown in the conduct of this affair; nor was the remedy sought for, considered as a matter of right. Acts of supply were passed by which the king reaped, both from wards and from respite of homage, was estimated: and it was intended to compound for those prerogatives by a secure and independent revenue. But after some debates in the House, and some important recommendations of the Commons, and to certain more difficulties than could easily, at that time, be surmounted; and it was not then brought to any conclusion.

The same fate attended an attempt of a like nature, to free the nation from the burden of purveyance. This prerogative had been much abused by the purveyors, and the Commons showed some intention to offer the king fifty thousand pounds a year, for the abolition of that vexatious and even impatiently urged by the king. He justly regarded it as the peculiar felicity of his reign, that he had terminated the bloody annuities of these hostile nations, and had reduced the whole island under one government; enjoying tranquillity within itself and security from all foreign invasions. He hoped, that while his subjects of both kingdoms reflected on past disasters, besides regarding his person as infinitely precious, they would entertain the highest desire of securing to the crown the return of like calamities, by a thorough union of laws, parliaments, and privileges. He considered not, that this very reflection operated, as yet, in a contrary manner to this intention; and, kept alive the ill-natured jealousy of the nations, which had been carried to the greatest extremities, and required time to allay it. The more urgent the king appeared in promoting so useful a measure, the more backward was the English parliament in concurring with him; while he ascribed his excessive zeal to that partiality in favour of his ancient subjects, of which they thought, that, on other occasions, they had reason to complain. Their complaisance for the king, therefore, carried much further than to the abolition of English custom to meet with thirty-one Scottish commissioners, in order to deliberate concerning the terms of a union; but without any power of making advances towards the establishment of it.

The same spirit of independence, and perhaps not better judgment, appeared in the House of Commons when the question of supply was brought before them, by some members attached to the court. In vain was it urged, that though the king received a supply which had been voted to Elizabeth, he could not have the advantage of the latter's death; yet he found it burdened with a debt contracted by the queen, equal to the full amount of it: that peace was not yet thoroughly concluded with Spain, and that Elizabeth had still them in her view; that he had journeyed from Scotland, amidst such a concourse of people, and on that of the queen and royal family, he had expended considerable sums: and that as the courtiers had looked for greater supplies than previous to their departure, and that he had imposed on his generous nature; so the prince, in his turn, would expect, at the beginning, some mark of supply from his attache, and some consideration of his necessity. Even upon his being just the House of Commons by these topics; and the majority appeared fully determined to reject all supply. The burden of government, at that time, lay surprisingly light upon the people, that very reason, which to us, at this distance may seem a motive of generosity, was the real cause why the parliament was, on all occasions, so remarkably frugal and reserved. They were not, as yet, accustomed to open their purses in such a manner as their successors, in order to supply the want of their sovereign's income, and the smallest demand, however requisite, appeared in their eyes unreasonable and exorbitant. The Commons seem also to have been desirous of reducing the crown to still further necessities, which might have induced them to side with the Lords, for entailing the crown lands for ever on the king's heirs and successors. The disputation made by Elizabeth had probably taught James the necessity of this law, and shown them the advantage of refraining from it.

In order to cover a disappointment with regard to supply, which might bear a bad construction both at home and abroad, James sent a message to the House, in which he told them, he had not so far considered the prince, and he was very far from undertaking the charge of any man, so deserving of reforming what was never offered him. Soon after, on the 28th of July, he prorogued the parliament, not without discovering, in his speech, visible marks of dissatisfaction, and so early in his reign, or his course to make public complaints of the restless and encroaching spirit of the puritanical party, and of the malevolence with which they endeavoured to inspire the Commons. Nor were his complaints without interest; since the Commons, now finding themselves free from the arbitrary government of Elizabeth, made application for a conference with the Lords, and presented a petition to the king; the purport of both which was, that they have left them in a situation, the unrelaxation of the ecclesiastical laws. The use of the surplize, and of the cross in baptism, is here chiefly complained of; but the remedy seems to have been expected solely from the crown, whereas it must contain that application and petition, we may also see proofs of the violent animosity of the Commons against the catholics, together with the intolerable spirit of that assembly.

This summer the peace with Spain was finally concluded, and was signed by the Spanish ministers at London. In the conferences previous to this treaty, the nations were found to have so few claims on each other, that, except on account of the support given by England to the Low Countries province, which was abandonned, the difference between the powers of Philip and Elizabeth, than any contrariety of political interests between their subjects. Some articles in the treaty, which seemed prejudicial to the Dutch commonwealth, were never executed by the king; and as the Spaniards made no complaints on that head, it appeared that, by secret agreement, the king had expressly reserved the power of sending assistance to the Hollanders. The constable of Castile came into England to ratify the peace; and on the part of England, the Earl of Hertford was sent into the Low Countries for the same purpose, and the Earl of Nottingham, his successor. The Earl of Cumberland, who was an old man, and whom the pope had represented as so many monsters and infernal demons.

Though England, by means of her naval force, was perfectly secure during the latter years of the Spanish war, James showed an impatience to put an end to hostilities; and soon after his accession, before any terms of peace were concerted, or even proposed by Spain, he recalled all the letters of marque which had been granted by Queen Elizabeth. Archduke Albert had made some advances of a like nature, which invited the king to take this friendly step. But what is remarkable; in James's proclamation for that purpose, he plainly supposes, that, as he had himself, while King of Scotland, always lived in unity with the pope, so he had army, and that and that they had reaccession to the crown of England, without any articles of treaty or agreement, he had ended the war between the kingdoms. This ignorance of the law of nations, by which Spain may appear surprising, in a monarch, who was thirty-six years of age, and who had reigned from his infancy; did we not consider that a King of Scotland, who lives in close friendship with England, has few transactions with foreign princes, and has little opportunity of acquiring experience. Unhappily for James, his timidity, his prejudices, his indulgence, his love of amusement, particularly of hunting, to which he was addicted, and, perhaps, much addicted, has not so much as hindered the progress in the knowledge or practice of foreign policies, and in a little time diminished that regard which all the neighbouring nations had paid to England during the reign of his predecessor.
in this sense some obliging expressions of the king's, or that he had employed such an artifice, in order to render them not witness; and yet they discovered their mistake; and were at once surprised and enraged to find James, on all occasions, express his intention of strictly executing the laws enacted against them, and of persevering to all the rigorous measures of Elizabeth. Meanwhile, some of his Royalist friends, palling with the sad prospect of an accursed family, first thought of a most extraordinary method of revenge; and he opened his intention to Piercy, a descendant of the illustrious house of Northumberland. In one of their conversations, with regard to the excommunication of the catholics, Piercy, having broken into a sally of passion, and mentioned assassinating the king, Catesby took the opportunity of revealing to him a nobler and more extensive plan of treason, which not only included a sure execution of vengeance, but afforded some hopes of restoring the catholic religion in England. To vain, said he, would you put an end to the king's life; he has children, who would succeed both to his crown and to his maxims of government. To vain would you extinguish the whole royal family: the nobility, the gentry, the parliament, are all infected with the same heresy, and could raise to the throne another prince and another family, who, besides their hatred to our religion, could be an insurmountable bar to revenge for the tragic death of their predecessors. To serve any good purpose, we must destroy, at one blow, the king, the royal family, the Lords, the Commons; and having ascended the throne in common, they are all assembled on the first meeting of the parliament; and afford us the opportunity of glorious and useful vengeance. Great preparations will not be requisite. A few of us, combining, may run a man below the hail in which they meet; and choosing the very moment when the king harangues both Houses, consign over to destruction these determined foes to all piety and religion. Meanwhile, we ourselves standing aloof, safe and unsuspected, shall triumph in being the instruments of divine wrath, and shall behold with pleasure those sacrilegious walls, in which were passed the edicts for proscribing our church and butchering our children, tossed into a thousand fragments; while their impious inhabitants, meditating, perhaps, still new persecutions against us, pass from flames above to flames below, there for ever to endure the torments due to their offences.

Piercy was charmed with this project of Catesby; and they agreed to communicate the matter to a few more, and among the rest to Thomas Winter, whom they sent over to Flanders in quest of Fawkes, an officer in the Spanish service, whose name and exploits were all thoroughly acquainted. When they estiblished any new conspirator, in order to bind him to secrecy, they always, together with an oath, employed the communion, the most sacred of all religions. And no one of these pious devotees over entertained the least compunction with regard to the cruel massacre which they projected of whatever was great and eminent in the nation. Some of them only were startled by the reflection, that of necessity many catholics must be present; as spectators or attendants on the king, or as having seats in the House of Peers; but Tenson, a Jesuit, and Garnet, superior of that order in England, removed these scruples, and showed them how the interests of religion required that the innocent should here be sacrificed with the guilty. All this passed in the spring and summer of the year 1604; when the conspirators also hired a house in Piercy's name, and in which that was done which was to assemble. Towards the end of that year they began their operations. That they might be less interrupted, and give less suspicion to the neighbourhood, they carried in store of gunpowder and other things desired from the work. Obstinacy in their purpose, and confirmed by passion, by principle, and by mutual extortion, they little feared death in comparison of a disappointment; and having provided arms, together with the instruments of their design, they resolved there to perform in the vaults the discovery. Their perseverance advanced the work; and they soon pierced the wall, though three yards in thickness; but on approaching the other side, they were somewhat startled at hearing a noise which they knew could not be the noise of men. On examining, they found that it came from the vault below the House of Lords; that a magazine of coals had been kept there; and that, as the coals were selling off, the vault would be let to the highest bidder. The opportunity was immediately seized; the place being thick packed with the pyramids of coals in it; the whole covered up with faggots and billets; the doors of the cellar boldly flung open; and every body admitted, as if it contained nothing dangerous.

Concerning these preparations, the conspirators took forward, and to plan the remaining part of their project. The king, the queen, Prince Henry, were all expected to be present at the opening of parliament. The duke, by reason of his tender age, would be absent; and it was resolved, that Piercy should seize him, or assassinate him. The Princess Elizabeth, a child likewise, was kept at Lord Harrington's house in Warwickshire; and Sir Everard Digby, Rookwood, Grant, being let into the conspiracy, engaged to assemble their friends, on pretence of a hunting match, and seizing that princess, immediately to proclaim her queen. So transported were they with rage against their adversaries, and so charmed with the prospect of revenge, that they forgot all care of their own safety. To this end was the general confusion which must result from so unexpected a blow, they foresaw not, that the fury of the people, now unrestrained by any authority, must have turned against them, in the least, and that the whole was situated by itself, by a universal massacre of the catholics.

The day, so long wished for, now approached, on which the parliament was appointed to assemble. The dreadful secret, though communicated to above twenty persons, had been religiously kept, during the space of near a year and a half. No remorse, no pity, no fear of punishment, no hope of reward, had as yet induced any one conspirator either to whisper the secret, or might trust it to others. The holy fury had extinguished in their breast every other motive; and it was an indiscretion at last, proceeding chiefly from these very bigoted prejudices and partialities, which saved the nation.

Ten days before the meeting of parliament, Lord Montague, a catholic, son to Lord Morley, received the following letter, which had been delivered to his servant by an unknown hand. My Lord, Out of the love I bear to some of your friends, I love a core of your proceedings. Therefore I would advise you, as you tender your life, to devise some scheme to shift off your attendance at this parliament. For God and men have concurred to punish the widows, who hire to avenge the injuries done you; and to give notice, by a public advertisement: But retire yourself into your country, where you may expect the event in safety. For though there be no appearance of any stir, yet, I say, they will receive a terrible example, and whether you choose to be saved or not, it shall not hurt them. This counsel is not to be condemned, because it may do you good, and con do you no harm: for the danger is past, as soon as you have burned the letter. And I hope God will give you the grace to make good use of it, unto whose holy protection I commend you.

Montague knew not what to make of this letter; and though inclined to think it a foolish attempt to frighten and ridicule him, he judged it safest to carry it to Lord Salisbury, secretary of state. Though Salisbury was inclined to pay little attention to it, he thought proper to lay it before the king, who came to town a few days after. To the king it appeared not so much a matter; and from the sense of the letter, he conjectured, that it implied something dangerous and important. A terrible blow, and yet the authors concealed; a danger so sudden, and yet so great: these circumstances seemed all to denote some conspiracy of the first magnitude, which the king was thought unsafe to inspect all the vaults below the Houses of Parliament. This care belonged to the Earl of Saffolk, lord chamberlain; who purposely delayed the search, till the day before the meeting of parliament. He remarked those great piles of wood and coal, in which they were, that lay in the vault under the upper House, and he cast his eye upon Fawkes, who stood in a dark corner, and passed himself for Piercy’s servant. That daring and determined courage, which so much distinguished this conspirator, even among those heroes in villany, was fully painted in his countenance, as it was not unnoticed by the observer. Such a quantity also of fuel, for the use of one who lived so little in town as Piercy, appeared a little extraordinary; and upon comparing all circumstances, it was resolved that a more thorough inspection should be made. About eight o’clock that night, Sir Thomas Overton, a justice of peace, was sent with proper attendants; and before the door of the vault finding Fawkes, who had just finished all his preparations, he immediately seized him, and turning over the faggots, discovered the primitive place and the proper fire for setting fire to the train, were taken in Fawkes’s pocket; who finding his guilt now apparent, and seeing no refuge but in boldness and despair, expressed the utmost regret that he had lost the opportunity of firing the powder at once, and of sweetening his own death by that of his enemies. Before the council, he displayed the same intrepid firmness, mixed even with scorn and disdain; refusing to discover his accomplices, and showing so much concern for the failure of the enterprise. This obstinacy lasted two or three days: but being confined to the Tower, left to reflect on his guilt and danger, and the rack being but a small thing to him, his courage, fatigued with so long an effort, and supported by no other, at last failed him; and he made a full discovery of all the conspirators. Catesby, Piercy, and the other criminals, who were in London, though they had heard of the alarm taken at the letter, supposed it to flow from the star-chamber; and their numbers were nearly reduced to the utmost, and never abandon their hopes of success. But at last, hearing that Fawkes was arrested, they hurried down to Warwickshire, where Sir Everard Digby, thinking himself assured that success had attended his confederates, was already in arms, in order to seize the Princess Elizabeth. She had escaped into Coventry; and they were about to place themselves on defence against the country, who were raised from all quarters, and armed, by the sheriff. The conspirators, with all their attendants, never exceeded the number of eighty persons; and being surrounded on every side, could no longer entertain hopes, either of prevailing or escaping. Having therefore confessed themselves, and received absolution, they boldly prepared for death, and resolved to sell their lives as dear as possible to the assailants. But even this miserable consolation was denied them. Some of their powder took fire, and disabled them for defence. The people rushed in upon them. Piercy and Catesby were killed by one shot. Digby, Rockwood, Winter, and others, being taken prisoners, were put to the other methods of exposing themselves, as well as Garnet, by the hands of the executioner. Notwithstanding this horrid crime, the bigoted catholics were so devoted to Garnet, that they fancied miracles to be wrought by his blood; and in Spain he was regarded as a martyr.

Neither had the desperate fortune of the conspirators urged them to this enterprise, nor had the former proficiency of their lives prepared them for so great a crime. Before that audacious attempt, their conduct seems, in general, to be liable to no reproach. Catesby’s character had entitled him to such regard, that Rockwood and Digby were seduced by their implicit trust in his judgments, which, coming from the motive alone of friendship to him, they were ready, on any occasion; to have sacrificed their lives. Digby himself was as highly esteemed and beloved as any man in England; and he had been much beloved and esteemed with the generation of Queen Elizabeth. It was bigoted revenge, the most absurd of prejudices masked with reason, the most criminal of passions covered with the appearance of duty, which seduced them into measures, that were fatal to themselves, as well as to the national honor.

The Lords Mordaunt and Stouonton, two catholics, were fined, the former ten thousand pounds, the latter four thousand, by the star-chamber; because their absence from parliament had been a suspicion of their being acquainted with the conspiracy. The Earl of Northumberland was fined thirty thousand pounds, and detained several years prisoner in the Tower; because, not to mention other grounds of suspicion, he had admitted Piercy into the number of the gentleman pensioners, without taking the requisite oaths.

The king, in his speech to the parliament, observed, that, though religion had engaged the conspirators in so criminal an attempt, yet ought we not to involve all the Roman catholics in the same guilt; or propose they equally disposed to commit such enormous barbarities. Many holy men, he said, and our ancestors among the rest, had been seduced to concur with that church in her scholastic doctrines, who yet had never admitted her seditious principles, concerning the Pope’s power of deposing kings, or sanctifying assassination. The wrath of Heaven is denounced against crimes, but innocent errors may obtain its favour; and not a few honest and charitable men, of the charitableness of the puritans, who condemn alike to eternal torments even the most inoffensive partisans of popery. For his part, he added, that conspiracy, however atrocious, should not always be the least punished, but every assignation of villany, while with one hand be punished, with the other be would still support and protect innocence. After this speech, he prorogued the parliament till the 22d of January.

The moderation, and, I may say, magnanimity, of the king, immediately after so narrow an escape from a most detestable conspiracy, was nowise agreeable to his subjects. Their animosity against popery, that had been incited by the provocation, had risen to a great pitch; and it had perhaps been more prudent in James, by a little dissimulation, to have confirmed himself to it. His theological learning, confirmed by disputation, had happily fixed his judgement in the Protestant faith; yet was his heart a little biased by the allurements of Rome, and he had been well pleased, if the making of some advances could have effected an union with that ancient mother-church. He strove to abate the acrimony of his own subjects against the religion of their fathers: he became himself the object of their difference and avarice. Whatever measures he embraced, in Scotland to introduce prelacy, in England to enforce the authority of the English church, and support its rites and ceremonies, were interpreted as so many steps towards popery, and were represented by the puritans as symptoms of idolatry and superstition. Ignorant of the consequences, or unwilling to sacrifice to politics his inclination, which he called his conscience, he persevered in the same measures, and gave trust and preference, almost indifferently, to his catholic and protestant subjects. And finding his person, as well as his title, less obnoxious to the church of Rome, than those of Elizabeth, he gradually abated the rigour of those laws, which had been enacted against the church, and which were so acceptable to his bigoted subjects. But the effects of these dispositions on both sides became not very sensible till towards the conclusion of his reign.

At this time James seems to have possessed the affections of even his English subjects, and, in a tolerable degree, their esteem and regard. Hitherto their complaints were chiefly levelled against his too great proximity in his early friendships; a quality which, had it been attended with more economy, the wise would have excused, and the candid would perhaps have applauded. His parts, which were not despotic, and his learning, which was great, being highly extolled by his courtiers and gowns-men, and not yet tried in the management of any delicate affairs, for which he was unfit, raised a high idea of him in the difficulty was a subtle scheme, not destitute of ridicule or uncertainty that he received the title of the second Solomon. A report, which was suddenly spread about this time, of his being assassinated, visibly struck a great consternation among all orders of men. The Commons also abated, this session, somewhat of their excessive frugality, and granted him an aid, payable in four years, of three subsidies and six sixteens, which Sir Francis Bacon said in the House,* might amount to about four hundred thousand pounds; and for once the king and parliament parted in friendship and good humour. The hatred which the catholics so visibly bore him, gave him at this time an additional value to the eyes of his people. The only considerable point in which the Commons incurred his displeasure, was by discovering their constant good-will to the puritans, in whose favour they desired a conference with the Lords, which was rejected. The chief affair transacted next session, was the intended union of the two kingdoms. Nothing could exceed the king's passion and zeal for this noble enterprise, but the parliament's prejudice and reluct-tance. There remains two excellent speeches in favour of the union, which it would not be improper to compare together; that of the king, and that of Sir Francis Bacon. Those who affect in every thing such an extreme contempt for the James, will be surprised to find, that his discourse, both for good reasoning and eloquent composition, approaches very near that of a man, who was undoubtedly, at that time, one of the greatest geniuses in Europe. A few trivial indiscretions and indecorums may be said to mar the proportion of the whole, and mark it as his own. And, in general, so open and avowed a declartion in favour of a measure, while he had taken so care, by any precaution or intrigue, to insure success, may solely be ascribed to the interest and the feelings of the managing parliaments, by private interest or cabal, being found hitherto of little use or necessity, had not, as yet, become a part of English politics. In the common course of affairs, government could be conducted without their assent, and when their concurrence became necessary to the meaures of the crown, it was, generally speaking, except in times of great faction and discontent, obtained without much difficulty. The king's influence seems to have rendered the Scottish parliament cordial in all the steps which they took towards the union. Though the advantages which Scotland might hope from that measure were more consideration; yet were the Scotch people, with regard to this kingdom, more striing and obvious. The benefit which must have resulted to England, both by accession of strength and security, was not despicable; and as the English were by far the greater nation, and possessed the seat of government, the objections, either from the point of honour or from jealousy, could not reasonably have any place among them. The English parliament, indeed, seem to have been swayed merely by the vulgar motive of national ambition. And they persisted so obstinately in their prejudices, that all the efforts for a thorough union and incorporation ended only in the abolition of the hostile laws formerly enacted between the kingdoms.

Some precipitate steps which the king, a little after his accession, had taken, in order to promote his favourite project, had been observed to do more injury than service. From his own authority he had assumed the title of King of Great Britain, and had quarreled with the terms of Scotland, with those of England, in all coins, flags, and ensigns. He had also engaged the judges to make a declaration, that all those who, after the union of the crowns, should be born in either kingdom, were, for that reason alone, naturalized in both. This was a new question, and, according to the ideas of those times, susceptible of subtle reasoning on both sides. The king was the same: the parliaments were different. To render the people therefore the same, we must suppose that the sovereign authority resided chiefly in the proroguing the king, and who were not destiute to assist with money and advice, than endowed with any controlling or active powers in the government. It is evi dent, says Bacon, in his pleadings on this subject, that all other commonwealths, monarchies only excepted, submit not to any foreign power. For a monarch, being divided amongst many officers, and they not perpetual, but annual or temporary, and not to receive their authority but by election, and certain persons too have voices only in that election, and the like; these are busy and curious frames. Which of sensitivity do presuppose a low precedent, written or unwritten, to guide and direct them; but in monarchies, especially hereditary, that is, when several families or lineages of people do submit themselves to one, and imperial, the substitution is more natural and simple; which afterwards, by law subsequent, is perfected, and made more formal; but that is grounded upon nature. It would seem, from this reasoning, that the concurrence of the king, though implicitly supposed, in many public transactions, had scarcely ever, as yet, been expressly formed by any English lawyer or politician.

But the beginning of this century, that is, of the reign of the parliament with regard to the union, and an attempt on the king's ecclesiastical judgd, most of their measures, during this session, were sufficiently respectful and obliging; though they still discovered a rigorous spirit and a careful attention to the national liberty. The speeches, also, of the Commons show, that the House contained a mixture of puritans, who had acquired great authority among them, and who, together with religious prejudices, were continually soliciting edicts to control the civil form of government. The natural appetite for rule made the Commons lend a willing ear to every doctrine which tended to augment their own power and influence.

A petition was made to the lower house, A D. 1602, for a more rigorous execution of the laws against popish recusants, and an abatement towards protestant clergymen, who scrupled to observe the ceremonies. Both these points were equally unacceptable to the king; and he sent orders to the House to proceed no further in that matter. The Commons were inclined, at first, to consider these orders as a breach of privilege; but they soon accepted, and were told that this measure was supported by many precedents during the reign of Eliza-beL Had they been always disposed to make the precedents of that reign the rule of their conduct, they never could have had any quarrel with any of their measures. The complaints of Spanish depredations were very loud among the English merchants. The lower house sent a message to the Lords, desiring a conference with them, in order to their presenting a joint petition to the king on the subject. The Lords took some time to deliberate on this message; because they said the matter was weighty and rare. It probably occurred to them at first, that the parliament's interposing so affairs of state would appear unusual and extraordinary. And to show in this petition they were not guided by court influence, after they had delerated, they agreed to the conference.

The House of Commons began now to feel themselves of some power, and in the motion of Sir Edward Sandys, a member of great authority, they entered, for the first time, an order for the regular keeping of their journals. 4 When all business was finished, the king prorogued the parlia-mament.

About this time there was an insurrection of the coun-dy people in Northamptonshire, headed by one Reynolds, 5 a man of low condition. They went about destroying ed closures; but carefully avoided committing any other outrage. This insurrection was easily suppressed, and though great lenity was used towards the rioters, yet were some of the ringleaders punished. The chief cause of that frightful commotion seems to have been, of itself, far from trivial. The practice still continued in England, of disusing tillage, and throwing the land into enclosures for the sake of pasture. By this means the kingdom was depopulated, at least previously to what had been expected from the daily increase of industry and commerce.

A.D. 1609.

Next year presents us with nothing memorable; but in the spring of the succeeding year, after a long negotiation, was concluded, by a truce of twelve years, that war, which for near half a century had been carried on with such fury between Spain and the States of the United Provinces. Never contest seemed at first, more unequal: never contest was finished with more honour to the weaker party. On the side of Spain were numbers, riches, authority, discipline; on the side of the revolted provinces were found the attachment to liberty and the enthusiasm of religion. By her naval enterprises the republic maintained her armies; and, joining peaceful industry to military power, she was enabled, by her own force, to support herself, and gradually rely on those neighbouring princes, who, from jealousy to Spain, were at first prompted to encourage her revolt. Louis had the pride of that monarchy prevailed over her interest, and prepared the way of those methods of accommodation with her rebellious subjects. But finding all intercourse cut off between her provinces by the maritime force of the States, she at last agreed to treat with them as a free people, and to renounce all claim and pretension to their sovereignty.

March 30.

This chief point being gained, the treaty was easily brought to a conclusion, under the joint mediation of King James and of the Earl of Salisbury. All exterior appearances of honour were paid equally to both crowns: but very different were the sentiments which the States, as well as all Europe, entertained of the princes who wore them. France was most gay and vigorous, the chief circumstances which procure regard among foreign nations, shone out as conspicuously in Henry as they were deficient in James. To a contempt of the English monarch, Henry made a considerable degree of jealousy and aversion, which was communicated to his friends without foundation. James was just and fair in all transactions with his allies, but it appears from the memoirs of those times, that each side deemed him partial towards their adversary, and fancied that he harboured secret designs against them. So little equity have men in their judgments of their own affairs; and so dangerous is that entire neutrality affected by the king of England.

A.D. 1610.

The little concern which James took in foreign affairs renders the domestic occurrences, particularly those of parliament, the most interesting of his reign. A new session was held this spring; the king full of hopes of receiving supply; the Commons of circumscribing his prerogative. The Earl of Salisbury, now created treasurer on the death of the Earl of Dorset, laid open the king's necessities, first to the Peers, then to a committee of the lower House. He insisted on the unavoidable expense of the army, and in suppressing a late insurrection in Ireland: he mentioned three numerous courts which the king was obliged to maintain, for himself, for the queen, and for the Prince of Wales; he reminded them, though a single woman, had received very large supplies in the years preceding her death, which alone were extensive to her; and he remarked, that, during her reign, she had drawn out many of the crown lands; an expedient which, though it supplied her present necessities, without laying burdens on her people, extremely multiplied the necessities of her successor. From all these causes he thought it no wise strange, that the king's income should fall short so great a sum as eighty-one thousand pounds of his stated and regular expense; without mentioning contingent charges, which ought always to be esteemed a fourth of the yearly charges. And as the crown was now necessarily burdened with a great and urgent debt of three hundred thousand pounds, he hence inferred the absolute necessity of an immediate and large supply from the people.

To all these reasons, so much for James, and much more for the Commons, the Commons appealed; they urged in a speech addressed to both Houses, the Commons remained inexorable. But, not to shock the king with an absolute refusal, they granted him one subsidy and one fifteenth; which, when added to the other, made up three hundred thousand pounds. And James received the mortification of discovering, in vain, all his wants, and of begging aid of subjects who had no reasonable indulgence or consideration for him.

Among the many causes of disgust and quarrel, which now daily and unavoidably multiplied between prince and parliament, this article of money is to be regarded as none of the least considerable. After the discovery and conquest of the West Indies, gold and silver became every day more plentiful in England, as well as in the rest of Europe; and the price of all commodities and provisions rose to a height, which had never been equalled before, and the decline of the Roman empire. As the revenue of the crown rose not in proportion, the prince was insensibly reduced to poverty amidst the general riches of his subjects, and required additional funds, in order to support the same magnificence of court and government as he had been accustomed to enjoy under former monarchs. But, while money thus flowed into England, we may observe, that, at the same time, and probably from that very cause, arts and industry of all kinds received a new impulse; and the enjoyment of life became better known and more cultivated among all ranks of people. The king's servants, both civil and military, his courtiers, his ministers, demanded moremoney from the crown, than the prince, and were not contented with the same simplicity of living which had satisfied their ancestors. The prince himself began to regard an increase of pomp and splendor as requisite to support the dignity of his character, and to preserve the same superiority above his subjects, which his predecessors had enjoyed. Some equality too, and proportion to the other sovereigns of Europe, it was natural for him to desire; and as they had universally enlarged their revenue, and multiplied their taxes, the King of England deemed it reasonable that his subjects, who were generally as rich as theirs, should bear with patience some additional burdens and impositions.

Unhappily for the king, those very riches, with the increasing knowledge of the age, bred opposite sentiments in his subjects; and begot a spirit of freedom and independence, disposed them to pay little regard either to the entreaties or menaces of their sovereign. While the barons possessed their former immense property and extensive jurisdictions, they were apt, at every disgust, to endanger the monarch, and throw the whole government into confusion; but this confusion often, in its turn, proved favourable to the monarch, and made him again submit to him in order to re-establish justice and tranquillity. After the power of alterations, as well as the increase of commerce, had enabled them to support the navy, the hands of the Commons, the situation of affairs, and the dispositions of men, became susceptible of a more regular plan of liberty; and the laws were not supported singly by the authority of the people. And though in the interval, after the decline of the Peers, and before the people had experienced their force, the princes assumed an exorbitant power, and had almost annihilated the constitution under the weight of their prerogative; as soon as the Commons recovered from their lethargy, they seem to have been astonished at the danger, and were resolved to secure liberty or former barriers than their ancestors had hitherto provided for it.

Had James possessed a very rigid frugality, he might have warded off this crisis somewhat longer; and, waiting patiently for a favourable opportunity to increase and fix his revenue, might have secured the extensive authority transmitted to him. On the other hand, had the Commons been inclined to act with more generosity and kindness towards their prince, they might probably have turned his necessities to good account, and have bribed him to depart peaceably from the more dangerous articles of his prerogative. But he was a foreigner, and ignorant of the arts of state. He had lived in a previous age, and his views, being formed to regulate their opinions, more by the future consequences which they forewove, than by the former precedents, which were set before them; and they less aspired at maintaining the prerogative, than at establishing a new one, and a freer, and a better. In their remonstrances to the king on this occasion, they observed it to be a general opinion, That the reasons of that practice might be extended more further, even to the utter ruin of the ancient liberty of the subjects, and the subjects' right of property in their lands and goods. Though expeditiously forbidden by the king to touch his prerogative, they passed a bill abolishing these impositions; which was rejected by the House of Lords.

In another address to the king, they objected to the practice of borrowing upon privy seals, and desired that the subjects should not be forced to lend money to his majesty, to the prejudice of their property, and that mums likewise were thrown out in the House against a new monopoly of the licence of wines. It must be confessed, that forced loans and monopolies were established on much the same ancient as well as recent precedents; though diematically opposite to all the principles of a free government.

The House likewise discovered some discontent against the king's taking his name and titles, James told them. That though he well knew, by the constitution and policy of the kingdom, that proclamations were not of equal force with laws; yet he thought it a duty incumbent on him, and a power inseparably annexed to the crown, to restrain by these measures and instructions as he saw growing on the state, against which no certain law was extant, and which might tend to the great detriment of the subject, if there should be no remedy provided till the meeting of a parliament. And this prerogative, he adds, our progenitors have, in all times, used and enjoyed. The intervals between sessions, we may observe, were frequently so long, as to render it necessary for a prince to interpose by his prerogative. The legality of this exertion was established by uniform and undoubted practice; and was even acknowledged by lawyers, who, more, however, this difference between laws and proclamations, that the authority of the former was perpetual, that of the latter determined, in many respects, as in others, it is easy to see how inaccurate the English constitution was, before the parliament was enabled, by continued acquisitions or encroachments, to establish it on fixed principles of liberty.

Upon the settlement of the Reformation, that extensive branch of power which regards ecclesiastical matters, being then without an owner, seemed to belong to the first occupant; and Henry VIII. failed not immediately to seize it for himself, even to the prejudice of his kingdom. The possession of it was continued with Edward, and recovered by Elizabeth; and that ambitious princess was so remarkably jealous of this flower of her crown, that she severely punished by fines and new rates which she established: the customs, during his whole reign, rose only from 127,000 pounds a year to 190,000, though besides the increase of the rates, there was a sensible increase of commerce and industry during that period; every commodity, besides, which might serve to the subsistence of the people, or might be considered as a material of manufactures, was exempted from the new impositions of James; but all this caution could not prevent the complaints of the Commons. A spirit of liberty had now taken possession of the House: the leading members, men of an independent spirit and the views, began to regulate their opinions, more by the future consequences which they forewove, than by the former precedents, which were set before them; and they less aspired at maintaining the prerogative, than at establishing a new one, and a freer, and a better. on these occasions. But James's parliaments were much less obsequious. They ventured to lift up their eyes, and to consider this prerogative. They saw a large proportion of government, possessed by the king alone, and severely contested with the parliament. They were sensible that this province admitted not of an exact boundary or circumscription. They had felt that the Roman pontiff in former ages, under pretense of religion, was expressly made inimical to the disabilities and limitations of the crown. They saw, and were not less sensible that, besides the diminution of his authority, many inconveniences must necessarily result from the abolishing of all discretionary powers in every magistrate; and that this change, if generally digested, could not possibly provide against every contingency; much less, where they had not, as yet, attained a sufficient degree of accuracy and refinement.

But the business which chiefly occupied the Commons during this session, was the abolition of warships and purveyance; prerogatives which had been more or less touched on, every session, during the whole reign of James. In this affair, the Commons employed the proper measures for the restriction of the power of the king, which would be a settled revenue as an equivalent for the powers which he should part with; and the king was willing to hear to terms. After much dispute he agreed to give up 200,000 pounds a year, which they agreed to confer upon him. And nothing remained, towards closing the bargain, but that the Commons should determine the funds by which this sum should be levied. This session was too far advanced to bring to a difficult matter to a full conclusion; and though the parliament met again, towards the end of the year, and resumed the question, they were never able to terminate an affair upon which they seemed so intent. The journals of that session are no way sufficient to give the general idea of what passed. But it is known that they were very negligent in relating parliamentary affairs, of whose importance they were not sufficiently apprised, we know not exactly the reason of this failure. It only appears, that the king was extremely dissatisfied with the conduct of the parliament, and soon after dissolved it. This was his first parliament, and it sat near seven years.

Amidst all these attacks, some more, some less violent, on royal prerogative, the king displayed, as openly as ever, all his exalted notions of monarchy and the authority of princes. Even in a speech to the parliament, where he begged for supply, and where he should naturally have used every art to ingratiate himself with that assembly, he expressed himself in these terms: "I conclude, then, you have not point touching the power of kings, with this axiom of divinity, that, as to dispute what God may do, is blasphemy, but what God wills, that divines may lawfully and in every magistrate, he still continued to be possessed of every power. But just kings will ever be willing to declare what they will do if they will not incur the curse of God. I will not be guilty of a wrong, that my subjects may be benefited. I will be thought to make the reason appear of my doings, and rule my actions according to my laws."

Notwithstanding the great extent of prerogative in that age, these expressions would probably give some offence. But we must observe, that, as the king's despotism was more speculative than practical, so the independency of the Commons was, at this time, the reverse; and though strongly supported by their present situation, as well as disposition, was too new, and too little established, to be yet founded on systematic principles and opinions.

This year was distinguished by a memorable event, which gave great alarm and concern to the nation. This was the death of the English monarch by the pontiff of the fanatical Raisailce. With his death, the glory of the French monarchy suffered an eclipse for some years; and as that kingdom fell under an administration which was hated, foreign and domestic disputes multiplied, and the Austrians began anew to appear formidable to Europe. In England, the antipathy to the Catholics received a little upon this tragic event; and some of the princes which had formerly been enacted, in order to keep these religions in awe, began now to be executed with greater rigour and severity.

Though James's timidity and indulgence fixed him, during most of his reign, in a very prudent situation, and there was no foreign affair, in which he happened this year an event in Europe of such mighty consequence as to rouse him from his lethargy, and summon up all his zeal and enterprise. A professor of divinity, named Vorstius, an Armenian, was called from a German to a Dutch university; and as he differed from his Brittanic majesty in some nice questions concerning the intimate essence and secret decrees of God, he was considered as a dangerous rival in schismatical fame, and was at last obliged to yield to the legations of that royal doctor, whose syllogisms he might have refuted or studied. If vigour was wanting in other incidents of James's reign, here he behaved even worse. His indulgence and inattention would have been obviated, after several remonstrances, to deprive Vorstius of his chair, and to banish them to dominions. The king carried no further his animosity against that professor; though he had very charitably hinted to the States, that, as to the burning of Vorstius for his blasphemies and atheism, he left them to their own Christian wisdom; but surely never heretic better deserved the flames. It is to be remarked, that at this period, all over Europe, except in Holland alone, the practice of burning heretics still prevailed, even in protestant countries; and instances were not wanting in England during the reign of James.

To consider James in a more advantageous light, we must regard him as the legal successor of Ireland; and most of the institutions, which he had framed for civilizing that kingdom, being finished about this period, it may not here be improper to give some account of them. He frequently acted the part of the management of the country as his master- piece; and it will appear, upon inquiry, that his vanity, in this particular, was not altogether without foundation.

After the subjection of Ireland by Eliza- beth, the more difficult task of civilizing the inhabitants, to reconcile them to laws and industry, and to render their subjection durable and useful to the crown of England. James proceeded in this work by a steady, regular, and well-concerted plan; and in the space of only seven years, according to Sir John Davis, he made greater advances towards the reformation of that kingdom, than had been made in the four hundred and forty years which had elapsed since the conquest was first attempted.

It was previously necessary to abolish the Irish customs, which supplied the place of laws, and were calculated to keep that people for ever in a state of barbarism and disorder.

By the Brocas law or custom, every crime, however enormous, was punished, not with death, but by a fine, or pecuniary mulct, which was levied upon the criminal. Murder itself, as among all the ancient barbarous nations, was punished in a different manner; and according to his rank, had a different rate or value affixed to him, which if any one were willing to pay, he needed not fear retribution of his enemy. This rate was called his erce. When Sir William Fitzwilliams, being lord deputy, told Maguire, that he was to send a sheriffs to Ferrmanah, which, a little before, had been made a county, and subjected to the English law; Your sheriff, said Maguire, should, in my best let me go out, or the head, or the price of his head, that, if my people cut it off, I may ley the money upon the county. As for oppression, extortion, and other trespasses, so little were they regarded, that no penalty was affixed to them, and no redress for such wrongs was ever obtained.

The customs of Gavelkind and Tinity were attended with the same absurdity in the distribution of property. The land, by the custom of Gavelkind, was divided among the male of the seers, or family of Irish custom, both bastard and legitimate; and, after partition made, if any of the sept died, his portion was not shared out among his sons; but the cheftain, at his discretion, made a new partition of all the land belonging to that sept, and gave every one of his heirs a share. As no man, by reason of this custom, enjoyed the fixed property of any land; to build, to plant, to enclose, to cultivate, to improve, would have been so much lost labour. The same thing was the case drawn from the principal families, were not hereditary, but were established by election, or, more properly speaking, by force and violence. Their authority was almost absolute; and, notwithstanding that certain lands were assigned to the churches, its chief profit resulted from exactions, dues, assessments, for which there was no fixed law, and which were levied at pleasure. Hence arose that common bye-word among the Irish That they knew no westward of the law, which itself beyond the river of the Barron; through the country, where the English inhabited, and which extended not beyond the compass of twenty miles, lying in the neighbourhood of Dublin.

While following these Irish customs, and substituting English law in their place, James, having taken all the motives under his protection, and declared them free citizens, proceeded to govern them by a regular administration, military and civil.

A small army was maintained, its discipline inspected, and its pay transmitted from England, in order to keep the soldiers from preying upon the country, as had been usual in former reigns. When Odegar was raised an inscription, a reinforcement was sent over, and the flames of that rebellion were immediately extinguished.

All minds being first quenched by a general indemnity, circuits were established, justice administered, oppression banished, and crimes and disorders of every kind severely punished. As the Irish had been universally engaged in the rebellion against Elizabeth, a resignation of all the rights, which had been formerly granted them to separate jurisdictions, was rigorously exacted; and no authority, but that of the king and the law, was permitted throughout the kingdom.

A resignation of all private estates was even required; and when ten per cent were still remained, they were subjected to such conditions as might prevent, for the future, all tyranny and oppression over the common people. The value of the dues, which the nobles usually claimed from their vassals, was estimated at a fixed sum, and all further assessment was abolished under severe penalties.

The whole province of Ulster having fallen to the crown by the attonder of rebels, a company was established in London, for planting new colonies in that fertile country: the property was divided into moderate shares, the largest not exceeding two thousand acres; tenants were brought over from England and Scotland: the Irish were removed from the hills and fastnesses, and settled in the open country; houses and gardens, and the arts were taught them: a fixed habitation secured; plunder and robbery punished: and, by these means, Ulster, from being the most wild and disorderly province of all Ireland, soon became the best cultivated and most prosperous in the kingdom.

Such were the arts, by which James introduced humanity and justice among a people, who had ever been harrassed in the most profound barbarism. Noble care! much supervision to the vassals, its greatest glory of conquerors; but requiring ages of perseverance and attention to perfect what had been so happily begun.

A laudable act of justice was, about this time, executed in England upon Spenochir, a Scottish problematist, who had been guilty of the base assassination of a fencing-master. The English nation, who were generally dissatisfied with the Scots, were enraged at this crime, equally mean and atrocious; but James apprised them, by preferring the exercise of law to the intercession of the friends and family of the criminal.

Death of Prince Henry.—Marriage of the Princess Elizabeth with the Palatines.—Rise of Somerset.—His marriage.—Ordinary possession.—Fall of Somerset.—His exile.—Flight to Bawik.—Capture and delivery.—Affairs of Scotland.

This year the sudden death of Henry, Prince of Wales, diffused an universal grief throughout the nation. Though youth and royal birth, both of them strong allurements, possess men mightily in favour of the early age of princes; it is with peculiar fondness that historians mention Henry; and in every respect, his merit seems to have been extraordinary. He had not reached his eighteenth year, and already possessed more dignity in his behaviour, and commanded more respect, than his father, with all his age, learning, and experience. Neither his high fortune, nor his youth, had seduced him into any irregular pleasures: business and ambition seem to have been his sole passions. His inclinations, as well as every other quality, were set by his duties. The French ambassador, taking leave of him, and asking his commands for France, found him employed in the exercise of the pike; Tell your king, said he, in what occupation you left me engaged. He had conceived great affection and esteem for the brave Sir Walter Raleighe. It was his saying, sure no king but my father would keep such a bird in a cage. He seemed indeed to have nourished too violent a contempt for the king on account of his person; and pusillanimity; and by that means struck in with the restless and martial spirit of the English nation. Had he lived, he had probably promoted the glory, perhaps not the felicity, of this people. The unmitigated sensuality, which meo commonly entertain in favour of ambition, courage, enterprise, and other warlike virtues, engenders generous natures, who always love fame, into such pursuits as destroy their own peace, and that of the rest of mankind. His whole conduct was singular, as if Henry had been carried off by poison; but the physicians, on opening his body, found no symptoms to confirm such an opinion. The bold and criminal malignity of men's tongues and pens spared not even the king on the occasion. But that this prince's character seems rather to have failed in the extreme of faculty and humanity, than in that of cruelty and violence. His indulgence to Henry was great, and perhaps imprudent, by giving him a large and independent settlement, even in so early youth.

A.D. 1612.
The marriage of the Princess Elizabeth, with Frederic, Elector Palatine, was finished some time after the death of the prince, and served to disgust the grief which arose on that melancholy event.

Fyb. 14.
Marriage of the Princess Elizabeth with the Palatine.

But this marriage, though celebrated with great joy and festivity, proved itself an unhappy event to the king, as well as to his son. For the Palatine had the reputation and fortunes of both. The elector, trusting to so great an alliance, engaged in enterprises beyond his strength: and the king, not being able to support him in high expenses, lost all his kingdom, even the part that remained of the affection and esteem of his own subjects.

Except during sessions of parliament, the history of this reign may more properly be called the history of the court and its officers. One interesting object, had for some years, engaged the attention of the court: it was a favourite, and one beloved by James with so profound and unlimited an affecion, as left no room for any other in his love. Addison, at the end of the year 1609, Robert Carr, a youth of twenty years of age, and of an good family, in Scotland, arrived in London, after having passed some time in his travels. All his natural accomplishments consisted in good looks; all his acquired abilities, in an easy air and graceful demeanour. He had letters of recommendation to his countryman Lord Hay; and that nobleman no sooner cast his eye upon him, than he discovered talents sufficient to entitle him immediately to make a great figure in the government. Approved of the king's passion for youth and beauty, and exterior appearance, he studied how matters might be so managed that this new object should make the strongest impression on the king. He endeavoured to attach him to the court, to make him the king's favourite, through his friendship with him, and his attendance at his office, at a match of tilting, of presenting to the king his buckler and device; and hoped that he would attract the attention of the monarch. Fortune proved favourable to his views, for he bore a name that was quite contrary to a aspect. When Carr was advancing to execute his office, his unruly horse flung him, and broke his leg in the king's presence. James approached him with pity and concern; love and affection arose on the sight of his beauty and tender years; and the prince ordered him immediately to be lodged in the palace, and to be carefully attended. He himself, after the tilting, paid him a visit in his chamber, and frequently returned during his convalescence. The singular simplicity of the king at this time finall the conquest, begun by his exterier graces and accomplishments. Other princes have been fond of choosing their favourites from among the lower ranks of their subjects, and let themselves be secured on that account, seeing the more unreserved confidence and affection, because the object has been beholden to their bounty for every honour and acquisition: James was desirous that his favourite should be of high birth, and a nobleman, born at a time when one was bred to high a value. And as this kind of creation was more perfectly his own work than any other, he seems to have indulged an unlimited fondness for his min到, beyond even that which he bore to his own children. He soon knighted him, commissioned him Viscount Rochester, gave him the Garter, brought him into the privy council, and, though at first without assigning him any particular office, bestowed on him the supreme direction of all his business and political concerns. Agreeable to this rapid advancement in consideration of his talents, were such attentions on the needy favourite; and while Salisbury and all the wisest ministers could scarcely find expedients sufficient to keep in motion the overloaded machine of government, James, with unsparing hand, loaded with treasures this insignificant and useless pageant.

It is said, that the king found his pupil so ill educated, as to be ignorant even of the lowest rudiments of the Latin tongue; and that the monarch, laying aside the sceptre, took the birch into his royal hand, and instructed him in the principles of grammar. During the intervals of this noble occupation, affairs of state would be introduced; and the stamping, by the ascendant which he had acquired, was now enabled to repay in political, what he had received in grammatical, instruction. Such scenes and such incidents are the more ridiculous, though the less odious, as the passion of James seems not to have been for fashioning suitors for his crown. History charges herself willingly with a relation of the great crimes, and still more with that of the great virtues, of mankind; but she appears to fall from her dignity, when necessitated to dwell on such frivolous events as this. Here is one, the least of which is usual with such pampered minons. In Sir Thomas Overbury he met with a judicious and sincere counsellor, who, building all his hopes of his own preferment on that of the young favourite, intended to intrigue into himself the principles of prudence and discretion. By zealously serving every body, Carr was taught to abate the envy which might attend his sudden elevation: by shewing a preference for the English, he learned to escape the prejudices which prevailed against his country. And so long as he was content to be ruled by Overbury's friendly counsels, he enjoyed, what is rare, the richest favour of the prince, without being hated by the people.

To complete the measure of courtly happiness, nought was wanting but a kind mistress; and where high fortune concurred with all the graces of youth and beauty, this circumstance could not be difficult to attain. But it was known, that they were not to be procured for one, who had not fortunes were wrecked, and which plunged him for ever into an abyss of infamy, guilt, and misery.

No sooner had James mounted the throne of England, than he remembered his friendship for the unfortunate families of Howard and Devereux, who had suffered for their attachment to the cause of Mary and to his own. Having restored young Essex to his blood and dignity, and conferred the titles of Suffolk and Northampton on two brothers of the house of Norfolk, he sought the further pleasure of uniting these families by the marriage of the Earl of Essex with Lady Frances Howard, daughter of the Earl of Suffolk. She was only thirteen, he fourteen years of age; and it was thought proper, till both should attain the age of puberty, that he should go abroad and pass some time in his travels. He returned into England after four years' absence, and was pleased to find his country fairer, and his friends in a more prosperous state. Having restored to his happiness, thenceforth abandoned her conduct to her own will and discretion.

Such coldness and aversion in Lady Essex arose not without an attachment to another object. The favourite had opened his addresses, and had been too successful in making impression on the tender heart of the young Countess. She imagined that, so long as she refused the embraces of Essex, she never could be deemed his wife; and that she was made a mere shadow of the real woman, and divorced for a new marriage with her beloved Rochester. Though their passion was so violent, and their opportunities of intercourse so frequent, that they had already aimed at the consummation in all the giving and receiving of their fans, the young lady still lamented their unhappy fate, while the union between them was not entire and indissoluble. And the lover, as well as his mistress, was impatient till their mutual ardour should be extinguished.

So momentous an affair could not be concluded without consulting Overbury, with whom Rochester was accustomed to share all his secrets. While that faithful friend had considered his patron's attachment to the countess of Essex merely as an affair of gallantry, he had favoured its progress; and it was partly owing to the ingenious and passionate letters which he dictated, that Rochester had made such success in his address. Like an experienced courtier, he thought that a conquest of this nature would throw a lustre on the young favourite, and would tend still further to endear him to James, who was charmed to have his own dreams and listened with attention to every tale of gallantry. But great was Overbury's alarm, when Rochester mentioned his design of marrying the countess; and he used every method to dissuade him from so foolish an attempt. He represented how miasdic, how difficult an enterprise to procure her a divorce from her husband; how dangerous, how shameful, to take into his own bed a profligate woman, who, being married to a young nobleman of the first rank, had not scrupled to prostitute her character. He showed how his favours on the object of a capricious and momentary passion. And, in the zeal of friendship, he went so far as to threaten Rochester, that he would separate himself for ever from him, if by any means he so far forget his honour and his interest as to prosecute the intended marriage.

Rochester had the weakness to reveal this conversation to the countess of Essex; and when her rage and fury burst against the general, he had also the weakness to enter into her vindictive projects, and to swear vengeance against his friend, for the utmost instance which he could receive of his faithless friendship. Some contrivance was now formed for the seduction of their mistress. He addressed himself to the king; and after complaining, that his own indulgence to Overbury had begotten in him a degree of arrogance, which was extremely disagreeable, he was made a confidant of his commission for his love, which he represented as a retreat for his friend, both profitable and honourable. When consulted by Overbury, he earnestly dissuaded him from accepting this offer, and took himself the office of satisfying the king, if he should be otherwise displeased with the refusals. To the king again he aggravated the insolence of Overbury's conduct, and obtained a warrant for committing him to the Tower, which James intended as a slight punishment for his disobedience. The lieutenant of the Tower was a creature of Rochester's, and had lately been put into the office for this very purpose: he confined Overbury so strictly, that the unhappy prisoner was deprived of the sight even of his nearest relations; and no communication of any kind was allowed with him, during near six months which he lived in prison.

This obstacle being removed, the lovers pursued their purpose against Essex. He, interfering for himself, forgot the dignity of his character, and his friendship for the family of Essex, entered zealously into the project of procuring the countess a divorce from her husband. Essex also embraced the opportunity of separating himself from a bad woman, by whom he was hated; and he was willing to favour their success by any honourable expedient. The pretence for a divorce was his incapacity to fulfil the conjugal duties; and he confessed, that, with regard to the countess, he was conscious of such an infirmity, though he was not sensible of it with regard to any other woman. In her place too, it is said, a young virgin was substituted under a mask, to undergo a legal inspection by a jury of men. Her trial was still opened, seconded by court-influences; and supported by the ridiculous opinion of fascination or witchcraft, the sentence of divorce was pronounced between the Earl of Essex and his countess.4 And, to crown the long series of injuries of which he was so long the victim, he was prevented from possessing the lands bestowed on him in return for his marriage, by the title of Earl of Essex.

Now, notwithstanding this success, the Countess of Somerset was not satisfied, till she should enjoy the revenues on Overbury; and she engaged her husband, as well as her uncle, the Earl of Northampton, in the arduous design of taking him off secretly by poison. Fruitless attempts were reiterated by weak passions; but, at last, they gave him one so sudden and violent, that the symptoms were apparent to every one who approached him. His interest was at length at an end. Though a strong suspicion immediately prevailed in the public, the full proof of the crime was not brought to light till some years after.

The first and last design of Overbury increased or begot the suspicion, that the Prince of Wales had been carried off by poison, given him by Somerset. Men considered not, that the contrary inference was much jurer. If Somerset had been guilty in any unbecoming art, during the course of five months, a man who was his prisoner, and attended by none but his emissaries, could not be despatched but in so bungling a manner; how could it be imagined that a young prince, living in his own court, and attended by his attendants, could be exposed to Somerset's attempts, and be taken off by so subtle a poison, if such a one exist, as could elude the skill of the most experienced physicians?

The weak monarch of Overbury, the earl of Salisbury, was dead; 7 Suffolk, a man of slender capacity, had succeeded him in his office; and it was now his task to supply, from an exhausted treasury, the profligate and of his young favourites. The title of baronet, invented by Salisbury, was sold; and two hundred patents of that species of knighthood were disposed of for so many thousand pounds: each rank of nobility had also its admission. Rochester's income was increased, to the amount of two hundred thousand pounds: beneficences were exacted, to the amount of fifty-two thousand pounds. 8 And some monopolies of no great value were sacrificed to the flattery of his majesty. The title of Earl of Essex was insufficient to supply the king's necessities; even though he began to enter into some schemes for retrenching his expenses. However small the hopes of success, a new parliament must be summoned, and the dangerous experiment, for such it was now become, once more be put to trial.

When the Commons were assembled, they discovered an extraordinary alarm, on account of the rumour which was spread abroad concerning undertakers. 9 It was reported that several persons, attached to the king, had entered into a confederacy; and having laid a regular plan for the new elections, had distributed their interest all over England; and had undertaken to secure a majority for the court. So ignorant were the Commons, that they knew not this incident to be the first indubitable symptom of any regular or established conspiracy; but fearing the dignity of his character, and his friendship for the family of Essex, entered zealously into the project of procuring the countess a divorce from her husband. Essex also embraced the opportunity of separating himself from a bad woman, by elections. Formerly the kings even insisted, that none of their household should be elected members; and though the charter was afterwards declared void, Henry VI. from his great favour to the city of York, conferred a peculiar privilege on its citizens, that they should be exempted from this trouble. It is well known, that, in ancient times, a seat in the House being considered as a burden, attended neither with honour nor profit, it was requisite for its sale to have been accounted with them, and by his representatives. About this time a seat began to be regarded as an honour, and the country-gentleman contended for it; though the practice of leving wages for the parliament-men was not altogether discontinued. It was not till the present century that power and popular assemblies entered into every branch of public business, that the members began to join profit to honour, and the crown found it necessary to distribute among them all the considerable offices of the kingdom.

So little skill or so small means had the courtiers, in James's reign, for managing elections, that this House of Commons showed rather a stronger spirit of liberty than the foregoing; and instead of entering upon the business of supply, as urged by the king, who made them several liberal offers of grace, they immediately resumed the subject which had been opened last parliament, and disputed all this formality. The House of Commons, and the impositions, by the mere authority of his prerogative. It is remarkable, that in their debates on this subject, the courtiers frequently pleaded, as a precedent, the example of the ancient Roman and Greek assemblies, particularly the kings of France and Spain; nor was this reasoning received by the House either with surprise or indignation. The members of the opposite party either contended themselves with desiring the justness of the inference, or they disputed the truth of the observation. And a patriot member in particular, Sir Roger Owen, even in arguing against the impositions, frankly allowed, that the King of England was endowed with as ample a prerogative, and enjoyed in his kingdom, more power than any prince in Christendom. The nations on the continent, we may observe, enjoyed still, in that age, some small remains of liberty; and the English were possessed of little more.

The Commons applied to the Lords for a conference with regard to the new impositions. A speech of Neile, Bishop of Lincoln, reflecting on the lower House, begat some altercation with the Peers; and the king seized the opportunity to dissolve immediately, with great indignation, a parliament which had shown so firm a resolution of retringing his prerogative, without communicating, in return, the smallest supply of money. He immediately passed a far more unjust law, and even to throw into prison some of the members, who had been the most forward in their opposition to his measures. In vain did he plead, in excuse for this violence, the example of Elizabeth and other princes of the line of Tudor, as well as Plantagenet. The two and the parliament, without abandoning for ever all their liberties and privileges, could acquiesce in none of these precedents, how ancient and frequent soever. And were the authority of such precedents admitted, the utmost that could be inferred is, that the constitution of England was, at that time, an inconsistent fabric, whose jarring and discordant parts must soon destroy each other, and from the dissolution of the state, be, by the will of the people, a new form of civil government more uniform and consistent.

In the pambil and avowed conduction of the king and the House of Commons, throughout this whole reign, there appeared no more to be seen, than the usual disputings and jarring, yet are we not to imagine, that this was the sole foundation of that jealousy which prevailed between them. During debates in the House, it often happened, that a particular member, more ardent and zealous than the rest, would display the highest sentiments of liberty, which the Commons contended themselves to bear with silence and seeming approbation; and the king, informed of these harangues, concluded the whole House to be infected with the same principles, and to be engaged in a combination against his prerogative. The king, on the other hand, though he valued himself extremely on his king-craft, and perhaps was not altogether incapable of dissimulation, did not seem to have much regard for the spirit of his representatives. About this time a seat began to be regarded as an honour, and the country-gentleman contended for it; though the practice of leving wages for the parliament-men was not altogether discontinued. It was not till the present century that power and popular assemblies entered into every branch of public business, that the members began to join profit to honour, and the crown found it necessary to distribute among them all the considerable offices of the kingdom.

In the pambil and avowed conduction of the king and the House of Commons, throughout this whole reign, there appeared no more to be seen, than the usual disputings and jarring, yet are we not to imagine, that this was the sole foundation of that jealousy which prevailed between them. During debates in the House, it often happened, that a particular member, more ardent and zealous than the rest, immediately bestowed the office of cup-bearer on young Villiers.

The whole court was thrown into parties between the two munions: while some endeavoured to advance the rising fortune of Villiers, others deemed it safe to adhere to the established credit of Somerset. The king himself, divided between inclination and decorum, increased the doubt and ambiguity of the courtiers; and the stern jealousies of Buckingham and his faction detracted from the friendship from his rival, begat perpetual quarrels between their several partisans. But the discovery of Somerset's guilt in the murder of Overbury, at last decided the controversy, and exposed him to the ruin and infamy which he hesitated not to brave.

An apothecary's apprentice, who had been employed in making up the poisons, having retired to Flushing, began to talk very freely of the whole secret; and the affair at last came to the ears of Triumph, the king's envoy in the Low Countries. By his means, Sir Ralph Winwood, secretary of state, was informed, and he immediately carried the intelligence to James. The king, alarmed and astonished to find such enormous guilt in a man whom he had admitted into his bosom, sent for Sir Edward Coke, chief justice, and earnestly recommended to him the most rigorous and unbiased scrutiny. This injunction was attended with great industry and severity: the whole labyrinth of guilt was carefully unravelled: the lesser criminals, Sir Jervis Elvis, lieutenant of the Tower, Frankho, Weston, Mrs. Turner, were first tried and convicted, and his Constables were afterwards found guilty: Northampton's death, a little before, had saved him from a like fate.

It may not be unworthy of remark, that Coke, in the trial of Mrs. Turner, told her that she was guilty of the seven deadly sins: she was a whoremonger, a hypocrite, a witch, a papist, a felon, a murderer. And what more surprising, Bacon, then attorney-general, took care to observe, that poisoning was a popish trick! Such words, if uttered by almost any other man, would not, of itself, sufficiently odious, if it were not represented as a branch of popery. Stowe tells us, that when the king came to Newscastle, on his first entry into England, he gave liberty to all the prisoners, except those who were confined for treason, murder, and papistry. When one considers these circumstances, that furious bigotry of the catholics which broke out in the gunpowder conspiracy appears the less surprising.

All the accomplies in Overbury's murder received the punishment due to their crime; but the king bestowed a pardon on the principals, Somerset and the Countess. It must be observed, that an act of grace, such as that James's fortune, justly laudable, had he persisted in his first intention of consigning over to severe justice all the criminals; but let us still beware of blaming him too hastily, if, on the approach of the fatal hour, he hurriedly delivered into the hands of the executioner, persons whom he had once favoured with his most tender affections. To soften the rigour of their fate, after some years' imprisonment, he restored them to their liberty, and conferred on them a pension, with which they retired, and languished out old age in inanity and obscurity. Their guilty loves were turned into the most deadly hatred; and they passed many years together in the same house, without any intercourse or correspondence with each other.

Several historians, in relating these events, have insisted much on the dissimulation of James's behaviour, when he delivered Somerset into the hands of the chief justice; on the cruel injustice of that act; and on his persevering refusal to stand a trial; and on the extreme anxiety of the king during the whole progress of this affair. Allowing all these circumstances to be true, of which some are suspicious, if not palpably false, the great remains of temperance and self-command, which at that time, must, perhaps, be sufficient to account for them. That favourite was high-spirited, and resolute rather to perish, than live under the infamy to which he was exposed. James was sensible that the pardoning of so great a criminal, which was of itself invidious, would become still more unpopular, if his obstinate and stubborn behaviour on his trial should augment the public hatred against him. At last, the unreserved confidence in which the king had indulged his favourite for several years, might render Somerset master of so many secrets, that it is impossible, without further light, to assign the particular reason of that supererogation, which led to this retirement from the public scene.

The fall of Somerset, and his banishment from court, opened the way for Villiers to mount up at once to the full height of favour, of honours, and of riches. Had James's passion been governed by common sense and prudence, the office of chief justice, and his brother was created Viscount Purbeck; and a numerous train of needy relations were all pushed up into credit and authority. And thus the fond prince, while he meant to play the part of a statesman, and adhere to the rules of prudence and politics, took an infallible method, by loading him with premature and exorbitant honours, to render him, for ever, rash, precipitate, and insolent. A young minion to gratify with pleasure, a necessary family to command with riches, were enterprises too great for the empty exchequer of James. In order to obtain a little money, the cautionary towns must be delivered up to the Dutch; a measure which has been objected to. If the king, on the contrary, had been hasty and rash, he might have ventured to affirm, that it had been censured much beyond its real weight and importance.

When Queen Elizabeth advanced money

Cautiously for the support of the edificant republic, bever disavowed, sides the view of securing herself against the power and ambition of Spain, she still reserved the prospect of reimbursement; and she got consigned in her hands the three important fortresses of Flushing, the Brede, and Rammekins, as pledges for the money due to her. Indulgent to the necessitous condition of the States, she agreed that the debt should bear no interest; and she stipulated that when England should make a separate peace with Spain, she should pay the troops which garrisoned those fortresses. After the truce was concluded between Spain and the United Provinces, the States made an agreement with the king, that the debt, which then amounted to 660,000 pounds, should be discharged by yearly payments of 40,000 pounds; and as five years had elapsed, the debt was now reduced to 600,000 pounds; and in fifteen years more, if the truce were renewed, it would be finally extinguished. But of this sum, 25,000 pounds a year were expended on the pay of the garrisons: the remainder alone accrued to the king: and the States, weighing the circumstances, thought that they made James an honourable offer when they expressed their willingness, on the surrender of the cautionary towns, to pay him immediately 250,000 pounds, and to incorporate the English garrisons in their own army in the following manner: to the king that even the payment of the 40,000 pounds a year was precarious, and depended on the accident that the truce should be renewed between Spain and the republic: if war broke out, the maintenance of the garrisons lay upon England alone; a burden too great for the states to bear. And this treaty, if kept in good faith, of that kingdom: that even during the truce, the Dutch, straitened by other expenses, were far from being regular in their payments; and the garrisons were at present in danger of mummifying for want of subsistence: that the annual sum of 14,000 pounds, the whole saving on the Dutch payments, amounted, in fifteen years, to no more than 250,000 pounds. In the course of time, the garrisons, immediately, a larger sum, and if money be computed at ten per cent. the current interest, more than double the sum to which England was entitled; that if James waited for the whole discharge of the troops, which composed the garrisons, remained a burden upon him, and could not be broken, without receiving some consideration for their past services: that the cautionary towns were only a temporary restraint upon the Huguenots, and in the absence of this, and the conjunction of interest between England and the republic was so intimate as to render all other treaties superfluous; and no reasonable measures for mutual support would be wanting from the Dutch, even though freed from the dependence of these garrisons; that the exchequer of the republic was at present very low, insomuch that they found difficulty, now that the aids of France were withdrawn, to maintain themselves in that posture of defence which was requisite during the truce with Spain; and that the Spaniards were perpetually insisting with the king on the restitution of these towns, as belonging to their crown; and no cordial alliance could ever be made with the nation, without an indemnity from the English. These reasons, together with his urgent Wants, induced the king to accept of Caron's offer; and he evacuated the precautionary towns, which held the States in a degree of safety. He immediately, on the beginning of his accession, would have regarded as his most valuable possessions. This is the date of the full liberty of the Dutch commonwealth.

\[\text{State Trials, vol. I, p. 290.}\] \[\text{Ibid., vol. I, p. 274.}\]

May, 1647.

The crown of England devolved on James, it might have been foreseen by the Scottish nation, that the independence of their kingdom, the object for which their ancestors had shed so much blood, would now be lost; and that, if both sides did not make efforts to preserve it, the whole body of the people would be reduced to the most abject slavery. These arguments, together with his urgent wants, induced the king to accept of Caron's offer; and he evacuated the precautionary towns, which held the States in a degree of safety. He immediately, on the beginning of his accession, would have regarded as his most valuable possessions. This is the date of the full liberty of the Dutch commonwealth.

The confidence, which at the same time, he used to introduce into Scotland some of the ceremonies of the church of England: the rest, it was easily foreseen, would soon follow. The fire of devotion, excited by novelty, and inflamed by oppression, has so possessed the minds of the Scottish reformers, that all religious ceremonies, and even order of worship, were disdainfully rejected as useless burdens; retarding the imagination in its rapturous ecstases, and cramping the operations of that divine Spirit by which they supposed themselves to be animated. A mode of worship was established, the most naked and most simple imaginable: one that borrowed nothing from the senses; but reposed itself entirely on the contemplation of that divine essence, which discovers itself to the understanding only. This species of devotion, so worthy of the Supreme Being, but so little suitable to human frailty, was observed to occasion great disturbances in the breast, and in many respects to confound all rational principles of conduct. The new surroundings of society called for these extraordinary ruptures, reaching them by short glances, sinking again under its own weakness, rejecting all external aid of pomp and ceremony, was so occupied in this inward life, that it fled from every intercourse of society, and from every cheerful amusement, which could soften or humanize the character. It was obvious to all discerning eyes, and had not escaped the king's, that by the prevalence of fanaticism, a gloomy and sullen disposition established itself among the people; a spirit, obstinate and dangerous; independent and disorderly; animated equally with a contempt of authority, and a hatred to every other mode of religion, particularly to the Catholic. In order to mellow these humours, James endeavoured to infuse a small tincture of ceremony into the national worship, and to introduce such rites as might, in some degree, occupy the mind, and please the senses, without departing too far from that simplicity, by which the Reformation was distinguished. The finer arts too, though still rude in these northern kingdoms, were employed to adorn the churches; and the king's chapel, in which an organ was erected, and some instruments were introduced, and was exposed as a model to the rest of the nation. But music was gratifying to the prejudiced ears of the Scottish clergy; sculpture and painting appeared instruments of idolatry; the surplice was a rag of popery; and every motion or gesture prescribed by the liturgy, was a step towards that spiritual Babylon, so much the object of their horror and aversion. Every thing was deemed impious, but their own mystical comments on the Scriptures, which they idolized, and whose eastern prophetic style they employed in every common occurrence.

It will not be necessary to give a particular account of the measures adopted by the king to establish the Church. Such institutions, for a time, are esteemed either too divine to have proceeded from any other being than the supreme Cretor of the universe, or too diabolical to have been derived from an infernal demon. But no reasoner is the mode of the controversy past, than they are universally discovered to be of so little importance, as scarcely to be mentioned with decency amidst the ordinary course of human transactions. It suffices here to remark, that the rings introduced by James regarded the kneeling at the sacrament, private communion, private baptism, confirmation of children, and the observance of Christmas and other festivals. The acts, establishing these ceremonies, were afterwards known by the name of the Articles of Perth, from the place where they were ratified by the assembly.

A conformity of discipline and worship between the churches of England and Scotland, which was James's aim, he never could hope to establish, but by first procuring an acknowledgment of his own authority in all spiritual causes; and nothing could be more contrary to the principles of the Presbyterian church. The ecclesiastical courts possessed the power of pronouncing excommunication; and that sentence, besides the spiritual consequences supposed to follow from it, was attended with the most important effects of civil nature. The person excommunicated was shunned by every one as profane and impious; and his whole estate, during his life-time, and all his moveables for ever, were forfeited to the crown. Nor were the previous steps, requisite to procuring this sanction, so regular, in proportion to the weight of it. Without accusation, without trial, any ecclesiastical court, however inferior, sometimes pretended in a summary manner, to be able to excommunicate for any act, and against any person, even though he lived not within the bounds of their jurisdiction. And by this means the whole tyranny of the inquisition, though without its order, was introduced into the kingdom.

But the clergy were not content with the unlimited jurisdiction which they exercised in ecclesiastical matters; they assumed a censorial power over every part of adoration, in all their services; mingling politics with religion, they inclemated the most seditions and most turbulent principles. Black, minister of St. Andrews, went so far, in a sermon, as to pronounce all the English children, who had not signed the oath of Queen of England the appellation of Atheist; he said, that the treachery of the king's heart was now fully discovered; and, in his prayers for the queen, he used these words: We must pray for her for the fashion's sake, but we have no cause: she will never do us any good. When summoned before the privy council, he refused to answer to a civil court for any thing delivered from the pulpit, even though the crime of which he was accused was of a civil nature. The church adopted his cause. They raised a sedition in Edinburgh the king, during some time, was in the hands of the enraged populace; and it was not without courage, as well as dexterity, that he was able to extricate himself. A few days after, a rustler, preaching in the principal church of that capital, said, that the king was possessed with a devil; and that one devil being expelled, seven worse had entered in his place. To which he said, that such effects might lawfully rise, and take the sword out of his hand. Scarcely, even during the darkest night of papal superstition, are there found such instances of priestly encroachments, as the annals of Scotland present; which scandal had a period.

By these extravagant streatches of power, and by the patient conduct of James, the church began to lose ground, even before the king's accession to the throne of England: but no sooner had that event taken place, than he made the Scottish clergy sensible, that he had become the sovereign of a great kingdom, which he governed with great authority. Though formerly he would have thought himself happy to have made a fair partition with them of the civil and ecclesiastical authority, he was now resolved to exert a higher degree of power in the former, and to put an end to their seditious practices. An assembly had been summoned at Aberdeen: but on account of his journey to London, he prorogued it to the year following, with the view of showing his ecclesiastical supremacy, met at the time first appointed, notwithstanding his prohibition. He threw them into prison. Such of them as submitted, and acknowledged their error, were pardoned. The rest were brought to their trial. They were condemned for high treason. The king gave them their lives, but banished them the kingdom. Six of them suffered this penalty.

The general assembly was afterwards induced to acknowledge the king's authority in summing ecclesiastical courts, and to submit to the jurisdiction and visitation of the bishops. Even their favourite sentence of excommunication was declared invalid, unless confirmed by the ordinary, and the sentence being recommitted to the members whom they should elect to this assembly; and every thing was conducted in it with little appearance of choice and liberty.

By other arguments likewise, which he seems to have stretched on this occasion, the king erected a court of high commission, in imitation of that which was established in England. The bishops, and a few of the clergy, who had shown themselves most deserving of the court; and it proceeded immediately upon business, as if its authority had been grounded on the full consent of the whole legislature.

But James resolved the final blow for the time being, he should himself pay a visit to Scotland. He proposed to the parliament, which was then assembled, that they should enact, that whatever his majesty should determine in the external government of the church, with the consent of the archbishops, bishops, and a competent number of the ministry, should have the force of law. What number should be deemed competent was not determined: and their nomination was left entirely to the king; so that his ecclesiastical authority, had this bill passed, would have been established in its full extent. Some of the clergy protested. They apprehended, they said, that the purity of their doctrine, and even the cause of religion, was polluted with all the rites and liturgy of the church of England. James, dreading clamour and opposition, dropped the bill, which had already passed the lords of articles; and assembled, that the inherent prerogative of the crown contained more power than was recognized by it. Some time after, he called at St. Andrews a meeting of the bishops, and thirty-six of the most eminent clergy. He there declared his resolution of exacting his prerogative, and of establishing, by his own authority, the few ceremonies which he had recommended to them. They entreated him rather to summon a general assembly, and to gain their assent. An assembly was accordingly summoned to meet on the 25th of November ensuing.

Yet this assembly, which met after the king's departure from Scotland, eluded all his applications; and it was not till the following year, he was able to proceed for receiving his ceremonies. And through every step of this affair, in the parliament, as well as in all the general assemblies, the nation betrayed the utmost reluctance to all these innovations, and was always able to make choice of the mode of government in England. And every prudent man agreed in condemning the measures of the king, who, by an ill-timed real for insignificant ceremonies, had betrayed, though in an opposite manner, equal narrowness of mind with the persons whom he treated with such contempt. It was judged, that, had not these dangerous biomours been irritated by opposition; had they been allowed peaceably to evaporate; they would at last have subsided within the limits of law and civil society: but the king was at that time so naturally circumscribed to very narrow bounds the numbers and riches of the ecclesiastics; no sooner is their first fire spent, than they lose their credit over the people, and leave them under the natural and beneficent influence of their civil and moral obligations.

At the same time that James shook, in so violent a manner, the religious principles of his Scottish subjects, he acted in opposition to those of his English. He had observed, in his progress through England, that a regular observance of the Sunday, chiefly by means of the puritans, was every day gaining ground throughout the kingdom, and that the people, under colour of religions, were, contrary to former practice, debared such sports and recreations as contributed both to their health and their amusement. Festivals, which, in other nations and ages, are partly dedicated to public worship, partly to mirth and society, were here totally appropriated to the offices of religion, and served to nourish those sullen and gloomy contemplations, to which the people were, of themselves, so unfortunately subject. The king imagined, that it would be easy, by means of this artifice, to produce a sedative effect. He issued a proclamation to allow and encourage, after divine service, all kinds of lawful games and exercises; and, by his authority, he endeavoured to give sanction to a practice, which his subjects regarded as the utmost instance of profaneness and impiety.

A.D. 1617.

Sir Walter Raleigh's expedition—His execution, Insurrections in Bohemia—Disappearances of Spain—A political comment—Part II. Fall of Pauco—Ruptures between the king and Commons—Protestations of the Commons.

At the time when Sir Walter Raleigh was the first confined in the Tower, his violent and haughty temper had rendered him the most unpopular man in England; and his condemnation was chiefly owing to that public odium under which he lay. During the thirteen years' imprisonment, which he suffered, the sentiments of the nation were much changed with regard to him. Men had leisure to reflect on the hardship, not to say injustice, of his sentence; they knew his activity and enterprise in the rigours of confinement; they were struck with the extensive genius of the man, who, being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives; and they admired his unbroken magnanimity, which at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World. To increase these favourable dispositions, in which he built the hopes of recovering his liberty, he spread the report of a golden mine, which he had discovered in Guiana, and which was sufficient, according to his representation, not only to enrich the monarchs, but to afford immense treasures to the nation. The king gave little credit to these mighty promises, both because he believed that no such mine as the one described was anywhere in nature, and because he considered Raleigh, as a man of desperate fortunes, whose business it was, by any means, to procure his freedom, and to reinstate himself in credit and authority. Thinking, however, that he had already undergone sufficient punishment, he released him from the Tower, and when his vaunts of the golden mine had induced multitudes to engage with him, the king gave them permission to try the adventure, and, at their desire, he conferred on Raleigh authority over his fellow-adventurers. Though strongly solicited, he still refused to grant him a pardon, which seemed a natural consequence, when he was intrusted with power and command. But James declared himself still diffident of Raleigh's intentions; and he meant, he said, to reserve the former sentence, as a check upon his future behaviour.

Ralegh well knew that it was far from the king's purpose to invade any of the Spanish settlements: he therefore firmly deemed that Spain had planted any colonies on that part of the coast where his mine lay. When Gondomar, the ambassador of that nation, alarmed at his preparations, carried complaints to the king, Raleigh still protested the innocence of his intentions: and James assured Gondomar, that he durst not form any hostile attempt, but should pay with his head for so audacious an enterprise. The minister, however, concluding that twelve armed vessels were not fitted out without some purpose of invasion, conveyed the intelligence to the court of Madrid, who immediately gave orders for arming and fortifying all their settlements, particularly those along the coast of Guiana.

When the courage and avarice of the Spaniards and Portuguese had discovered so many new worlds, they were not surprised to find themselves supported by savages whom they invaded, not only in arts and arms, but also in the justice of the quarrel: they applied to Alexander VI, who then filled the papal chair; and he even severely censured the Spaniards the whole western, and on the Portuguese the whole eastern, part of the globe. The more scrupulous protestants, who acknowledged not the authority of the Roman pontiff, established the first discovery as the foundation of their title; and if a pirate or sea-adventurer had made an attempt, it had seemed, that it was a stone on the coast, as a memorial of his taking possession, they concluded the whole continent to belong to them, and thought themselves entitled to expel or exterminate, as usurpers, the ancient possessors and inhabitants. It was in this manner that Sir Walter Raleigh, about twenty-three years before, had acquired to the crown of England a claim to the continent of Guiana, a region as large as the half of Europe; and though he had immediately left the coast, yet he pretended that the English title to the whole remained certain and indefeasible. But it happened in the mean time, that the Spaniards, not knowing or not acknowledging that imaginary claim, had taken possession of a part of Guiana Had formed a settlement on the river Oronoooko, had built a little town called St. Tommas, and were there working some mines of small value.

To this place Raleigh directly bent his course; and remaning himself at the mouth of the river, with five of the largest ships, he sent up the rest to St. Thomas, under the command of his son, and a Captian Keymi, a person entirely devoted to him. The Spaniards, who had expected this invasion, fired on the English at their landing, were repulsed, and pursued into the town. Young Raleigh, to encourage his men, called out, That this was the true mine, and none but fools looked for any other; and advancing upon the Spaniards received a shot, of which he immediately expired. This dismayed not Keynes and the others. They carried on the attack; got possession of the town, which they afterwards reduced to ashes; and found not in it any thing valuable.

Ralegh did not pretend that he had himself seen the mine, which he had engaged so many people to go in quest of; it was Keymi, he said, who had formerly discovered it, and had brought him that lump of ore, which promised such immense treasures; yet Keymi, who said that he was within two hours' march of the place, refused, on the most absurd pretences, to take any effectual step towards.

on that day. For this preference he was expelled the House, by the suggestion of Mr. Pyne, The House of Lords opposed so far this prudential measure as the present condition of the people was concerned, and to change it should be changed into that of the day's last day. Journ. 15. 16 Feb. 1695. 10 May 1697. 17. In which place, he observed, it is said by the House to be great, exorbitant, unparalised.
finding it; and he returned immediately to Raleigh, with the melancholy news of his son's death, and the ill success of the enterprise. Sensible to reproach, and dreading punishment for his behaviour, Keymis, in despair, retired into retirement, and concealed as much as possible of his name from the world.

The other adventurers now concluded, that they were deceived by Raleigh; that he never had known of any such mine as he pretended to go in search of; that his intention had been to engage the Spaniards; and having encouraged his company by the spoils of that place, to have thence proceeded to the invasion of the other Spanish settlements; that he expected to repair his ruined fortunes by such enterprise, and that he was now seeking for means to acquire, for making his peace with England; or if that view failed him, that he purposed to retire into some other country, where his riches would secure his retreat.

Archbishop of Canterbury, by the sign of St. Thomas, discouraged Raleigh's companions from entering into these views; though there were many circumstances in the late and treatable letters between the nations which made it seem to them to engage in such a perilous war against the Spaniards.

When England made peace with Spain, the example of Henry IV. was imitated, who, at the treaty of Vervins, finding a difficulty in adjusting all questions with regard to France, had agreed to take up all matters in total silence. The Spaniards having, all along, published severe edicts against the intercourse of any European nation with their colonies, interpreted this silence in the most harmful manner, and considered the acquiescence of England in the established laws of Spain. The English, on the contrary, pretended, that as they had never been excluded by any treaty from commerce with the Spanish colonies, it was still lawful for them to trade with his settlements in either Indies, as with his European territories. In consequence of this ambiguity, many adventurers from England sailed

Would he have restored all his fortune and credit on so precarious a foundation? Absolutely not. The Spaniards have not always been so obliging. We have heard of many instances of the like kind, where the Spaniards have refused to allow any man to trade with their colonies. They have not always been so much in favor of the English, as they have been of the Dutch, who have been much more considerate in their dealings with each other. It appears, therefore, that the Spaniards were not so much in favor of the English as the Dutch. They have been more considerate in their dealings with each other, and have been more ready to grant them the favors which they have been so ready to grant to the Dutch. The Spaniards have been much more considerate in their dealings with each other, and have been much more ready to grant them the favors which they have been so ready to grant to the Dutch.

By their conduct, the Spaniards have shown that they are not disposed to grant any favors to the English, unless they are willing to grant them the same favors which they have been willing to grant to the Dutch. They have been much more considerate in their dealings with each other, and have been much more ready to grant them the favors which they have been so ready to grant to the Dutch. The Spaniards have been much more considerate in their dealings with each other, and have been much more ready to grant them the favors which they have been so ready to grant to the Dutch. They have been much more considerate in their dealings with each other, and have been much more ready to grant them the favors which they have been so ready to grant to the Dutch.
courage: and though he had formerly made use of many artifices, such as feigning madness, sickness, and a variety of diseases, in order to protract his examination, and procure his escape, he now resolved to act his part with more resolution. 'To a sharp revenge, be said, but a sure one for all illa, when he felt the edge of the axe by which he was to be beheaded.' His harangue to the public was calm and eloquent; and he endeavoured to reconcile himself, and to load his enemies with the keenest derision, by strong asseverations of facts, to say the least, may be esteemed very doubtful. With the utmost indifferency, he laid his bare all the secrets of legal aid, and all the rage and passion that had annoyed him; and in his death there appeared the same great but ill-regulated mind, which, during his life, had displayed itself in all his conduct and behaviour.

James had entertained an opinion, which was peculiar to himself, and which had been adopted by none of his predecessors, that he was by birth a great king, was unworthy of a Prince of Wales; and he never would allow any princess but a daughter of France or Spain to be mentioned as a match for his son. This instance of pride, which really implies meanness, as if he could receive honour from any alliance, was so well known, that Spain had founded on it the hopes of governing, in the most important transactions, this monarch, so little celebrated for politics or prudence. During the life of Henry, the King of France, James took a nvoyage with regard to the succession of Cleves, which was disputed between the Protestant and popish line. But the bait did not then take; and James, in consequence of his alliance with the League, was closely connected with one of the thousand men, under the command of Sir Edward Cecil, who joined these two powers, and put the Marquis of Brandenburg and the Palatine of Newburg in possession of Cleves.

Gondomar was, at this time, the Spanish ambassador in England: a man whose flattery was the more artful, because covered with the appearance of frankness and sincerity; whose politics were the more dangerous, because disguised under the mask of mirth and pleasantry. He now made offer of the second daughter of Spain to Prince Charles; and, that he might render the temptation irresistible to the Protestant monarch, he gave hopes of an immense fortune, which should attend the princess. The court of Spain, though determined to contract no alliance with a heretic, entered into negotiations with James, which they artfully protracted, and, amidst every disappointment, kept up the hopes of success.

The transactions in Germany, so important to the Austrian greatness, became every day a new motif for this dispute of conduct.

In that great revolution of manners which happened during the sixteenth and the seventeenth centuries, the only nations who had the honourable, though often melancholy, advantage of making an earnest effort for the recovery of their privileges, together with the privileges of civil liberty, were animated with a zeal for religious parties and opinions. Besides the irresistible force of standing armies, the European princes possessed this advantage, that they were defended from the ancient royal families; that they continued the same apppellations of magistrates, the same appearance of civil government; and restraining themselves by all the methods of administration, could insensibly impose the yoke on their unguarded subjects. Even the German nations, who formerly broke the Roman chains, and restored liberty to mankind, now lost their own liberty, and saw with grief and trembling its recovery firmly established among them. To their circumstances, nothing but a pious zeal, which disregards all motives of human prudence, could have made them entertain hopes that they, like their ancestors, through so many ages, had transmitted to them.

As the house of Austria, throughout all her extensive dominions, had ever made religion the pretence of her usurpations, she now met with resistance from a like principle; and the catholic religion, as usual, had ranged itself on the side of monarchy; the protestant, on that of liberty. The states of Bohemia, and the emperor against the Emperor Matthias, continued their revolt against his successor Ferdinand, and claimed the observance of all the edicts enacted in favour of the new religion, together with the restorations of their ancient laws and constitution. The neighbouring principalities, Poland, Moravia, Lusatia, Austria, even the kingdom of Hungary, took part in the quarrel; and throughout all these populous and martial provinces, the spirit of discord and civil war had universally diffused itself.

Ferdinand II., who possessed more vigour and greater abilities, though out more lenity and moderation, than are usual with the Austrian princes, strongly engaged himself for the recovery of his authority; and besides employing the assistance of his subjects, who professed the ancient religion, he engaged on his side a powerful alliance of the neighbouring potentates. All the catholic princes of the empire had engaged his defence; even Saxony, the most powerful of the protestant: Poland had declared itself in his favour; and, above all, the Spanish monarch, deeming his own interest joined with the Austrian, gave to young Ferdinand, his family, prepared powerful succours from Italy and France, and from the Low Countries; and he also advanced large sums for the support of Ferdinand and of the catholic religion.

The states of Austria were alarmed, knowing the seditions and revolutions among the Spanish populations, began also to solicit foreign assistance; and, together with that support which they obtained from the evangelical union in Germany, they endeavoured to establish connections with greater princes. They cast their eyes on Frederic, Elector Palatine. They considered, that besides commanding no despicable force of his own, he was son-in-law to the King of England; and nephew to Prince Maurice, whose authority was become almost absolute in the United Provinces. They hoped that these princes, moved by the connexions of blood, as well as by the tie of their common religion, would interest themselves in all the fortunes of Frederic, and would promote his greatness. They therefore made a tender address to them, and offered them the title of elector; and the young Palatine, stimulated by ambition, without consulting either James or Maurice, whose opposition he foresaw, immediately accepted the offer, and marched all his forces into Bohemia, in support of his new subjects.

The news of these events so soon reached England, that the whole kingdom was on fire to engage in the quarrel. Scarcely was the ardour greater, with which all the states of Europe, in former ages, flew to rescue the Holy Land from the dominion of infidels. The nation was, as yet, sincerely attached to the blood of their religious prince; and though they heard of catholics carrying on wars and persecutions against protestants, they did not consider their holy interest connected with the thing. They regarded their neutrality as a base desertion of the cause of God, and of his holy religion. In such a quarrel, they would gladly have marched to the opposite extremity of Europe, had they not considered the massacre of their own citizens, done in the name and force of their religion, as a serious and warlike interest.

But James, besides that his temper was too little enterprising for such vast undertakings, was restrained by another motive, which had a mighty influence over him: he resolved to patronize the revolt of subjects against their royal sovereign. From the very first he demurred to his son-in-law the title of King of Bohemia; 2 he forbade him to be prayed for in the churches under that appellation; and though he owned that he had hitherto examined the pretensions and constitution of that kingdom, and that he supposed it an agreeable idea of the rights of kings, that he concluded subjects must ever be in the wrong, when they stood in opposition to those who had acquired or assumed those illustrious titles. Thus, even in measures founded on true politics, James intermixed so many narrow prejudices, as diminished his authority, and exposed him to the imputation of weakness and of error.

1 The whole affair every where hastened to a crisis. Ferdinand levied a great force, under the command of the Duke of Bavaria and the Count of Bucquoi; and advanced upon his enemy in Bohemia. The Low Countries, Spinola collected a veterano army of thirty thousand men. When Edmonds, the king's resident at Brussels, made remonstrances to the Archduke Albert, he was answered, that the orders for this armament had been transmitted to Spinola from Madrid, and that he alone knew the secret destination of it. Spinola again told the minister, that his orders were still sealed; but, if Edmonds would accompany him in his march to Calviens, he would there open them, and give him a full account of the business. It was more than the king's life, that Spinola had invaded the palatinate, and, meeting with no resistance, except from some princes of the union, and from one English regiment of 2400 men, commanded by the brave Sir Honor Vans, had, in a little time, reduced the greater part of that principality.

High were now the murmurs and complaints against the king's neutrality and inactive disposition. The happiness and tranquillity of their own country became distasteful to the English, when they reflected on the grievances and distress of their protestant brethren in Germany. They considered not, that their interpolation in the wars of the continent was an irreconcilable religious zeal, could not, at that time, be justified by any sound maxims of politics; that, however exorbitant the Austrian greatness, the dan-of the Commons; and they seemed determined to sacrifice every thing in order to maintain a good correspondence with their prince. They would allow no mention to be made of the new customs or impositions, which had been so eagerly disputed in the former parliament; the impositions, however, continued, were, by some, complained of; but, by the authority of the graver and more prudent part of the House, that grievance was buried in oblivion; and, being informed that the king had named several sumptuous debts of the Commons, without a negative, voted him two subsidies, and that, too, at the very beginning of the session, contrary to the maxims frequently adopted by their predecessors. The reasons for this proceeding are, that they knew, in the present manner, to the examination of grievances. They found that patents had been granted to Sir Giles Mompesson and Sir Francis Michel, for licensing masts and ale-houses; that great sums of money had been exacted, under pretext of these licences; and that such inn-keepers as presumed to continue their business, without satisfying the necessary of the patentees, had been severely punished by fine, imprisonment, and death.

The same persons had also procured a patent, which they shared with Sir Edward Villiers, brother to Buckingham, for the sole making of gold and silver thread and lace. Sir Francis Michel also obtained a patent for preventing any rivalry in these manufactures: they were armed with authority to search for all goods, which might interfere with their patent; and even to punish, at their own will and discretion, the makers, importers, and vendors of such lace. Sir Francis Michel, being gathered up by this exorbitant jurisdiction; and the lace which had been manufactured by the patentees was universally found to be adulterated, and to be composed more of copper than of silk.

These grievances the Commons represented to the king; and they met with a very gracious and very cordial reception. He seemed ever thankful for the information given him; and he discharged his duties, he believed to a man, knowing to him, had crept into his administration. "I assure you, he said, "had I before heard these things complained of, I would have done the office of a just king, and out of parliament have punished them, as severely, and peradventure more, than you now intend to do."

A sentence was passed for the punishment of Michel and Mompesson. It was executed on the former. The latter broke prison and escaped. Villiers, was at that time, sent purposely on a formidable expedition, by some, of the king's emissaries. He met with some resistance; but the operation was successful. The Commons, without a negative, voted him two subsidies, and that, too, at the very beginning of the session, contrary to the maxims frequently adopted by their predecessors. employment, and never again to sit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court.

This dreadful sentence, dreadful to a man of nice sensibility to honour, he survived five years; and, being released in a little time from the Tower, his genius, yet unbroken, supported itself amidst involved circumstances and a depressed spirit, and shone out in literary productions, which have made his guilt or weaknesses be forgotten or overlooked by posterity. In consideration of his great merit, the king remitted his fine, as well as all the other parts of his sentence, conferred on him a large pension of 1800 pounds a year, and employed every expedient to alleviate of his new and unfortunate condition. As that great philosopher, at last, acknowledged with regret, that he had too long neglected the true ambition of a fine genius; and by plunging into business and affairs, which require much less capacity, but greater firmness of mind, than the pursuit of learning, had exposed himself to such grievous calamities.

The Commons had entertained the idea, that they were the great patrons of the people, and that the redress of all grievances must proceed from them; and to this principle they were chiefly beholden for the regard and consideration of the public. In the execution of this office, they now kept their ears open to complaints of every kind; and in their measures into many grievances, which, though of no great importance, could not be touched on, without sensibly affecting the king and his ministers. The prerogative seemed every moment to be invaded; the king reserved every article, was more disputed; and James, who was willing to correct the abuses of his power, would not submit to have his power itself questioned and denied. After the House, therefore, had sat near six months without yet, brought no considerable business to a full conclusion, the king resolved, under pretence of the advanced season, to interrupt their proceedings; and he sent them word, that he was determined, in a little time, to adjourn them till next winter. The Commons made amends upon the Lords, and demanded them to join in a petition for delaying the adjournment; which was refused by the upper House. The king regarded this project of a joint petition as an attempt to force him from his measures; and yet, brought no considerable business in it, and told them, that if it were their desire, he would delay the adjournment, but would not so far comply with the request of the lower House. And thus, in these great national affairs, the same prevails, which, in private alterations, often raises a quarrel from the smallest beginnings, produced a mutual coldness and disquiet between the king and the Commons.

During the recess of parliament, the king used every measure to render himself popular with the nation, and to appease the rising ill-humour of its representatives. He had voluntarily offered to the parliament to circumscribe his own prerogative, and to abate for the future his power of granting monopolies. He now recalled all the patents of that kind, and redrew every article of grievance, to the number of thirty-seven, which had been complained of in the House of Commons. But he gained not the end which he proposed. The disgust, which had appeared at parting, could not so suddenly be dispelled. He had likewise been so imprudent as to commit to prison Sir Edward Sandys, without any known cause, besides his activity and vigour in discharging his duty as a member of parliament. And above all, the transactions in Germany were sufficient, when joined to the king's cautions, negociations, and delays, to inflame that by no means hollow and religion which prevailed throughout the nation. This summer, the ban of the empire had been published against the elector palatine; and the execution of it was committed to the Duke of Barana. The upper palatinate was, in a little time, conquered by that prince; and measures were taken in the empire for bestowing on him the electoral dignity, of which the palatine was then despoiled. Frederic now lived with his numerous family, in poverty and distress, either in Holland or at Sedan, with his under the duke of Bouillon; and throughout all the new conquests, in both the Palatinate, as well as in Bohemia, Austria, and Lusatia, the progress of the Austrian arms was rendered with no, and from the severities of the emperor, against the professors of the reformed religion.

The zeal of the Commons immediately moved them, upon their assembling, to take all the measures of the new and unfortunate state. They framed a remonstrance, which they intended to carry to the king. They represented, that the enormous growth of the Austrian power threatened the liberties of Europe; that the progress of the catholic religion in England bred the most melancholy apprehensions lest it should again acquire an ascendant in the kingdom; that the indulgence of his majesty towards the professors of that religion had encouraged their insolence and tenuity; that the uncontrolled conquests, made by the Austrian family in Germany, raised mighty expectations in the English papists; but above all, that the prospect of the Spanish match elevated them so far as to hope for an entire toleration, if the final accession of that house to the crown of Spain. His majesty, therefore, entreated his majesty, that he would immediately undertake the defence of the palatinate, and maintain it by force of arms; that he would turn his sword against the inhabitants of every nation, in support of the catholic interest in Europe; that he would enter into no negotiation for the marriage of his son but with a protestant princess; that the children of popular families, not computers, not that his majesty was not by no means cold to his friends and confederates. In order the more to intimidate them, he mentioned the imprisonment of Sir Edwin Sandys; and though he denied that the confinement of that member had been owing to any offence committed in the House, he plausibly told them, that he thought himself fully entitled to punish such a member of parliament, as had raised its sitting as after its dissolution; and that he intended thenceforth to chastise any man, whose insolent behaviour there should minister occasion of offence; otherwise, as he added, that he would be irritated former precedents, may be thought not to have acted altogether on the defensive, had the effect which might naturally have been expected from it; the Commons were inflamed, not terrified. popularity, and of the bent of the nation towards a war with the catholics abroad, and the persecution of popery at home, they little dreaded the menaces of a prince who was unsupported by military force, and whose gentle temper, and that of itself, so soon disarmed his liberty. In a new renommance, therefore, they still insisted on their former renommance and advice; and they maintained, though in respectful terms, that they were entitled to in- terpose with their council in all matters of state, that to possess entire freedom of speech, in their debates on public business, was their ancient and undoubted right, and an inheritance transmitted to them from their ancestors, and that it was a prerogative of the crown, to which they had a longed to the House alone, who were witnesses of his offence, to inflict a proper censure upon him.

So rigorous an answer was nowise calculated to appease the king. It is said, when the approach of the committee who were to present it was notified to him, he ordered twelve chairs to be brought; for that there were so many kings a-coming. His answer was prompt and sharp. He told the House, that their renommance was more like a denunciation of war than an address of dutiful subjects; that their pretensions to inquire into all state affairs, without exception, was such a plenitude as none of their an- cestors, even during the reign of the weakest princes, had ever ventured on; that he relied on his appointment on a compilation of views and intelligence, with which they were entirely unacquainted; that they could not better show their wisdom, as well as duty, than by keeping what was their own, and not pretending to that, which depended on his prerogative; they had no title to interpose with their advice, except when he was pleased to desire it. And he concluded with these memorable words, that he had begun to indulge them, in testing your ancient and undoubted right and inheritance, but would rather have wished that we had said, that your privileges were derived from the grace and permission of our ancestors; and as (for the most of them grew from preven- tions and exceptions,) we more particularly depend on your consent, that I were pleased to give you our royal assent to that, as long as you contain yourselves within the limits of your duty, we will be as careful to maintain and preserve your lawful liberties, and to interpose our advice, where it should have been, as to preserve our own royal prerogative.

This open pretension of the king's naturally gave great alarm to the House of Commons. They saw their tide to erect privileges, if not plainly denied, yet considered at least as precarious. It might be foiled by abuse, and they had already abused it. They thought proper, therefore, immediately to oppose pretension to prerogative.

They repeated all their former claims for freedom of speech, and an unbounded authority to interpose with their Petition of the of the Commons; and, with his own advice and counsel. And they asserted, That the liberties, franchises, privileges, and juris- dictions of parliament, are the ancient and undoubted pur- tainty and inheritance of the subjects of England.

The king, informed of these increasing heats and jeal- ousies in the House, hurried to town. He sent immedi- ately for the journals of the Commons; and, with his own hand, before the council, he tore out this protestation; and ordered his reasons to be inserted in the council book. He was doubly displeased; he said, with the protestation of the lower House was the manner of framing it, as well as of the matter which it contained. It was tumultuously voted, at a late hour, and in a thin House; and it was expressed in such general and ambiguous terms, as might serve for a foundation to the most enor- mous claims, and to the most unwarrantable usurpations upon his prerogative.

The meeting of the House might have proved danger- ous after so violent a breach. It was no longer possible, while men were in such a temper, to finish any business. The king, therefore, prorogued the parliament, and soon after dissolved it, after an argument and a violent compensation. Sir Dudley Digges, Sir Thomas Crew, Sir Nathaniel Rich, Sir James Perrot, joined in commission with others, were sent to Ireland, in order to execute some business. The king, at that time, enjoyed, at least exercised, the prerogative over all matters, even without his consent, in any branch of public service.

Sir John Saville, a powerful man in the House of Com- mons, and a zealous opponent of the court, was made comptroller of the household, a privy councilor, and soon after a baron. This event is memorable; as being the first instance, perhaps, in the whole history of England, of any king's advancing a man on account of parliamentary interest, and of making him a baron to secure him against the irregular practice. It will be regarded by political readers as one of the most early and most infallible symptoms of a regular established liberty.

The king having thus, on one hand, torn off that sacred veil which had hitherto covered the English constitution, and which threw an obscurity upon it so advantageous to royal prerogative, every man began to indulge himself in political speculations and in- quires; and some factions which commenced in parliament were propagated throughout the nation. In vain did James, by reiterated proclamations, forbid the diss- courting of state affairs. Such proclamations, if they had any effect, served to stir up the people to the public. And, in every company or society, the late trans- actions became the subject of argument and debate.

All history, said the partisans of the court, as well as the history of England, justify the king's position with re- gard to the origin of popular privileges; and every reason- able man must allow, that as monarchy is the most simple form of government, it must first have occurred to rude and un instructed mankind. The other complex and artificial additions were the successive invention of sover- eigns and legislators; or, if they were obtunded on the prince by seditions subjects, their origin must appear, on more important considerations.

In England, the authority of the king, in all the exterior forms of government, and in the common style of law, ap- pears totally absolute and sovereign; nor does the real spirit of the constitution, as it has ever discovered itself in practice, fall much short of these appearances. The parlia- ment is created by his will; by his will it is dissolved. It is his will alone, though at the desire of both Houses, which gives authority to laws. To all foreign nations, the majesty of the monarch seems to merit sole attention and respect. And no subject, who has exposed himself to royal indignation, can hope to live with safety in the kingdom; nor can he even leave it, according to law, without the consent of his master. If a magistrate, environment, in such power and splendour, should consider his authority as sacred, and regard himself as the anointed of Heaven, treat, reason, and bring to conclusion the same; and that the Commons in parliament have like liberty and freedom to treat of these matters, in such order as to their judgment shall seem fitter; and that every member of the said House hath like freedom from all imprisonment, imprisonment, and maltreatment, (other than by means of the House itself,) for criticizing, or considering any speaking, reasoning, or declaring of any matter or matters touching the parliament, the nation, or any person present in the parliament, or any member or members of the House of Commons assembled in parliament, before the king; or giving evidence to any private information, either in writing or otherwise.

The king having thus, on one hand, torn off that sacred veil which had hitherto covered the English constitution, and which threw an obscurity upon it so advantageous to royal prerogative, every man began to indulge himself in political speculations and in- quires; and some factions which commenced in parliament were propagated throughout the nation. And, in every company or society, the late trans- actions became the subject of argument and debate.

All history, said the partisans of the court, as well as the history of England, justify the king's position with re- regard to the origin of popular privileges; and every reason- able man must allow, that as monarchy is the most simple form of government, it must first have occurred to rude and un instructed mankind. The other complex and artificial additions were the successive invention of sover- eigns and legislators; or, if they were obtunded on the prince by seditions subjects, their origin must appear, on more important considerations.

In England, the authority of the king, in all the exterior forms of government, and in the common style of law, ap- pears totally absolute and sovereign; nor does the real spirit of the constitution, as it has ever discovered itself in practice, fall much short of these appearances. The parlia- ment is created by his will; by his will it is dissolved. It is his will alone, though at the desire of both Houses, which gives authority to laws. To all foreign nations, the majesty of the monarch seems to merit sole attention and respect. And no subject, who has exposed himself to royal indignation, can hope to live with safety in the kingdom; nor can he even leave it, according to law, without the consent of his master. If a magistrate, environment, in such power and splendour, should consider his authority as sacred, and regard himself as the anointed of Heaven, his pretensions may bear a very favourable construction. Or, allowing them to be merely pious frauds, we need not be surprised, that the same stratagem which was practised by Minos, Numa, and the most celebrated legislators of ancient and modern times, be employed by the King of England. Subjects are not raised above that quality, though assembled in parliament. The same humble respect and deference is still due to the prince. Though he mitigates them in his privilege of laying before them his domestic grievances, with which they are supposed to be best acquainted, this warrants not their bold intrusion into every province of government, allowed, to all judicious examiners, it must appear, "That the lines of duty are as much transgressed by a more independent and less respectful exercise of acknowledged powers, as by the usurpation of such as are new and unusual.

The lovers of liberty, throughout the nation, reasoned after a different manner. It is in vain, they said, that the king traces up the English government to its first origin, in order to represent the privileges of parliament as independent and precarious: prescription, and the practice of so many ages, must, long ere this time, have given a sanction to these assemblies, even though they had been derived from an origin no more dignified than that which they acknowledge. If the written records of the English nation, as asserted, represent parliaments to have arisen from the consent of monarchs, the principle of human nature, when we trace government a step higher, must show us, that monarchs themselves consent to all their authority to the voluntary submission of the people. But, in fact, no age can be shown, when the English government was altogether an unmixed monarchy: and, if the privileges of this nation have, at any period, been overpowered by violent irritations of foreign force or domestic usurpation; the generous spirit of the people has ever seized the first opportunity of re-establishing the ancient government and constitution, though in the style of the laws, and in usual forms of administration, royal authority may be represented as sacred and supreme; whatever is essential to the exercise of sovereign and legislative power must still be regarded equally divine and indivisible. Or, if any distinction be made in this respect, the preference is surely due to those natural councils, by whose interposition the exorbitancies of tyrannical power are restrained, and that sacred liberty is preserved, which heroic spirits, in all ages, have deemed more precious than life itself.

Nor is it sufficient to say, that the mild and equitable administration of James affords little occasion, or no occasion, of complaint. How moderate soever the exercise of his authority, how exact soever be his observance of the laws and constitution: "If he founds his authority on arbitrary and dangerous principles, it is requisite to watch him with the same care, and to oppose him with the same vigour, as if he had indulged himself in all the excesses of cruelty and tyranny."

Amidst these disputes, the wise and moderate in the nation endeavoured to preserve, as much as possible, an equitable neutrality between the opposite parties; and the more they reflected on the course of public affairs, the greater difficulty they found in fixing just sentiments with regard to them. On the one hand, they regarded the very rise of parties as a happy prognostic of the establishment of liberty; or could they ever expect to enjoy, in a mixed government, so invaluable a blessing without suffering that inconvenience, which, in such governments, has ever attended it. But when they considered, on the other hand, the necessary aims and pursuits of both parties, they were struck with apprehension of the consequences, and could discover no feasible plan of accommodation between them. From long practice, the crown was now possessed of great revenues; and when they considered, on the other hand, the necessary aims and pursuits of both parties, they were struck with apprehension of the consequences, and could discover no feasible plan of accommodation between them. so unequal a contest, besides raveling the patrician's hereditary dominions, would end in the total alienation of the people's affections from their ancient sovereign, by whom they were plundered, and in an attachment to their new masters, by whom they were protected. He persuaded, therefore, his son-in-law to disarm, under colour of duty and submission to the emperor: and, accordingly, Mansfeld was dismissed from the patrician's service; and that was the only severe penetration which it had by this means. The Earl of Bristol, a minister of vigilance and penetration, and who had formerly opposed all alliance with catholics, was now fully convinced of the sincerity of Spain; and he counselled the king to make up his mind on the subject of engaging with his views and projects. A daughter of Spain, whom he represents as extremely accomplished, would soon, he said, arrive in England, and bring with her an immense fortune of two millions of pieces of eight, or six hundred thousand pounds sterling; a sum four times greater than Spain had ever before given with any princess, and almost equal to all the money which the parliament, during the whole course of this reign, had hitherto granted to the king. But what was of more importance to James's honour and happiness, Bristol considered this match as an infallible prognostic of the patrician's restoration; nor would Philip, he thought, ever have bestowed his sister and so large a fortune in the event of engaging with England. So exact was his intelligence, that the most secret counsels of the Spaniards, he boasts, had never escaped him; and he found that they had all along concealed the truth as to the engagement with the patrician as measures closely connected, or altogether inseparable. However, little calculated James's character to extort so vast a concession; however improper the measures which he had employed for engaging with this ambassador could not withstand the plain evidence of facts, by which Philip now demonstrated his sincerity. Perhaps too, like a wise man, he considered, that reasons of state, which are supposed solely to influence the councils of monarchs, are not always of so great weight as to prejudice a nation; and that milder views of gratitude, honour, friendship, generosity, are frequently able among princes, as well as private persons, to overbalance these selfish considerations; that the manner of restoration of James had been so conspicuous in all these transactions, his reliance on Spain, his confidence in his friendship, that he had at last obtained the cordial alliance of that nation, so celebrated for honour and fidelity. Or, if policies must still be supposed the ruling motive of all public measures, the maritime power of England was so considerable, and the Spanish dominions so divided, as might well induce the council of Philip to the resolution, that was adopted by the masters of the sea, and could not be purchased by too great concessions. And as James, during so many years, had been allured and seduced by hopes and protestations, his people enraged by delays and disappointments; it would probably occur, that there was now so medium left between the most inveterate hatred and the most esteemable alliance between the nations. To not mention, that as a new spirit began about this time to animate the councils of France, the friendship of England became every day more necessary to the greatness and security of the Spanish monarch.

All measures being, therefore, agreed on between the parties, sought was wanting but the dispensation from Rome, which might be considered as a mere formality. The king, justified by success, now exulted in his pacific counsels, and boasted of his superior sagacity and penetration; and when all these flattering prospects were blasted by the tempest of passion, in which he had for some time been therefrom a private condition, to be the bane of himself, of his family, and of his people.

Ever since the fall of Somerset, Buckingham had governed, with an uncontrolled power, over the court. As soon as James's eyes have been opened, he had now full opportunity of observing how unfaith his favourite was for the high station to which he was raised. Some accomplishments of a courier shown by the latter to Buckingham, that the marriage and the restitution of the palatinate were obtained by the advice of the English. he possessed: of every talent of a minister he was utterly destitute. Headlong in his passions, and inapposite equally of prudence and of dissimulation: sincere from violence rather than candour; expensive from profusion more than generosity: a warm friend, a furious enemy; but without any choice or discernment in either: with these qualities he had early and quickly mounted to the highest rank; and none of the state which attends fortune newly acquired, and the impetuosity which belongs to persons born in high stations, and unacquainted with opposition.

Among those who had experienced the arrangement of this overgrown favourite, the Prince of Wales himself had not been entirely spared; and a great coldness, if not an enmity, had, for that reason, taken place between them. Buckingham, distrusts and unexampled, with that sight connections with foreign and overcome his aversion, and at the same time envious of the great credit acquired by Bristol in the Spanish negotiation, beheld himself of an expidient, by which he might at once gratify both these inclinations. He represented to Charles, that persons of his exalted station were peculiarly unfortunate in their marriage, the chief circumstance in life; and commonly received into their arms a bride, unknown to them, to which they were unknown; not endeared by sympathy, not obliged by service; wooed by treaties alone, by negociations, by political interest: that however accomplished the infants, she must not be permitted to be a mechaniæ of state, and could not but think with aversion of that day, when she was to enter the bed of a stranger; and, passing into a foreign country and a new family, had adieu to her sister, the sole share ofert her that it was necessary to the prince's power to soften all these rigours, and by such an obligation on her, as would attach the most indifferent temper, as would warm the coldest affections: that his joy should be an unsullied gaiety, which would equal all the fictions of Spanish romance, and suit the amorous and enterprising character of that nation, must immediately introduce him to the princess under the agreeable character of a devoted lover and dazzling personage, whose language was the palatinate, which had hitherto languished in the hands of ministers, would quickly be terminated by so illustrious an agent, seconded by the mediation and entreaties of the greatest infants: that Spanish generosity, moved by that unexampled trust and confidence, would make concessions beyond what could be expected from political views and considerations; and that he would quickly return to the interest of the house of Stuart, and published the most happy palatinate, by the same enterprise which procured him the affections and the person of the Spanish princess.

The mind of the young prince, replete with candour, was inflamed by these the fruit sanguine of the most generous and amorous ideas, suggested by Buckingham. He agreed to make application to the king for his approbation. They chose the moment of his kindest and most jocund humour, and more by the easiness which they expressed, than by the force of their reasons, they obtained a hasty and unguarded consent to their undertaking. And having engaged his promise to keep their purpose secret, they left him in order to make preparations for the journey.

He sooner was the king alone, than he temper, more cautious than sanguine, suggested very different views of the matter, and represented every difficulty and danger which could occur. He reflected, that, however the world might regard this act of marriage, it must pass for the prince, they could never forgive himself, who, at his years, and after his experience could intrust his only son, the heir of his crown, the prop of his age, to the discretion of foreigners, without some better than candour; expense from profusion and generosity, for the purpose of converting the prince into his hands: that Philip, when possessed of so invaluable a pledge, might well raise in his demands, and impose harder conditions of treaty: and that the temerity of the enterprise was so apparent, that the event, how prosperous soever, could not justify it; and if disastrous, it would render himself infamous to his people and ridiculous to all posterity.

Tormented with these reflections, as soon as the prince and Buckingham returned for their despatches, he informed them of all the reasons which had determined him to return. They proposed to change the terms on which they attended the prince: they possessed the fortune newly acquired, and the impetuosity which belongs to persons born in high stations, and unacquainted with opposition.
Clarendon, from whom they are here transcribed; and though minute, are not undeserving of a place in history.

The prince and Buckingham, with their two attendants, and Sir Richard Graham, master of horse to Buckingham, passed disguised and undiscovered through France; and they even ventured into the heart of Spain, without the knowledge of Charles. On the 17th March, Charles saw the Princess Henrietta, whom he afterwards espoused, and who was at that time in the bloom of youth and beauty. In eleven days after their departure, the nuncio at Madrid received and surprised every body by a step so unusual among great princes. The Spanish monarch immediately paid Charles a visit, expressed the utmost esteem and attachment for his person, and made wide protestations of a correspondent confidence and friendship. By the most studious civilities, he showed the respect which he bore to his royal guest. He gave him a golden key, which opened all his apartments, that the prince might, without any introduction, have access to him at all hours. He took the left hand of him on every occasion, except in the apartments assigned to Charles; for there, he said, the prince was at home. Charles was received into the palace with the same pomp and ceremony that attends the Kings of Spain on their coronation; the council received public orders to obey him as the king himself. Observing, however, that the order of right of precedence before his own king, would not put on his hat in the prince's presence; all the prisons of Spain were thrown open, and all the prisoners received their freedom, as if the event, the most honourable and most fortunate, had brought in the monarchy; and every sumptuary law with regard to apparel was suspended during Charles's residence in Spain. The infanta, however, was only shown to her lover in public: the Spanish idea of domestic tranquility and privacy, allows of any further intercourse, till the arrival of the dispensation. The point of honour was carried so far by that generous people, that no attempt was made, on account of the advantages which, on his arrival, the prince found, to proffer the royal terms of treaty: their paczual only permitted them, on one occasion, to desire more concessions in the religious articles; but, upon the opposition of Bishop, accompanied with some reproaches, they immediately desisted. The Pope, however, hearing of the prince's arrival in Madrid, took some new clauses to the dispensation; and it became necessary to transmit the articles to London, that the king might ratify them. That treaty, which was made public by the consent of each, confirmed the ceremonial exercise of the Catholic religion by the infants and her household. Nothing could reasonably be found fault with, except one article, in which the king promised, that the children of the king of Spain should be educated, till they come to the age of ten years. This condition could not be insisted on, but with a view of seasons their minds with Catholic principles; and though so tender an age seemed a sufficient security against theological prejudices, yet the same reason which made the Pope insist that article, should have induced the king to reject it.

Besides the public treaty, there were separate articles, privately sworn to by the king; in which he promised to suspend the penal laws enacted against Catholics, to procure a repeal of them in parliament, and to grant a toleration for the exercise of the Catholic religion in private houses. These articles, if they had ever been against these articles, had been made known to the public; since we find it by what we have imputed an enormous crime to the prince, that having received, about this time, a very civil letter from the Pope, he was induced to retract a very sound article.

Meanwhile Gregory XV. who granted the dispensation, died, and Urban VIII. was chosen in his place. Upon this event, the nuncio refused to deliver the dispensation, till it should be renewed by Urban; and that crafty pontiff delayed sending a new dispensation, in hopes that, during the prince's residence in Spain, some expedient might be fallen upon to effect his conversion. The King of England, as well as the prince, became impatient. On the first hint, Charles obtained permission to return; and Philip graced his departure with all the circumstances of elaborate civility and respect, which had attended his reception. He even erected a pillar on the spot where they took leave of each other, which, with a great sum of money, Charles saw the Princess Henrietta, whom he afterwards espoused, and who was at that time in the bloom of youth and beauty. In eleven days after their departure, the nuncio at Madrid received and surprised every body by a step so unusual among great princes. parliament, be yielded to difficulties which he had not courage or strength of mind sufficient to overcome. The prince therefore, and Buckingham, on their arrival at London, assumed entirely the direction of the negotiation, and it was their business to seek for pretexts, by which they could give a colour to their intended breach of treaty.

Though the restitution of the palatinate had ever been considered by James as a natural or necessary consequence of the Spanish alliance, he had always forbidden his ministers to insist on it as a preliminary article to the conclusion of the marriage treaty. He considered, that this principality was of the solemn design of the emperor and the Duke of Bavaria; and that it was no longer in the King of Spain's power, by a single stroke of his pen, to restore it to its ancient master. The strict alliance of Spain with these princes would engage Philip, he thought, to soften so disagreeable a demand by every art of negotiation; and many articles must of necessity be adjusted, before such an important point could be effected. It was sufficient, in James's opinion, if the sincerity of the Spanish court could, for the present, be ascertained; and, dreading further delays of the marriage, so long wished for, he was resolved to trust the palatine's full restoration to the event of future counsels and deliberations.

The first conditions of negotiation Buckingham now reversed; and he overturned every submission upon which the treaty had hitherto been conducted. After many fruitless armies were employed to delay or prevent the engagement, the King received positively, to deliver the proxy, which had been left in his hands, or to finish the marriage, till security were given for the full restitution of the palatinate. Philip understood this language. He had been acquainted with the disgust received by Buckingham; and deeming a man capable of sacrificing to his own ungovernable passions, the greatest interests of his master and of his country, he had expected, that the unbounded confidence of that favourite would induce him to employ a marriage treaty to embroil the two nations. Determined, however, to throw away the blame of the rupture entirely on the English, he delivered into Bristol's hand a written promise, by which he bound himself to procure the restoration of the palatinate, either by persuasion, or by every other possible means; and when he found that this concession gave no satisfaction, he ordered the infant to lay aside the title of Princess of Wales, which she bore after the arrival of the dispensation given by Philip, and to drop the study of the English language. And thinking that such rash concessions, as now governed the court of England, would not stop at the breach of the marriage treaty, but would begin the preparations for war immediately to be made throughout all his dominions.

Thus James, having, by means inexplicable from the ordinary rules of politics, conducted so near an honourable peace, and neglected the passion and the transport, of his son-in-law, failed at last of his purpose, by means equally unaccountable.

But, though the expedients already used by Buckingham were sufficiently inglorious both for himself and for the nation, it was necessary for him, ere he could fully effect his purpose, to employ armies still more dishonourable.

The king, having broken with Spain, was obliged to concert new measures; and in order to prevent the out assistance of parliament, no effectual step of any kind could be taken. The benevolence, which, during the interval, had been rigorously excised for the palatinate, though leaved for so popular an end, had procured to the king less money than ill-will from his subjects.6 Whatever discouragements, therefore, he might receive from his ill agreement with former parliaments, there was a necessity of summing once more this assembly; and it might be hoped, that the Spanish alliance, which gave such umbrage, being abandoned, the Commons would now be better satisfied with the king's administration. In his speech, January 29th, 1644, he hinted of his cause of complaint against Spain; and he graciously condescended to ask the advice of parliament, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the conduct of the war. Buckingham delivered to a committee of Lords and Commons a long narrative, which he pretended to be true and complete, of every step taken in the negotiations with Philip; but partly by the suppression of some facts, partly by the false colouring laid on others, this narrative was calculated entirely to mislead the parliament, and to throw on the court of Spain the reproach of artifice and insincerity. He said that, after many years' negotiation, the king found not himself any nearer his purpose; and that he had never brought the treaty beyond the general professions and declarations; that he, from those double intentions of Spain, resolved at last to take a journey to Madrid, and put the matter into the utmost trial: he would, in short, give no artificial dealings as made him conclude all the steps taken towards the marriage to be false and deceitful: that the restitution of the palatinate, which had ever been regarded as the main object the king had in view, was seriously intended by Spain; and that, after enduring much bad usage, the prince was obliged to return to England, without any hopes, either of obtaining the infants, or of restoring the elective palatinate.

This narrative, which, considering the importance of the occasion, and the solemnity of that assembly to which it was delivered, deserves great blame, was yet vouched for by both the prince himself and his minister; and the King himself lent it, indirectly, his authority, by telling the parliament that it was by his orders Buckingham laid the whole affair before them. The conduct of these princes it is difficult fully to excuse. It is in vain to plead the youth and inexperience of Charles; unless his inexperience and youth, as it is probable if not certain, really led him into error, and made him swallow all the fallacies of Buckingham. And though the king was here hurried from his own merriment, to reproach others, by no means have induced him to prostitute his character, and seem to touch the impostures, at least false colourings, of his favourite, of which he had so good reason to entertain a suspicion. Buckingham's narrative, however artfully disguised, contained so many contradictory circumstances, as were sufficient to open the eyes of all reasonable men; but it concurred with the passion and the prejudices, and, without the assistance of parliament, no scruple was made of immediately adopting it. Charmed with having obtained at length the opportunity, so long wished for, of going to war with papists, they little thought of future consequences; but immediately advised the king to break off both treaties with Spain, as well as that which regarded the marriage, and that for the restitution of the palatinate. The people, ever greedy of war, till they suffer by it, displayed their triumph and joy with unrestrained liberality, and with free rejoicings, and by insults on the Spanish ministers. Buckingham was now the favourite of the public, and of the parliament. Sir Edward Coke, in the House of Commons, called him the scourge of the nation.1 Every place revered with his praises. And he himself, intoxicated by a popularity which he enjoyed so little time, and which he so ill deserved, violated all duty to his indulgent master, and entered into cabals with the puritanical members, who had ever opposed the royal authority. He even encouraged schemes for abolishing the order of bishops, and selling the dean and chapter lands, in order to defray the expenses of a Spanish war. And the king, though he still entertained prospects for terminating war, and for making an accommodation with Spain, was so borne down by the torrent of popular prejudices, conducted and increased by Buckingham, that he was at last obliged, in a speech to parliament, to soften the accents of his voice, and to say that he would engage to support him. It doubts of their sincerity in this respect, doubts which the event showed not to be ill-grounded, had probably been one cause of his former pacific and dilatory measures.

In his speech on this occasion, the king began with lamenting his own misfortunes, that, having so long valued himself on the epithet of the public monarch, he should now, to his old age, be obliged to exchange the blessings of peace for the inevitable calamities of war. He represented to them the immense and continued expense requisite for military armaments; and besides supplies, from time to time, as they should become necessary, he demanded an unlimited power of money, and a stock before the commencement of hostilities. He told them of his intolerable debts, chiefly contracted by the sums remitted to the palatinate; but he added, that he did not think it just that he should maintain an entire industry which was sufficient for him, if the honour and security of the public were provided for. To remove all suspicion, he who had ever strenuously maintained his prerogative, and who had even in some instances, for causing an alarm of doubtful, now made an imperfect concession, of which the consequences might have proved fatal to royal authority: that voluntarily offered, that the money voted should be paid to a committee of parliament, and should be issued by the hands of the Commons. The Commons willingly accepted of this concession, so unusual in an English monarch; they voted him only three subsidies and three fifteens and they took no notice of the complaints which he made of his own wants and necessities.

Advantage was also taken of the present good agreement between the king and parliament, in order to pass the bill against monopolies, which had formerly been encouraged by the king, but which had failed by the rupture between him and the last House of Commons. This bill was conceived in such terms as to render it merely declaratory; and all monopolies were condemned as contrary to the Constitution. This measure was, however, that was supposed, that every subject of England had entire power to dispose of his own actions, provided he did no injury to any of his fellow-subjects; and that no prerogative of the king, no power of any magistrate, nothing but the authority alone of laws, could restrain that unlimited freedom. The full prosecution of this noble principle into all its natural consequences, has at last, through many contests, produced that singular and happy government which we enjoy at present.

The House of Commons also corroborated, by a new precedent, the important power of impeachment, which, two years before, had been exercised in the case of Chancellor Bacon, and which had lain dormant for nearly two centuries, except when they served as instruments of royal vengeance. The Earl of Middlesex had been raised, by Buckingham's interest, from the rank of a London merchant, to be treasurer of England; and, by his activity and address, seemed not unworthy of that preferment. But, as he incurred the displeasure of his patron, by scrupling or refusing some demands of money during the prince's residence in Spain, that favourite vowed revenge, and employed all his credit among the Commons to procure an impeachment of the treasurer. The king was well aware that the prince was reconciled to the prince and duke, that they would live to have their fill of parliamentary proceedings. In a speech to the parliament, he endeavoured to apologise for Middleton, and to declare against this measure as being an improper measure for the suppression of any religion, according to the received maxim, that the blood of the martyrs was the seed of the church. He also condemned to the public the treatment of which, he supposed, the Commons had been subjected; that the Commons was lost, to a temporary suspension of the penal laws against the catholics, which he distanced from a toleration, a term at that time extremely odious. James naturally deemed his meaning to be sufficiently explained, and feared not any reproach of falsehood or duplicity, on account of this utterance. After all these transactions, the parliament was prorogued by the king, who let fall some hints, in gentle terms, of the sense which he entertained of their unkindness, in not supplying his necessities.

James, unable to resist so strong a combination as that of his people, his parliament, his son, and his favourite, had been compelled to surrender for which, finding himself too temperate as well as judicious, he had ever entertained a most settled aversion. Though he dissembled his resentment, he began to estrange himself from Buckingham, to whom he ascribed all those violent counsels, and whom he considered as the author both of the prince's journey to Spain, and of the breach of the marriage treaty. The arrival of Bristol he impatiently looked for; and it was by the assistance of that munster, whose wisdom he respected, and whose views he approved, that he hoped in time to extricate himself from his present difficulties.

* During the prince's abode in Spain, that Return of a negociator had ever opposed, though unsuccessfully, to the impertinent measures suggested by Buckingham, his own wise and well-tempered counsels. After Charles's departure, he still, upon the first appearance, * will easily appear from many passages in the history of that reign. But the ideas of some are much changed, during about twenty years of a peaceful and prosperous administration. The Commons, though power of himself, had recalled all patents of monopolies, were not continued without a law, and considered them, and a declaration of pacts, as necessary for the present, and establishing principles very favourable to liberty: but they were extremely moderate, when the king and his cabinet, who after having refused their request, issued a few of the royal oppressive patents, and employed the house to make them as inflammatory as possible. The parliament had surely reason, when they confirmed, in the seventh of June, that he allowed to his parliament, all business, the right of impeaching any of his predecessors, and that this right was not, without a change of the constitution, to be admitted. But as the measure was finally referred to the Commons, Monsieur de la Bourdonne, in his debates, vol. i. p. 469, presented the liberty of the nation to the House of Commons, and the Parliament, and to the House of Commons, in his debates, vol. i. p. 23. This principle had prevailed, during any former period of the English government, as it has been ever since, when the laws have eviance of a change of resolution, interposed his advice, and strenuously insisted on the sincerity of the Spaniards in the conduct of the treaty, as well as the advantages which England must reap from the completion of it. Enraged to find that his successful labours should be rendered abortive by the levities and caprices of an insolent minister, he would understand no hints; and nothing but express orders from his master could engage him to make that de

Many of the Catholic nobility must have found this final period the least flattering to their treaty. He was not therefore surprised to hear that Buck

Nothing could be of greater consequence to Buckingham, than to keep Bristol at a distance both from the king and the parliament; lest the power of truth, enforced by so well-informed a party, should open scenes, which were but suspected by the former, and of which the latter had as yet entertained no manner of jealousy. He applied therefore to James, whose weakness, disguised to himself under the appearance of finesse and dissimulation, was now become absolutely incurable. A warrant for the arrest of Bristol to the Tower was issued immediately upon his arrival in England; and though he was soon released from confinement, yet orders were carried from him to the king, the prince, or himself, as well as from any consideration of the seriousness of the case

While the attachment of the prince to Buckingham, while the timidity of James, or the same of changing his favourite, kept the whole court in awe; the Spanish ambassador, Inoiza, endeavoured to open the king's eyes, and to cure his fears by instilling greater fears into him. He privately slipped into his hand a paper, and gave him a signal to read it at leisure. He thereupon informed him that he was as much a prisoner at London as ever Francis I. was at Madrid; that the prince and Buckingham had conspired together, and had the whole court at their devotion; that the Catholic nobility were united in an open and avowed conspiracy against the king, the prince, or himself, as well as from any consideration of the seriousness of the case. He therefore, to keep the Prince of Wales, after which Charles II. had protested governors from his early years: first the Earl of Newcastle, then the Marquis of Hertford. The prospect of a rupture between James and the catholic king; and they flattered themselves, as well from the natural union of interests between them and England, as from the influence of the present weakness of the Protestant powers, that peace would soon march to their relief. Accordingly, an army of six thousand men was levied in England and sent over to Holland, commanded by four young noblemen, Essex, Oxford, Southampton, and Willoughby, who were ambitious of distinguishing themselves in so popular a cause, and of acquiring military experience under so renounced a captain as Maurice. It might reasonably have been expected, that this enterprise would have made the military position of the palatinate appear a point of such vast importance in England; the same effect must have been produced in France, by the force merely of political views and considerations. While that principality remained in the hands of the house of Austria, the French dominions were surrounded on all sides by the possessions of that ambitious family, and might be invaded by superior forces from every quarter. It concerned, therefore, in King Francis, to prevent the peaceable establishment of the emperor in his new conquests; and both by the situation and greater power of his state, he was much better enabled than James to give succour to the distressed prince. But this enterprise was, by Richelieu, who now began to acquire an ascendant in the French court; that minister was determined to pave the way for his enterprises, by first subduing the hugonots, and then gradually advancing a greater force on the house of Austria. The prospect, however, of a conjunction with England was presently embraced, and all imaginable encouragement was given to every proposal for concluding a marriage between Charles and the Princess Henrietta.

Notwithstanding the sensible experience, which James might have acquired, of the insurmountable antipathy entertained by the subjects against catholics, he still persevered in the opinion, that his son would be degraded by receiving into his bed a princess of less than royal extraction. After the rupture, therefore, with Spain, nothing remained but an alliance with France; and to this court he immediately applied himself. The same alliances had not here place, which had so long entangled him in the Spanish negotiation: the portion promised was much inferior; and the peaceable restoration of the prince was his chief consideration. But James was afraid lest his son should be altogether disappointed of a bride; and therefore, as soon as the French king demanded, for the honour of his crown, the same terms which he had offered to the Spanish prince, he was prevailed with to comply. And as the prince, during his abode in Spain, had given a verbal promise to allow the infanta the education of her children till the age of thirteen, this article was here inserted in the treaty; and to that imprudence is generally imputed the present distressed condition of his posterity. The court of England, however, it must be confessed, always pretended, even in their memorials to the French court, that all the favourable conditions granted to the catholics were inserted in the marriage treaty merely to please the Pope, and that their strict execution was, by an agreement with France, secretly dispensed with.

As much as the conclusion of the marriage treaty was acceptable to the king, as much were enterprises disagreeable, both from the extreme difficulty of the undertaking in which he was engaged, and from his own incapacity for such a scene of action.

During the Spanish war, both Southwark and Man still in his hands, Ferdinand, desirous of withdrawing his forces from the palatinate, and of leaving that state in security, was unwilling that so important a fortress should remain in the possession of his enemy. To compromise all differences, it was agreed to sequester it into the hands of the infant as a neutral person; upon condition that, after the expiration of the truce, it should be delivered to Frederic; though peace should not at that time be concluded between him and Ferdinand. But after the unexpected rupture with Spain, the infants, when James demanded the execution of the treaty, offered him peaceable possession of Frankendael, and even promised a safe conduct for the garrison through the Spanish Netherlands; but there was some temerity of engaging, at this time, too, between her state and the palatinate; and for passage over that territory, no terms were stipulated. By this chicanery, which certainly had not been employed if unity with Spain had been preserved, the palatinate was totally dispossessed of his patrimonial dominions.

The English nation, however, and James's warlike counsellors, were not discouraged. It was still determined to reconquer the palatinate; a state lying in the midst of Germany, possessed entirely by the emperor and Duke of Bavaria, surrounded by potent enemies, and cut off from all communication with England. Count Mansfeld's force consisted of a considerable infantry, and an English army of twelve thousand foot and two hundred horse was levied by a general press throughout the kingdom. During the negotiation with France, vast promises had been made, though in general terms, by the French minister not only to furnish the prince in question, but to send the English troops, but that powerful succour should also join them in their march towards the palatinate. In England, all these professions were hastily interpreted to James.

Mansfeld's command were embarked at Dover; but, upon sailing over to Calais, found no orders yet arrived for their admission. After waiting in vain during some time, they were obliged to sail towards Zealand; where it had also been neglected to concert proper measures for their disembarkation; and some scruples arose among the States on account of the scarcity of provisions. Meanwhile, a pestilent distemper was raging in among the English forces, so long cooped up in narrow vessels. Half the army died while on board; and the other half, weakened by sickness, appeared too small a body to march into the palatinate. And thus ended this enterprise; the only disaster which happened to England during the prosperous and pacific reign of James.

That reign was now drawing towards a conclusion. With peace, so successfully cultivated and so passionately loved by this monarch, his life also terminated. This spring he was seized with a tertian ague; and, when encouraged by his courtiers with the common proverb, that such a distemper, during that season, was health for a king, he replied, that the proverb was meant of a young king. After some fits, he found himself extremely weakened, and sent for the prince, whom he exhorted to bear a tender affection for his wife, but to preserve constancy in religion; to protect the church of England; and to extend his care towards the unhappy family of the palatinate. With decrecy and courage he prepared himself for his end; and he expired on the 27th of May, and was followed by a reign of twenty-two years and some days; and in the fifty-ninth year of his age. His reign over Scotland was almost of equal duration with his life. In all history, it would be difficult to find a reign less illustrious, yet more unpapable and unblemished, than that of James in both kingdoms.

His character. No prince, so little enterprising and so inoffensive, was ever so much exposed to the opposite effects of public and private felicity, and of pangs and penalties. And the facts, which began in his time, being still continued, have made his character be as much disputed to this day, as is commonly that of princes who are our contemporaries. Many virtues, however, it must be owned, he was possessed of; but scarce any of them pure, or free from the corruption of the neighboring vices. His generosity bordered on profusion, his learning on pedantry, his pacific disposition on pusillanimity, his wisdom on cunning, his friendship on light fancy and base fondness. But while he was maintaining his own authority, he may perhaps be suspected, in a few of his actions, and still more of his pretensions, to have somewhat encroached on the liberties of his people: while he endeavored, by an exact neutrality, to acquire the good-will of all his neighbors, he was able to preserve fully the esteem and regard of none. His capacity was considerable; but fitter to discourse on general maxims, than to conduct any intricate business: his intentions were just; but more adapted to the conduct of private life, than to the government of kingdoms.

Awkward in his person and ungainly in his manners, he was ill qualified to command respect; partial and undiscriminating in his affections, he was little fitted to acquire general love. Of a feeble temper more than of a frail judgment: exposed to our ridicule from his vanity; but exempt from our hatred by his freedom from pride and arrogance. And throughout the whole, it is clear that one of his character, that all his qualities were sufficed with weakness and embellished by humanity. Of political courage he certainly was destitute; and whence chiefly is derived the strong prejudice which prevails against his conduct. However, he did not entirely lose his country, but owned, from general experience, to be extremely fallacious.

He was only once married, to Anne of Denmark, who died on the 3d of March 1619, in the forty-fifth year of her age; a woman eminent neither for her vices nor her virtues. She loved shows and expensive amusements; but possessed little taste in her pleasures. A great comet appeared about the time of her death; and the vulgar conceit was, that this was a portent for the person of that unfortunate monarch, his eyes in their eyes are even the most insignificant princes.

He left only one son, Charles, then in the twenty-fifth year of his age; and one daughter, Elizabeth, married to his elector palatine. She was aged twenty-nine years. Those alone remained of six legitimate children born to him. He never had any illegitimate; and he never discovered any tendency, even the smallest, towards a passion for any mistress.

The Archbishop of Canterbury, during this reign, were, Whytgift, who died in 1604; Bancroft, in 1610; Abbott, who survived the king. The chancellors, Lord Ellesmore, who resigned in 1617: Bacon was first lord-keeper till 1619; then was created chancellor, and was displaced in 1621: Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, was created lord-keeper in his place. The high treasurers were, the Earl of Dorset, who died 1609; the Earl of Salisbury, in 1612; the Earl of Suffolke, fined, and displaced for bribery in 1618; Lord Mansfeld, resigned in 1621; the Earl of Middlesex, displaced in 1624; the Earl of Marlborough succeeded. The lord admirals were, the Earl of Nottingham, who resigned in 1618; the Earl, afterwards Duke, of Buckingham. The secretaries of state were, the Earl of Salisbury, Sir Ralph Winwood, Nanton, Calvert, Lord Conway, Sir Albertus Moreton.

The numbers of the House of Lords, in the first parliament of this reign, were seventy-six, and at the end of it, sixty-eight. The numbers in the first parliament of Charles were ninety-seven. Consequently James, durance that period, created nineteen new peers above those that expired.

The House of Commons at the first parliament of this reign, consisted of four hundred and sixty-seven members. It appears, that four boroughs revived their charters, which they had formerly neglected. And as the first parliament of Charles consisted of one whole, it may be probable, that the ninety-four members, we may infer that James created ten new boroughs.

CHARLES I.

A parliament at Westminster.—At Oxford—Naval expedition against Naples—Second Parliament.—Impeachment of Buckingham.—Violent measures of the court.—War with France—Expedition to the Isle of Ely.

A.D. 1602.

No sooner had Charles taken into his hands the reins of government, than he showed an impatience to assemble the great council of the nation and he would gladly, for the sake of despots, have called together the same parliament which had sitten under his father, and which lay at that time under prorogation. But being told that this measure would appear unusual, he issued writs for summoning a new parliament at meet on the 7th of March; and it was not Westminster, without that the arrival of the princess Henrietta, whom he had espoused by proxy, obliged him to delay, by repeated prorogations, their meeting till the eighteenth of June, when they assembled at Westminster for the despatch of business.

The young prince, inexperienced and impolitic, regarded as sincere all the praises and caresses with which he had been loaded, while active in procuring the rupture with the house of Austria. And besides that he laboured under great necessities, he hastened with alacrity to a period when he might receive the most unbiased testimony of the dutiful attachment of his subjects. His discourse to the parliament was full of simplicity and cordiality. He lightly mentioned the occasion which he had for supply. He employed no intrigue to influence the suffrages of the members. He would not even allow the officers of the crown who had inserted any particular sum which might be expected by him. Secure of the affections of the Commons, he was resolved that their bounty should be entirely their own deed; unassuming, unassisted; the genuine fruit of sincere confidence and regard.

The House of Commons accordingly took into consideration the business of supply. They knew that all the money granted by the last parliament had been expended on naval and military armaments; and that great anticipations were likewise made on the revenues of the crown. They were not ignorant that Charles was loaded with a large debt, contracted by his father, who had borrowed money both from his own subjects and from foreign princes. They had learned by experience, that the public revenue could with difficulty maintain the dignity of the crown, even under the ordinary charges of government. They were sensible that the present war was very lately the result of their own importunate applications and entreaties, and that they had solemnly engaged to support their sovereign in the management of it. They were acquainted with the difficulty of military enterprises, directed against the whole house of Austria; against the King of Spain, possessed of the greatest riches and most extensive dominions of any prince in Europe; against the Emperor Ferdinand, hitherto the most fortunate monarch of his age, who had subdued and astonished Germany by the rapidity of his victories. Deep impressions, they saw, must be made by the English sword, and a vigorous offensive war be waged against these mighty potentates; where they would resign a principality, which they had now fully subdued, and which they held in secure possession, by its being surrounded with all their other territories.

To answer, therefore, all these great and important ends; to satisfy their young king in the first request which he had made them; to prove their sense of the many royal virtues, particularly economy, with which Charles was endowed; the House of Commons, conducted by the wisest and ablest statesman that had ever adorned its benches in England, thought it proper to confer on the king a supply of two subsidies, amounting to 112,000 pounds.a

This measure, which discovers rather a cruel mockery of Charles than any serious design of supporting his enterprises, was of extraordinary circumstance, when considered in all its circumstances, that it naturally summons up our attention, and raises an inquiry concerning the causes of a conduct, unprecedented in an English parliament. So numerous an assembly, composed of persons of various dispositions, was not, it is probable, wholly influenced by the same motive, while few, if any, had declared openly their true reason. We shall, therefore, approach nearer to the truth, if we mention all the views which the present conjuncture could suggest to them.

It is no more doubted, but even all against the Duke of Buckingham had an influence with many. So vast and rapid a fortune, so little merited, could not fail to excite public envy; and however men's hatred might have been such as to make a moment, while the duke's conduct seemed to gratify their passions and their prejudices, it was impossible for him long to preserve the affections of the people. His influence over the modesty of Charles exceeded even that which he had acquired over the weakness of James, nor was any public measure conducted but by his counsel and direction. His vehement temper prompted him to raise suddenly to the highest elevation his flatterers and dependents; and upon the least occasion of displeasure, he threw them down with equal impetuosity and violence. Impeachable in his hatred; fickle in his friendships: all men were either regarded as his enemies, or dreaded soon to become such. The wealth of the dukedom of the kingdom was in his unsuitable hand; while he both engrossed the entire confidence of his master, and held, invested in his single person, the most considerable offices of the crown.

However the interests of this man might have been increased by these considerations, we are not to suppose them the sole motives. The last parliament of James, amidst all their joy and festivity, had given him a supply very disproportioned to his demand and to the occasion. And so the fickle monarch, whose policy had been so longer pursued during forty years, succeeded to all the passions and principles of his predecessors; we ought rather to account for this obstinacy from the general situation of the kingdom dating that whole period, than from any circumstances which attended this particular conjuncture.

The nation was very little accustomed at that time to the burden of taxes, and had never opened their purses in any degree for supporting their sovereign. Even Elizabeth, notwithstanding her vigour and frugality, and the necessary wars in which she was engaged, had reason to complain of the Commons in this particular; nor could the authority of the princess, which was otherwise almost absolute, ever extort from them the requisite supplies. Habits, more than reason, we find in every thing to be the governing principle of mankind. In this view, likewise, the sinking of the value of subsidies must be considered as occasioned by an evident weakness of the crown, from which custom, would not augment their number in the same proportion.

The puritanical party, though dissatisfied, had not lost authority over the kingdom; and many of the leaders among the Commons had secretly embraced the rigid tenets of that sect. All these were disgusted with the court, both by the prevalence of the principles of civil liberty essential to their party, and on account of the restraint under which they were held by the established hierarchy. In order to fortify himself against the resentment of James, Buckingham had affected popularity, and entered into cabals of the parliament. The weakness of the confidence of Charles, he had since abandoned this party; and on that account was the more exposed to their hatred and resentment. Though the religious schemes of many of the puritans, when explained, appeared pretty frivolous, we are not thus to imagine that they were pursued by none but persons of weak understandings. Some men of the greatest parts and most extensive knowledge that the nation at this time produced, would not enjoy unto the last hour, his dead body, when he offered up to the Divinity by a priest covered with a white linen vestment.

The match with France, and the articles in favour of catholics, though quitted him, appeared to many in the present conjuncture, were likewise causes of disgust to this whole party: though it must be remarked, that the connexions with that crown were much less obnoxious to the protestants, and less agreeable to the catholics, than the alliance formerly projected with Spain, and were therefore received rather with pleasure than alarm by those who had been seduced by the project.

To all these causes we must yet add another of considerable moment. The House of Commons, we may observe, was almost entirely governed by a set of men of the middle class of society, and this set of men, who were now formed into a regular party, and united, as well by fixed aims and projects, as by the hardships which some of them had undergone, in prosecution of them. Among these men were Edward Coke, Sir Edwin Sandys, Sir Robert Philips, Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Dudley Digges, Sir John Elliot, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Selden, and Mr. Pym. Animated with a warm regard to liberty, these generous patriots saw with regret an unbounded power exercised by the crown, and were resolved to seize the opportunity which the king's necessities offered them, of reducing the prerogative within reasonable compass. Though these assertions had blindingly given way to practices and precedents favourable to kingly power, and had been able, notwithstanding, to preserve some small remains of liberty; it would be impossible, they thought, when all these pretensions were moderated, and the opportunity of the age, that is to say, to maintain any shadow of popular government, in opposition to such unlimited authority in the sovereign. It was necessary to fix a choice; either to abandon entirely the interest of the nation, and the future of the age, to form and more precise barriers than the constitution had hitherto provided for them. In this dilemma, men of such aspiring genius, and such independent fortunes, could not long deliberate; they boldly assumed the side of freedom, and resolved to grant no supplies to their necessitous prince without extorting concessions in favour of civil liberty. The end they esteemed beneficent and noble: the means regular and certain: they resolved to try with effect the arms which the Princes who improperly lusted for an opportunity ofasserting the liberty of the empire; that Mansfield had undertaken to penetrate with an English army into the palatinate, and by that quarter to excite the members of the two houses of parliament to increase the number of men of Ireland, demanded an annual expense of 400,000 pounds; that he himself had already extirpated and anticipated in the public service his whole revenue, and had not so much as left sufficient for the daily subsistence of himself and his family; 4 that on his accession to the crown, he had found a debt of above 300,000 pounds, contracted by his father in support of the palatinate; and that, while Prince of Wales, he had himself contracted debts, notwithstanding his great frugality, to the amount of 70,000 pounds, which he had expended entirely on naval and military armaments. After mentioning all these facts, the king even condescended in favour to the parliament; he said, that the request was the first he had ever made them; that he was young and in the commencement of his reign; and if he now met with kind and dutiful usage, it would endear to him the use of parliament, and would preserve an entire harmony between him and his people.

To these reasons the Commons remained inexorable. Notwithstanding that the king's measures, on the supposition of a foreign war, which they had constantly demanded, were altogether unacceptable, they obstinately refused any further aid. Some members favourable to the court having insisted on an addition of two fifteenths to the former supply, even this pittance was refused; 5 though it was known that a fleet and army were lying at Portsmouth in great want of pay and provisiou:s; and that Buckingham the admiral, and the treasurer of the navy, had advanced on their own credit near a hundred thousand pounds for the sea-service. Besides all their other motives, the House of Commons had made a discovery which, as they wanted but a pretence for their refusal, inflamed them against the court and against the Duke of Buckingham.

When James deserted the Spanish alliance and courted that of France, he had promised to furnish Lewis, who was entirely destitute of naval force, with one ship of war, together with seven armed vessels hired from the merchants. These the French court had pretended they would employ against the Genoese, who, being firm and useful allies to the Spanish monarchy, were naturally regarded with an evil eye, both by the King of France and of England. When these vessels by Charles's orders arrived at Dieppe, there arose a strong suspicion that they were to serve against Rochelle. The sailors were inflamed. Charles now found himself obliged to depart from that delicacy which he had formerly maintained. By himself or his ministers, he entered into a particular detail both of the alliances which he had formed, and of the operations which he had projected. 2 He told the parliament, that by a promise of subsidies, he had engaged the King of Denmark to take part in the war; that this monarch intended to enter into it by the north, and to reinforce those princes who impatiently lusted for an opportunity of asserting the liberty of the empire; that Mansfield had undertaken to penetrate with an English army into the palatinate, and by that quarter to excite the members of the two houses of parliament to increase the number of men of Ireland, demanded an annual expense of 400,000 pounds; that he himself had already extirpated and anticipated in the public service his whole revenue, and had not so much as left sufficient for the daily subsistence of himself and his family; 4 that on his accession to the crown, he had found a debt of above 300,000 pounds, contracted by his father in support of the palatinate; and that, while Prince of Wales, he had himself contracted debts, notwithstanding his great frugality, to the amount of 70,000 pounds, which he had expended entirely on naval and military armaments. Some members favourable to the court having insisted on an addition of two fifteenths to the former supply, even this pittance was refused; 5 though it was known that a fleet and army were lying at Portsmouth in great want of pay and provisions; and that Buckingham the admiral, and the treasurer of the navy, had advanced on their own credit near a hundred thousand pounds for the sea-service. Besides all their other motives, the House of Commons had made a discovery which, as they wanted but a pretence for their refusal, inflamed them against the court and against the Duke of Buckingham.

mander; and signing all their names in a circle, lest he should discover the ringleaders, they had it under his prayer-book. Pennington declared, that he would rather be condemned for disobedience, than fight against his brother in France. The whole squadron sailed immediately to the Downs. There they received new orders from Buckingham, lord admiral, to return to England. The Duke knew that authority alone would not suffice, be employed much art and many subtleties to engage them to obedience; and a rumour which was spread that peace had been concluded between the French king and theSpanish, excited him to that purpose. On the 25th of July, they arrived at Dieppe they found that they had been deceived. Sir Ferdinando Gorges, who commanded one of the vessels, broke through and returned to England. All the officers and sailors of all the other ships, notwithstanding great offers made them by the French, immediately deserted. One gunner alone preferred duty towards his king to the cause of religion; and he was afterwards knighted. He ordered a squadron of twenty ships to join the French fleet, employed against the inhabitants of Rochelle. The Spanish monarch, sensible of the same consequences, secretly supported the protestants in France; and all princes had ever sacrificed to reasons of state the interests of their religion in foreign countries. All these obvious considerations had no influence. Great murmurings and discontent still prevailed in parliament. The king, though he had no ground of complaint against the French court, was thought to be as much entitled to assistance from England, as if they had taken turns in defence of their liberties and religion against the policies of other governments. He himself, from this incident, as well as from many others, that of all European nations, the British were at that time, and till long after, the most under the influence of that religious spirit which tends rather to inflame bigotry than increase peace and mutual charity.

On this occasion the Commons renewed their eternal complaints against the growth of popery, which was ever the chief of their grievances, and now their only one. They demanded a strict execution of the penal laws against the catholics, and reproached against some late pardons granted the priests. They attacked Muniture, one of the king's chaplains, on account of a moderate book which he had lately published, and which, to their great disgust, saved virtuous catholics, as well as other Christians, from eternal torments. Charles gave them a gracious and complaisant answer to all their remonstrances. He was, however, in his heart extremely averse to these curious measures. Though a determined protestant by principle as well as inclination, he had entertained no violent horror against popery; and a little humanity, he thought, could preserve this nation from the same excesses.

The king, finding that the parliament was resolved to grant him no supply, and that the French were ready to use all means of duty, of the great galleys of Spain, and the Spanish people, which were characteristic of puritanism. The House of Commons discovered other unfavourable symptoms of the prevalence of that part. They petitioned the king for replacing such able clergy as had been removed. The advantage reaped by this expedition was a small compensation for the dishonour which it occasions: by means, however, of that supply, and by other expedients, he was, though with difficulty, enabled to continue the war. The English leaders, this year, who, being disgusted in some court intrigue, took advantage of the never-failing presence of religion, in order to cover their rebellion; that the Dutch, influenced by these views, had ordered a squadron of twenty ships to join the French fleet, employed against the inhabitants of Rochelle.

That the Spanish monarch, sensible of the same consequences, secretly supported the protestants in France; and that all princes had ever sacrificed to reasons of state the interests of their religion in foreign countries. All these obvious considerations had no influence. Great murmurings and discontent still prevailed in parliament. The king, though he had no ground of complaint against the French court, was thought to be as much entitled to assistance from England, as if they had taken turns in defence of their liberties and religion against the policies of other governments. He himself, from this incident, as well as from many others, that of all European nations, the British were at that time, and till long after, the most under the influence of that religious spirit which tends rather to inflame bigotry than increase peace and mutual charity.

much contested; he thought that he had by that means incapacitated them from being elected members. But his intention being so evident, rather put the Commons more upon their guard. Know of patents still remained to keep up the ill humour of the House; and men insinuated that little instruction or rhetoric to recommend to them practices which increased their own importance and consideration. The weakness of the court, also, could not more evidently appear by his being so much out of the way. The Commons, therefore, thought it expedient, in order to obtain an influence over the Commons.

Feb. 6. The views, therefore, of the last parliament were not to be contended with, and the same men had been everywhere elected, and no time had intervened since their meeting. When the king had before the House his necessities, and asked for supply, they immediately voted him three subsidies and three fifteenths; and though they afterwards added one subsidy more, the sum was little proportioned to the greatness of the occasion, and ill fitted to promote those views of success and glory for which the young prince, in his first enterprise, so ardently longed. But this circumstance was not the most disagreeable one. The supply was only voted by the Commons. The passing of that vote into a law was reserved till the end of the session. A condition was therefore made of having united with the Commons for some time; and under colour of reducing grievances, which during this short reign could not be very numerous, they were to proceed in regulating and controlling every part of government, and in order to do which, and to oblige them short in this undertaking, or refused compliance with their demands, he must not expect any supply from the Commons. Great dissatisfaction was expressed by Charles at a treatment which he deemed so harsh and unconsiderate. But they saw the necessity of their measures; and, having weathered patience, observing to what side they would turn themselves.

Dissatisfaction of the Commons. The Duke of Buckingham, formerly duke of Albemarle, was a prominent of the public, and his influence was every more unpopular, by the symptoms which appeared both of his want of temper and prudence, and of the uncontrolled ascendant which he had acquired over his master. Two violent attacks were made upon the Sussex session to sustain; one from the Earl of Bristol, another from the House of Commons.

As long as James lived, Bristol, secure of the concord of that monarch, had expressed all duty and obedience; but in consequence of the unhappy events to the Duke of York's succession, he had joined with the Duke of Buckingham again. The king was extremely desirous of re-instituting himself in his former credit and authority. Even after Charles's accession he despaired not. He submitted to the king's commands of remaining at his country seat, and attempted to carry no further his measures; or, if intent to regain the good opinion of his master; but finding them all fruitless, and observing Charles to be entirely governed by Buckingham, his implacable enemy, he resolved no longer to keep any measures with the court. A new spirit he saw, and a new power, arising in the nation; and to these he was determined for the future to trust for his security and protection.

When the parliament was summoned, Charles, by a stretch of prerogative, had given orders that no writ, as is customary, should be sent to Bristol. That nobleman applied to the House of Lords by petition; and craving their good offices with the king for obtaining what was due as a peer of the realm. His writ was sent him,
The king seemed desirous of embracing every opportunity by which he could express a contempt and disregard for them. No one was at that time sufficiently sensible of the great weight which the Commons bore in the balance of the constitution. The history of England had never hitherto afforded one instance where any great movement or revolution had proceeded from the lower House. And as their rank, both considered in a body and individually, was but the second in the kingdom, nothing less than fatal experience could engage the English princes to pay a due regard to the inclinations of that formidable assembly.

The Earl of Salisbury, chancellor of the university of Cambridge, dying about this time, Buckingham, though lying under imprisonment, was yet, by means of court-interest, chosen in his place. The Commons represented and loudly complained of this affront; and the more to enrage them, the king himself wrote a letter to the university, extolling the duke, and giving them thanks for his election.

The lord-keeper, in the king's name, expressly commanded the House not to meddle with his minister and servant, Buckingham; and ordered them to finish, in a few days, the bill which they had begun for the subsidies, and to make some addition to them; otherwise they must not expect to sit any longer. And though these harsh communications were intended to be received and moderated, a few days after, by a speech of Buckingham's, they failed not to leave a disagreeable impression behind them.

Besides a more stately style which Charles in general affected to this parliament than to the last, he went so far in a message, as to threaten the Commons, that if they did not furnish him with supplies, he should be obliged to try new counsels. This language was sufficiently clear: yet enough was left uncertain and ambiguous to remain, Sir Dudley Carleton, vice-chamberlain, took care to explain it. "I pray you consider," said he, "what these new counsels are, or may be. I fear to declare those that I conceive. In all Councils, you know, the ambivalent opinions were used anceingly, by which those kingdoms were governed in a most flourishing manner; until the monarchs began to know their own strength, and seeing the turbulent spirit of their parliaments, at length by, little and little, began to stand on their prerogatives, and at last overthrow the parliaments, throughout Christendom, except here only with us. Let us be careful then to preserve the king's good opinion of parliaments, which bring such happiness to the nation, and makes us envied of all others, while there is this sweetness between his majesty and the Commons; lest we lose the repose of a free people by our turbulency in parliament. These imprudent suggestions are the more criminal, that strong precedents existed, and the custom of liberty, the Commons thought, which was to be preserved by unlimited complaisance, was no liberty at all. And it was necessary, while yet in their power, to secure the constitution by such inviolable barriers, that no king or minister should ever, for the future, dare to speak such a language to any parliament, or even entertain such a project against them.

Two members of the House, Sir Dudley Digges and Sir John Elliott, who had been employed as managers of the impeachment against the duke, were thrown into prison. The Commons immediately declared, that they would proceed no further upon business, till they had satisfaction in their privileges. Charles alleged, as the reason of this measure, certain seditious expressions, which, he said, had, in their accusation of the duke, dropped from these members. Upon inquiry, it appeared that such speeches had been used. The members were released, and the king repaid no other benefit from this attempt than to exasperate the House still further, and to show some degree of precipitancy and indiscretion.

Moved by this example, the House of Peers were roused from their inactivity; and claimed liberty for the Earl of Arundel, who had been lately confined in the Tower. After many fruitless evasions, the king, though somewhat ungracefully, was at last obliged to comply. And in this incident it sufficiently appeared that the Lords, how little so ever employed, in whose hands the king's coffers, were not wanting in just sense of their own dignity.

The ill humour of the Commons, thus wantonly irritated by the court, and finding no gratification in the legal impeachment, Buckingham, sought other objects on which it might exert itself. The never-failing cry of popery here served them instead. They again claimed the execution of the penal laws against Catholics; and they presented to the king a list of persons mistrusted with offices, most of them insignificant, who were either convicted or suspected recusants. To this in particular, they had, perhaps, some reason to blame the king's conduct. He had promised to the last House of Commons a redress of this religious grievance; but he was apt, in imitation of his father, to imagine that the parliament, when they failed of supplying his necessities, had, on their part, freed him from the obligation of a strict performance. A new odium, therefore, was forced upon Buckingham. His mother, who had a great influence over him, was a professed catholic; his wife was not free from suspicion; and the indulgence given to catholics was now supposed to be ill-rewarded by his credit and authority. So violent was the bigotry of the times, that it was thought a sufficient reason for disqualifying any one from holding an office, that his wife, or relations, or companions, were papists, though he himself was no catholic.

It is remarkable, that persecution was here chiefly pushed on by laymen; and that the church was willing to have granted more liberty than would be allowed by the Commons. The king himself, like Montague, failed not anew to meet with severe censures from that zealous assembly.

The next attack made by the Commons, had it prevailed, would have proved decisive. They were preparing a remonstrance against the levying of tonnage and poundage without consent of parliament. This article, together with the new impostions laid on merchandise by James, constituted near half the king's revenues, was a matter of which the king's resources, they would have reduced him to total subjection and dependence. While they retained such a pledge, besides the supply already promised, they were sure that nothing could be refused them. Though, before căpable of any thing like a substantial command, the king, and they found themselves utterly incapable of fixing any legal crime upon the duke, they regarded him as an unable and perhaps a dangerous minister; and they intimated to present a petition, which would then have been equivalent to a command, for removing him from his majesty's person and councils.

The king was alarmed at the yoke which he saw prepared for him. Buckingham's sole guilt, he thought, was being his friend and favourite. All the other complaints against him were mere pretences. A little before he was the idol of the people. No new crime had since been discovered against the monarch, the lord high-chancellor, by the greatest malice, the smallest appearance of guilt could not be fixed upon him. What idea, he asked, must all mankind entertain of his honour, should he sacrifice his innocent friend to pecuniary considerations? What further authority should he retain in the nation, were he capable, in the beginning of his reign, to give, in so signal a

The prince, desired by the many unavoidable causes of delay, believed that they still adhered to him.

I John Keswick. See also the Parliament before the same situation was supposed, when they in a much hurried manner, by their impetuous, irrespective, and even irrational alacrity, in which they said, Sir Charles himself was certainly deceived by Buckingham, when he connected allegiance to the person of his king with the liberties of his people, however inconsistent in their representations or the transactions they represented. They supposed that James had, with equal sincerity, been so long deceived by them; they represented them as having by their representations, the same proceedings as the House, were, in fact, but the same; the same manner of false loyalty in their narrative to the parliament. The truth is, they were not engaged to sacrifice the king, though, on the contrary, they were not even consulted by James, and were at last overcome. They became serious; but an instance, such matter of triumph to his enemies, and disappointment to his adherents. To-day the Commons pretended to that effect; but they knew he will attack some branch of his prerogative. By their remonstrances, and promises, and protestations, they had engaged the crown in a war. As soon as they saw a retreat impossible, without losing for new incidents, without covering themselves with new pretences, they immediately deserted him, and refused him all reasonable supply. It was evident, that they desired nothing so much as to see him plunged in inextricable difficulties, of which the country, and not they, would be the professed and deep, so to unbounded usurpations, it was necessary to oppose a proper firmness and resolution. All encroachments on supreme power could only be resisted successfully on the first attempt. The sovereign authority with such difficulty, reduced from its ancient and legal height; but when once pushed downwards, it soon became contemptible, and would easily, by the continuance of the same effort, now encouraged by success, be carried to the lowest extremity.

Promised by these plausible motives, Charles was determined immediately to dissolve the parliament. When this resolution was known, the House of Peers, whose confidence he had lost, and which he endeavoured to interpose, and they petitioned him, that he would allow the parliament to sit some time longer. Not a moment longer, cried the king hastily; and he soon after ended the session by a dissolution.

As this measure was foreseen, the Commons took care to finish and dispose their remonstrance, which they intended as a justification of their conduct to the people. 15th June. The king likewise, on his part, published a declaration, in which he gave the reasons of his disagreement with the parliament, and of their sudden dissolution, before they had time to conclude any one act. These papers furnished the partisans on both sides with ample matter of attack and counter-attack. But all impartial men judged that the Commons, though they had not as yet violated any law, yet, by their unphableness and independence, were insensibly changing, perhaps improving, the spirit and genius, while they preserved the form, of the constitution; and that the king was acting altogether without any plan; running on in a round surrounded on all sides with the most dangerous precipices, and concerning no proper measures, either for submitting to the obstinacy of the Commons, or for subduing it. After a breach with the parliament, which seemed so difficult to repair, the only rational counsel which Charles could pursue, was, immediately to conclude a peace with Spain, and to neglect the knavery and disaffection of the people, who discovered so little inclination to support him, or rather who seem to have formed a determined resolution to abridge his authority. Nothing could be more easy in the execution than this measure, nor more agreeable to his own and to national interest. But besides the treaties and engagements which he had entered into with Holland and Denmark, the king's thoughts were at this time averse to pacific counsels. There are two circumstances in Charles's character seemingly incompatible, which attended him during the whole course of his reign, and were in part the cause of his misfortunes: he was very steady and even obstinate in his purpose; and he was easily governed, by reason of his faculty, and of his deference to men much inferior to himself in both and understanding. His great ends he inflexibly maintained: but the means of attaining them he readily received from his successors and favourites, though not always fortunate in his choice. The violent, imperious Buckingham, inflamed with a desire of revenge for injuries which he himself bad committed, and animated with a love of glory which he had no talents to merit, at this time, notwithstanding the hatred and the censure of the royal, acquired such an admirable descendant over the virtuous and gentle temper of the king.

The new councils, which Charles had mentioned to the parliament, were now to be tried, in order to supply his necessities. Had he possessed any military force, on which he could rely, it is not improbable, that he had at once taken off his arms, and governed without any regard to parliamentary privileges. So high an army as he had received of knyly prerogative, and some of the so contemptible a notion of the rights of court.

Those popular assemblies, from which he very naturally thought he could not be separated with such ill usage. But his army was now levied, ill paid, and worse disciplined; nowise superior to the militia, who were much more numerous, and who were in a great measure under the influence of the army. It behoved him, therefore, to proceed cautiously, and to cover his enterprises under the pretence of ancient precedents, which, considering the great authority commonly enjoyed by his predecessors, could not be wanting to himself.

A commission was openly granted to compound with the catholics, and agree for dispensing with the penal laws enacted against them. By this expedient, the king both filled his coffers, and gratified his inclination of giving indulgence to these religioBists; but he could not have employed any branch of prerogative which would have been more disagreeable, or would have appeared more exceptionable to his protestant subjects.

From the novelty of the grand behaviour of the assembly: from the city he required a loan of 100,000 pounds. The former contributed slowly: but the latter, covering themselves under many pretences and excuses, gave him at last a flat refusal. In order to equip a fleet, a distribution, by order of council, was made of the maritime counties: to whom of them was required, with the assistance of the adjacent counties, to arm so many vessels as were appointed them.

The city of London was rated at twenty ships. This is the first appearance, in Charles's reign, of shamborough; a taxation which had once been imposed by Elizabeth, but which afterwards, when carried some steps further by Charles, created such violent discontent.

Of some, loans to others, the way of benevolence was proposed: methods supported by precedent, but always invasions, even in times more submissive and compliant. In the most absolute governments such expedients would be regarded as irregular and unequal.

These councils for supply were conducted with some moderation; till news arrived that a great battle was fought between the King of Denmark and Count Tilly, the imperial general; in which the former was totally defeated. Money now, more than ever, became necessary, in order to repair so great a breach in the alliance, and to support a prince who was so nearly allied to Charles, and who had been engaged in the war against the emperor, by the interest and power of his younger brother. For some time after this defeat, an act of council was passed, importing, that as the regency of affairs admitted not the way of parliament, the most speedy, equal, and convenient method of supply was by a general loan from the subject, according as every man was assessed in the rolls of the last subsidy. That precise sum was required which each would have paid, had the vote of four subsidies passed into a law: but care was taken to inform the people, that the sums exacted were not to be called subsidies, but loans. Had any doubt remained, whether forced loans, however authorized by precedent, and even by statute, were a violation of liberty, and must, by necessary consequence, render all parliaments superfluous; this was the proper expedient for opening the eyes of the whole nation. The example of Henry VIII., who had once, in his arbitrary reign, practised a like method of levying a regular supply, was generally deemed a very insufficient authority.

The commissioners appointed to levy these loans, among other articles of secret instruction, were enjoined, "If any shall refuse to lend, and shall make delays or excuses, and not open and declare all that concerneth him upon oath, whether he has been dealt with to deny or refuse to lend, or make an excuse for not lending? Who has dealt with him, and what speeches or persuasions were used to that purpose? And that they also shall charge every such person, in his majesty’s name, upon his allegiance, not to decline to any one what his answer was. b So violent an inquisitorial power, so impracticable an attempt at secr{ety, were the objects of indignation, and even, in some degree, of ridicule. The refuge of religious prejudices might support civil authority, sermons were preached by Sibthorpe and Manswaring, in favour of the general loan; and the court industriously spread them over the kingdom. Passive obedience was there the rule in its full extent, the whole authority of the state was represented as belonging to the king alone, and all limitations of law and a constitution were rejected as seditious and impious. c So openly was this doctrine espoused by the court, that Archbishop Abbot, a popular and venerable prelate, who requested from the king’s personal body and state, to be an active sufferer, who had submitted to the system, which with so little necessity was introduced into politics, falling under more fortunate management, was played with the most terrible success against him.

The king, injured by anger and necessity, thus employed the whole extent of his prerogative, the spirit of the people was far from being subdued. Throughout England, many refused these loans; some were even active in encouraging their neighbours to insist upon their constituencies, as a protest of the council, which were thrown into prison. d Most of them with patience submitted to confinement, or applied by petition to the king, who commonly released them. Five colonels among the soldiers, Sir Thomas Darnell, Sir John Penn, Sir John Henners, Sir John Delevingne, and Sir Edmond Hambden, had spirit enough, at their own hazard and expense, to defend the public liberties, and to demand repletion, not as a favour from the court, but as their due, by the laws of their country. e No particular cause was assigned of their remission. The special command alone of the king and council was pleaded; and it was asserted, that, by law, this was not sufficient reason for releasing or repletion to the prisoners.

November. This question was brought to a solemn trial before the King’s Bench; and the whole kingdom was alive to the issue of a cause, which was of much greater consequence than that of the season. By the debates on this subject it appeared, beyond controversy, to the nation, that their ancestors had been so jealous of personal liberty, as to secure it against arbitrary power in the crown, by six several statutes, f and by an article g of the Great Charter itself, the most sacred foundation of the laws and constitution. But the kings of England who had not been able to prevent the enacting of these laws, had sufficient authority, when the title of liberty was spent, to obstruct their regular execution; and they deemed it superfluous to attempt the formal repeal of statutes which they found so many expedients and pretexts to evade. Turbulent and seditious times frequently occurred, when the safety of the people absolutely required the confinement of factious leaders; and by the genius of the old constitution, the prince, of himself, was accustomed to assume every branch of prerogative, which was found necessary for the preservation of public peace and of his own authority. Expediency at other times would cover itself under the appearance of necessity; and in proportion as precedents multiplied, the will alone of the sovereign was sufficient to supply the place of expediency, of which be constituted himself the sole judge. In an age and nation where the power of a turbulent nobility prevailed, and where the king had no settled military force, the only means that could maintain public peace, was the exertion of such prompt and discretionary powers in the crown; and the spirit of the whole had become so imitative, that those ancient laws in favour of personal liberty, while often violated, had never been challenged or revived during the course of near three centuries. Though rebellious subjects had frequently, in the open field, resisted the king’s authority; no person had been found so bold, when confined and at mercy, as to set himself in opposition to regal power, and to claim the protection of the constitution against the will of the sovereign. It was not till this age, when the spirit of liberty was universally diffused, that the principles of government were nearly reduced to a system, when the tempers of men, more civilized, seemed less to require those violent exertions of prerogative, that these five gentlemen above mentioned, by a noble effort, ventured, in this national cause, to bring the question to a final determination. And the king was assuredly to observe, that a power exercised by his predecessors, almost without interruption, was found, upon trial, to be directly opposite to the clearest laws, and supported by few undoubted precedents in courts of judicature. These had scarcely, in any instance, refused bail upon commitments by special command of the king; cause the persons committed had seldom or never dared to demand it, at least to insist on their demand.

Sir Randall Crew, chief justice, had been nominated by the court: Sir Nicholas Lyde, esteemed more obsequious, had obtained that high office: yet the judges, by his direction, went no further than to remand the gentleman to prison, and refuse the bail which was offered. h Heathie, the attorney-general, repeatedly offered a sentence of the judges in the 34th of Elizabeth, i should enter a general judgment, that no bail could be granted upon a commitment by the king or council. j But the judges wisely declined a decision, which might have rendered the last degree exasperated. In the present disposition of men’s minds, universal complaints prevailed, as if the kingdom were reduced to slavery. And the most invincible prerogative of the crown, it was said, that of imprisoning the subject, is here openly and solemnly, and in numerous instances, exercised for the most invidious purpose: in order to extort loans, or rather subsidies, without consent of parliament.

But this was not the only hardship of which the nation then thought they had reason to complain. The army, which had made the fruitless expedition to Cadiz, was dispersed throughout the kingdom; and money was levied upon whatever was capable of being taxed, for the maintenance of their quinquennial service. k The soldiers were billeted upon private houses, contrary to custom, which required that, in all ordinary cases, they should be quartered in inns and public-houses. l Those who had refused or delayed the loans, were sure to be loaded with a great number of these dangerous and disorderly guests.

Many too, of low condition, who had shown a refractory disposition, were pressed into the service, and enlisted in the fleet or army. m Sir Peter Haxman, for the same reason, was despatched on an errand to the palatinate. n Glanville, an eminent lawyer, had been obliged, during the former period of parliament, to accept of an office in the navy. o The soldiers, ill paid and undisciplined, committed many crimes and outrages, and much increased the public discourses of disorder, martial law, so requisite to the support of discipline, which was felt in every part of the kingdom. By a contradiction, which is natural when the people are exasperated, the outrages of the army were complained of; the remedy was thought still more intolerable. p Though the expediency, if we are not to rather say the necessity, of martial law had formerly been deemed, of itself, a sufficient ground for establishing it; men, now become more jealous of liberty, and more refined reasons in questions of government, regarded as illegal and arbitrary, every exercise of authority which was not supported by express statute or uninterrupted precedent.

It may safely be affirmed, that, except a few courtiers or ecclesiastics, all men were displeased with this high exercise of prerogative, and that the reign of administration.

The most ancient prerogatives were pleaded in favour of the king's measures; a considerable difference, upon comparison, was observed between the cases. Acts of power, however irregular, might casually, and at intervals, be exercised; but the power of constant and uninterrupted exertion of arbitrary rule, and yet liberty still subsist in some tolerable degree under his administration. But where all these were reduced into a system, were exerted without interruption, were studiously sought for, in order to supply the places of laws, and subdue the refractory spirit of the nation, it was necessary to find some speedy remedy, or finally to abandon all hopes of preserving the freedom of the constitution. Nor did many of these men esteem the prerogation which the king had received, though great, sufficient to warrant all these violent measures. The Commons, as yet, had nowhere invaded his authority: they had only exercised, as best pleased themselves, the power to tax. It was because he had been in one House of Parliament had he met with hardihood, and indolent treatment, to make in revenue an invasion on the rights and liberties of the whole nation.

But generally, a bold man is the most generous of all men, when Judas, baffled in every attempt against the Austrian dominions, emboldened with his own subjects, supplied with any treasure but what he extorted by the most invidious and most dangerous measures; as if the half of Europe, now ruled by young princes, Philip, Louis, and Charles, who were nearly of the same age, and who had resigned the government of themselves, and of their kingdoms, to their creatures and ministers, Olivarez, Richelieu, and Buckingham, were not in the first instance, nor in the second, willing to leave the inheritance to their children, and the genius of their princes would have allowed to remain for ever in tranquillity, were strongly agitated by the emulation and jealousy of the ministers. Above all, the towering spirit of Richelieu, incapable of rest, promised as active age, and gave indications of great revolutions throughout all Europe.

This man had no sooner, by supplication and intrigue, gotten possession of the reins of government, than he formed at once three mighty projects; to subdue the turbulent spirits of the great, to reduce the rebellious hugonots, and to curb the encroaching power of the house of Austria. Undoubted and irrefragable, prudent and active, he braved all dangers, and used all means to restrain the French princes and nobles in the prosecution of his vengeance; he discovered and dissipated all their secret cabals and conspiracies. His sovereign himself he held in subjection, while he exalted the throne. Then, their while, he kept fearfully by the sword, by means of his administration, learning, order, discipline, and renown. That confused and inaccurate genius of government, of which France partook in common with other European nations, was only necessary at the very time when the incapacity of Buckingham encouraged the free spirit of the Commons to establish in England a regular system of liberty.

The correspondence between these ministers, Buckingham had entertained a mighty jealousy against Richelieu; a jealousy not founded on rivalship of power and politics, but of love and gallantry; where the duke was as much superior to the cardinal, as he was inferior in every other particular.

At the time when Charles married by proxy the Princess Henrietta, the Duke of Buckingham had been sent to France, in order to grace the nuptials, and conduct the new queen into England. The eyes of the French court were directed by curiosity towards that man, who had enjoyed the unlimited favours of the monarchs, and, lastly, from a private station, had mounted, in the earliest youth, to the absolute government of three kingdoms. The beauty of his person, the gracefulness of his air, the splendour of his equipage, his fine taste in dress, festivals, and entertainments, corresponded to the expectations entertained in his favour: the affability of his behaviour, the gaiety of his manners, the magnificence of his expense, increased still further the general admiration which was paid him. All business being already concert to the tune of sight in a situation where he was perfectly qualified to excel. But his great success at Paris proved as fatal as from his former failure at Madrid. Encouraged by the smiles of the court, he dared to carry his ambitious addresses to the queen herself; and he failed not to make impression on her by his artifice.

In the entirely disposed to the gaiety and gaiety. The cardinal's disappointment strongly inclined him to counterwork the amorous projects of his rival. When the duke was making preparations for a new embassy to Paris, a message was sent him from Louis, that he must not think of such a journey. In a romantic passion he swore, That he would see the queen in spite of all the power of France; and, from that moment, he determined to engage England in a war with that kingdom.

He first took advantage of some quarrels excited by the Queen of England's ambassadors, and, by a convention between the two countries, arranged for the dismissal at once all her French servants, contrary to the articles of the marriage treaty. He encouraged the English ships of war and privateers to seize vessels belonging to French merchants; and these he forsook with considerable prizes, by a sentence of the court of admiralty. But finding that all these injuries produced only remonstrances and embassies, or at most reprisals, on the part of France, he resolved to second the intrigues of the Duke of Soubré, and to undertake at once a military expedition against that kingdom.

Soubré, who, with his brother the Duke of Rohan, was the leader of the hugonot faction, was at that time in England, and strongly solicited Charles in embrace of protection of these distressed religious. He represented, that after the inhabitants of Rochelle had been repressed by the combined squadrons of England and Holland, after a war was concluded with the French king, under Charles's mediation, the ambitious cardinal was still meditating the destruction of the hugonots; that preparations were silently making in every province of France for the suppression of their religion; that the people of England were distressed at the news of the suppression at Rochelle, the most considerable bulwark of the Protestants; that the reformed in France cast their eyes on Charles as the head of their faith, and considered him as a prince engaged for their interest, as an object of their devotion; that, so long as their party subsisted, Charles might rely on their attachment as much as on that of his own subjects; but if their liberties were once ravished from them, the power of France, freed from this impediment, would soon become formidable to England, and to all the neighbouring states.

Though Charles probably bore but small favour to the hugonots, who so much resembled the puritans in discipline and worship, to religion and politics, he yet allowed himself to be guided by these arguments, enforced by the solicitations of Buckingham. A fleet of a hundred sail, and an army of 7000 men, were fitted out for the invasion of France, and both of them intrusted to the command of the duke, who was altogether unacquainted both with land and sea service. The fleet appeared before Rochelle; but so ill concerted were Buckingham's measures, that the inhabitants of that city shut their gates, and refused to admit others, who appeared they were to capture them. The fleet was dispersed; and all his military operations showed equal inactivity and inexpertise. Instead of attacking Oleron, a fertile island and defenceless, he bent his course to the Isle of Rée, which was well provisioned and fortified: having landed his men, though with some loss, he followed not the blow, but allowed Torres, the French governor, five days respite; during which St. Martin was victualled and provoked for a siege. He left behind the small fort of Prée, which could at first have made no manner of resistance: though resolved to starve St. Martin, he guarded the sea negligently, and allowed provisions and ammunition to be thrown into it: despairing of gaining by the way, he attacked it without having made any breach, and rashly threw away the lives of the soldiers: having found that a French army had stolen over in small divisions, and had landed at Prée, the fort which he had at first overlooked, he began to think of a retreat; but made it so unskillfully, that it was equivalent to a total rout: he was the last of the army that embarked; and he returned to England, having lost two of his demi-brigades, totally disconcerted by his own admiral and a general; and bringing no praise with him, but the vulgar one of courage and personal bravery.

The Duke of Rothes, who had taken arms as soon as Buckingham did, was forbidden to assemble his followers, and discovered the danger of the sect, without being able to do any mischief: the inhabitants of Rochelle, who had at last been induced to join the English, hastened the vengeance of their master, exhausted the last resources in supplying their allies, and were threatened with an immediate siege. Such were the fruits of Buckingham's expedition against France.

CHAP. LI.

A. D. 1627.

There was reason to apprehend some disorder or insurrection, from the discontent which prevailed among the people in England. Their liberties, they believed, were ravished from them; illegal taxes extorted; their commerce, which had met with a severe check from the Spanish, was totally annihilated by the French war: those military honours transmitted to them from their ancestors had received a grievous strain, by two unsuccessful and ill-conducted expeditions; scarce an illustrious family but mourned, from the last of them, the loss of a son or brother: greater calamities were dreaded from the war with these powerful monarchies, concurring with the internal disorders under which the nation laboured. And these ills were ascribed, not to the refractory disposition of the two former parliaments, to which they were partly owing; but solely to Charles's obstinacy, in adhering to the counsels of Buckingham; a man nowise entitled by his birth, age, services, or merit, to that unlimited confidence reposed in him. To be sacrificed to the interests, policy, and ambition of the great, is so much the common lot of the people, that they may appear unreasonable who would pretend to complain of it: but to be the victim of the frivolous gallantry of a favourite, and of his boisterous caprices, seemed the object of peculiar indignation.

In the present period, it may be imagined that the duke dreaded above all things the assembling of a parliament: but so little foresight had they possessed in their entering schemes, that they found themselves under an absolute necessity to call it in. The expedition was now judged of money levied, or rather extorted, under colour of prerogative, had come in very slowly, and had left such ill-humour in the nation, that it appeared dangerous to renew the experiment of so unnecessary a supply; it was hoped it would engage the Commons to forget all past injuries; and having experienced the all effects of former obstinacy, they would probably assemble with a resolution of making some less expensive security. This argument was, in effect, concerted, by Sir Robert Cotton's advice, that Buckingham should be the first person that proposed in council the calling of a new parliament. Having laid in Third parliment stock of merit, he expected that all his former misdemeanours would be overlooked and forgiven; and that, instead of a tyrant and oppressor, he should be regarded as the first patriot in the nation.

The views of the popular hall were much more judicious and profoud. When the Commons assembled, they appeared to be men of the same independent spirit with their predecessors, and possessed of so much riches, that their property was computed to be sufficient for the purpose of the war. Both houses were deputed by boroughs and counties, inflamed all of them by the late violations of liberty; many of the members themselves had been cast into prison, and had suffered by the measures of the court; and all the circumstances, which might prompt them to embrace violent resolutions, they entered upon business with perfect temper and decorum. They considered, that the king, disgusted with these squabbles, would be farther satisfied, if his way should not do their duties, in contributing to the necessities of the state, he must, in discharge of his conscience, use those other means which God had put into his hands, and the publick purse. The king's subject, by the Speaker, thus adjourned, "This way of parliamentary supplies, as his majesty told you, he hath chosen, not as the only way, but as the fittest; not because he is destitute of others, but because it is most agreeable to the goodness of those most gracious dispositions, and to the desire and weal of his people. If this be deferred, necessity and the sword of the enemy make way for the others. Remember his majesty's admonition; I say, remember it." From these solemn words, the Commons foresaw that if the least hand were afforded, the king would immediately dissolve them, and would thenceforward deem himself justified for violating, in a manner still more open, all the ancient forms of the constitution. No remedy could then be looked for, but from insurrections and civil war, of which the issue would be extremely uncertain, and which must, in all events, prove calamitous to the nation. To correct the late disorders in the administration, he required some new laws, which would, no doubt, appear hard to a prince so enamoured of his prerogative; and it was requisite to temper, by the decency and moderation of their debates, the rigour which must necessarily attend their discussion. Nothing was higher a idea of the capacity of those men who now guided the Commons, and of the great authority which they had acquired, than the forming and executing of so judicious and so necessary a plan of operation.

The decency, however, which the popular leaders had prescribed to themselves, and recommended to others, hindered them not from making the loudest and most vigorous complaints against the grievances under which the nation had lately laboured. Sir Francis Seymour said, "This is the great council of the kingdom, and here with certainty, if not heretofore, his majesty may see, as in a true glass, the state of the kingdom." We are called hither by his writ, in order to give him faithful counsel, such as may stand with his honour: and thus we must do, without flatery. Let us not act like Cambyses's judges, who, when their approbation was demanded by the prince to some illegal measure, said that though there was a written letter, he would not give his consent, as if it were their own end and pleasure. This was base flattery, fitter for our reproof than our imitation; and as far, so flattery, take away the judgment. For my part, I shall shun both; and speak my mind with as much duty as any man to his majesty, without neglecting the public.

But how can we express our affections, while we retain our fears; or speak of giving, till we know whether we have anything to give! For if his majesty may be persuaded to take what he will, what need we give?

"That this hath been done, appear by the billeting of soldiers, a thing nowise advantageous to the king's service, and a burden to the commonwealth; and by the commission of illegal seizures of goods. But if they had done the contrary for fear, had been as blamable as the projectors of that oppressive measure. To countenance these proceedings, hath it not been preached in the pulpit, or rather stated, that all these goods are to be taken from him, and his goods to be taken from him against his will, and his liberty against the laws of the kingdom. By opposing these practices, we shall but tread in the steps of our forefathers, who still preferred the peace of their private interest, any, before their very lives. It will in us be a wrong done to ourselves, to our posterity, to our consciences, if we forego this claim and pretense."

"read of a custom," said Sir Robert Philips, "among the other nations, that, once every year, they held a solemn festival, in which their slaves had liberty, without exception, to speak what they pleased, in order to ease their afflicted minds, and, on the conclusion of the festival, the slaves were discharged and given their liberty, with guilds, at the expense of the late owners."

"This institution may, with some distinction, well set forth our present state and condition. After the revolution of some time, and the grievous sufferance of many violent oppressions, we have now, at last, as slaves to those slaves, obtained, for a day, some liberty of speech: but shall not I, trust, be hereafter slaves: for we are born free. Yet what new illegal burdens our estates and persons have grown under, my heart yearns to think of, my tongue failers to utter.

"The grievances, by which we are oppressed, I draw under two heads; acts of power against law, and the judgments of lawyers against our liberty.

"Our liberties, and judgments, passed within his memory; that by which the Scots, born after James's accession, were admitted to all the privileges of English subjects; that by which the new impositions had been warranted, and the customs, the illegal few impositions were authorized; he thus proceeded:

"I can live, though another, who has no right, be put to live along with me; nay, I can live, though burdened with impositions, beyond what is present at present I those slaves; but to have my liberty, which is the soul of my life, ransacked from me; to have my person put up in a jail, without relief by law, and to be so adjudged,—O, impious ancestors! O, unwise forefathers! I be so curious in providing for the quiet possession of our lands, and the liberties of parliament; and, at the same time, to neglect our personal liberty, and let us lie in prison, and that during pleasure, without redress or remedy! If this be law, why do we talk of liberties! Why trouble ourselves with disputes about a constitution, franchises, property of goods, and the like? What may any man call his own, if not the liberty of his person?

"I am weary of reading these ways; and therefore conclude to have power of a committee, in order to frame a petition to his majesty for redress of these grievances. And this petition being read, examined, and approved, may be delivered to the king, of whose gracious answer we have no cause to fear. For no man has a reasonable expectation of so moderate, so reasonable, our intentions so loyal, and the manner so dutiful. Neither need we fear, that this is the critical parliament, as has been insinuated; or that this is the way to distraction; but assure ourselves of a happy issue. Then shall the king, as he calls us his great council, find us his true council, and own us his good council." benevolences, taxes without consent of parliament, arbitrary imprisonments, the billeting of soldiers, martial law; these were the grievances complained of, and against these an eternal remedy was to be provided. The Commons pretended not, as they affirmed, to any unusual powers or privileges; they aimed only at securing those which had been transmitted from their ancestors: and their law they Petition of Right, resolved to call a Petition of Right; as Summons of some sort. The Commons in a declaration or explanation of the ancient constitution, not any infringement of royal prerogative, or acquisition of new liberties.

While the committee was engaged in framing the petition, the favourites of each party, both in parliament and throughout the nation, were engaged in disputes about this bill, which, in all likelihood, was to form a memorable era in the English government.

That these statutes, and the particulars of the Commons, which secure English liberty, are not become obsolete, appears hence, that the English have ever been free, and have ever been governed by law and a limited constitution. Privileges in particular, which are founded on the Great Charter, must always remain in force, because derived from a source of never-failing authority; regarded in all ages as the most sacred contract between king and people. Such a charter was paid to the charter by their ancestors, that they got the confirmation of it reiterated thirty several times; and even secured it by a rule, which, though visibly received, seems in the execution impracticable. They have established it as a maxim, To be shot dead in a cottage, to be executed by a justice of the peace, to any article of that charter, cannot have force or validity. But, with regard to that important article which secures personal liberty, so far from attempting, at any time, any lessening of it, they have enacted, by capitulations, statutes, and put it out of all doubt and controversy. If in practice it has often been violated, abuses can never come in the place of rules; nor can any rights or legal privileges be extinguished by statute. A free monarchy in which every individual is a slave, is a glaring contradiction; and it is requisite, where the laws assign privileges to the different orders of the state, that it likewise secure the independence of the members. If any difference could be made in this particular, it was better to abandon even life or property to the arbitrary will of the prince; nor would such immediate danger ensue, from that concession, to the laws and to the privileges of the people. To because of his life a man may suffer any legal trial or execution of tyranny, that it must at once shock the national humanity of princes, and convey an alarm throughout the whole commonwealth. To confiscate a man's fortune, besides its being a most atrocious abuse of violence, exposes the monarch to much to the imputation of avarice and rapacity, that it will seldom be attempted in any civilized government. But confinement, though a less striking, is no less severe, a punishment; nor is there any spirit so erect and independent, as not to be broken by the long continuance of the silent and ignominious sufferings of a jail. The power of imprisonment, therefore, being the most natural and potent engine of arbitrary government, is necessarily necessary to remove it from a government which is free and legal.

The partisans of the court reasoned after a different manner. The true rule of government, said they, during any period, is that to which the people, from time immemorial, have been accustomed, and to which they naturally pay a prompt obedience. A practice which has ever struck their senses, and of which they have seen and heard innumerable precedents, has authority with them much superior to that which attends maxims derived from antiquated statutes and mouldy records. In vain do the lawyers establish it as a principle, that a statute can never be altered by the hand of posterity; in vain the Commons Resolved to alter a contrary statute; while they pretend to institute an axiom peculiar to English jurisprudence, they violate the most established principles of human nature; and even, by necessary consequence, reason in contradiction to itself, which they would represent as so sacred and inviolable. A law, to have any authority, must be derived from a legislature which has right. And whence do all legislatures derive their right but from long custom and established practice? If a statute contrary to public good be passed by them, and is governed to, either from the violence of faction or the inexperience of senators and princes, it cannot be more effectually abrogated, than by a trun of contrary precedents, which prove, that, by common consent, it has tacitly been set aside as inconvenient and impracticable. Such has been the case with all those statutes enacted during turbulent times in order to limit royal prerogative, and cramp the sovereign in his protection of the public, and his execution of the laws. But above all branches, previously voted and enacted, which is most necessary to be preserved, is the power of imprisonment. Faction and discontent, like diseases, frequently arise in every political body; and during these disorders, it is by the salutary executive alone of this discretionary power, that rebellions and civil wars can be prevented. To circumscribe this power is to destroy its nature: entirely to abrogate it, is impracticable; and the attempts itself to abrogate it are dangerous. The Supreme magistrate, in critical and turbulent times, will never, agreeably either to prudence or duty, allow the state to perish, while there remains a remedy, which, though irregular soever, is still in his power to apply. Such a man as the king, when he employs any exercis of power condemned by recent and express statute, bow greedily, in such dangerous times, will fictious leaders seize this pretence of throwing on his government, and making it answerable to the Commons. Were the alternative quite necessary, it were surely much better for human society to be deprived of liberty than to be destitute of government.

Importance of the subject from this statute. But, unless, that this subject is not, on both sides, without its difficulties. Where a general and rigid law is enacted against arbitrary imprisonment, it would appear, that government cannot, in times of sedition and faction, be conducted but by temporizing, which is most necessary to be preserved, is the power of imprisonment. property and liberty are as entire at present as during any former period of the English government; that in all common cases, the common law ought to be the standard of proceedings: And in case, that, for the security of his pleased in secret that all their solicitations had been eluded by the Commons, quickly passed the petition without any material alteration; and nothing but the royal assent was wanting to give the force of law to the act. The king accordingly came to the House of Peers; sent for the Commons; and being seated in his chair of state, the petition was read to him. Great was now the astonishment of all men, when, instead of the usual concise and clear manner by which he had hitherto received petitions, Charles said, in answer to the petition, “The king willfully, that right be done according to the laws and customs of the realm, and that the statutes be put into execution; that his subjects may have no cause to complain of wrong, or oppression, contrary to their just rights and liberties, to the preservation whereof he holds himself in advantage as much obliged as of his own prerogative.”

It is surprising that Charles, who had seen so many instances of the jealousy of the Commons, who had himself so much roused that jealousy by his frequent evasive messages during this session, could imagine that they would rest satisfied with an answer so vague and undetermined. It was evident, that the unusual form alone of the answer must excite their attention; that the disputation must inflame their anger; and that therefore it was necessary, as the petition seemed to bear hard on royal prerogative, to come early to the fixed resolution, either gracefully to comply with it, or courageously to reject it.

It happened as might have been foreseen. The Commons were in very ill humour. Usually, when in that disposition, their zeal for religion, and their enmity against the unfortunate catholics, ran extremely high. But they had already, in the beginning of the session, presented their petition of religion, and had received a satisfactory answer; though they expected that the execution of the laws against papists would, for the future, be no more exact and rigid than they had hitherto found it. To give vent to their present indignation, they fell with their utmost force on the excursion.

There is nothing which tends more to excuse, if not justify, the extreme rigour of the Commons towards Charles, than his open encouragement and avowal of such general principles as were altogether incompatible with a limited government. Manwaring had preached a sermon, which the Commons found, upon inquiry, to be printed by special command of the king; and, when this sermon was laid before them, contained doctrines subversive of all civil liberty. It taught, that though property was commonly lodged in the subject, yet, whenever any exigence required supply, all property was transferred to the sovereign; the present of property was not necessary for the imposition of taxes; and that the divine laws required compliance with every demand, how irregular soever, which the prince should make upon his subjects. For these doctrines the Commons impeached Manwaring.

The sentence, pronounced upon him by the Pals, was, that he should be imprisoned during the pleasure of the House, be fined a thousand pounds to the king, make submission and acknowledgment for his offence, be suspended during three years, be incapable of holding any ecclesiastical dignity or secular office, and that his book be called in and burned.

It may be worthy of notice, that so soon as the session ended, this man, so justly so odious to both Houses, received a pardon and was promoted to a living of considerable value. Some years after, he was raised to the see of St. Asaph. If the republican spirit of the Commons, beyond all the monarchical spirit of the court, this latter, carried to a high pitch, tended still further to augment the former.

And thus extremes were everywhere affected, and the just medium was gradually deserted by all men.

From Manwaring, the House of Commons proceeded to consider the petition of the Lords, and the force of all their and the Lords. As hitherto they had cautiously born to mention. In vain did the king send them a message, in which he told them, that the session was drawing near to a conclusion; and that they would not enter upon new business, but to the last adhesion to the government and ministry. Though the court endeavoured to explain and soften this message by a subsequent message; as Charles was apt hastily to correct any hasty step which he had taken; it may be seen by the conduct of the Commons: as if the method of their proceedings had here been prescribed to them. It was foreseen, that a great tempest was ready to burst on the duke; and in order to divert it, the king thought proper, upon a joint application of the Lords and Commons, to endeavour giving them satisfaction with regard to the petition of right. He came therefore to the House of Peers, and pronouncing the usual form of words, Let it be law as is declared. gave full sanction and authority to the petition. The acclamations with which the House resounded, and the universal joy diffused over the nation, showed how much this petition had been the object of all men’s views and expectations.

It may be seen by the fixed resolution, that the king’s assent to the petition of right produced such a change in the government, as was almost equivalent to a revolution; and by circumscribing, in so many articles, the royal prerogative, gave additional security to the liberties of the subject. Yet were the Commons far from being satisfied with this important concession. Their ill humour had been so much irritated by the king’s frequent evasive and evasive answers, that it could not be appeased by an assent, which he allowed to be so reluctantly extorted from him. Perhaps too the popular leaders, unpard and artful, saw the opportunity favourable; and, turning against the king those very weapons with which he had furnished them, resolved to pursue the victory. The bill, however, for five subsidies, which had been formerly voted, immediately passed the House; because the granting of that supply was, in a manner, tacitly contracted for, upon the royal assent to the petition; and had faith been here violated, no further confidence could have subsisted between king and parliament. Having made this concession, the Commons continued to carry their scrutiny into every part of government. In some particulars their industry was laudable; in some it may be liable to censure.

A little after writs were issued for summoning this parliament, the House of Commons elected Mr. Thomas Coventry, lord-keeper, the Earl of Marlborough, treasurer, the Earl of Manchester, president of the council, the Earl of Worcester, presi-ed, the Duke of Buckingham, high admiral, and all the considerable officers of the crown; in the whole thirty-three. By this commission, which, from the number of persons named in it, could be so secret, the commissioners were empowered to meet and to concert among themselves the methods of levying money by impositions, or otherwise: Where form and circumstance, as expressed in the commission, must be dispensed with, rather than the substance be lost or hazardous. In other words, this was a scheme for finding expedients, which might raise the prerogative to the greatest height, and render parliaments entirely useless. The Commons applied for cancelling the commission; and were, no doubt, desirous that all the world should conclude the king’s prerogative was extremely arbitrary, and should observe what little regard he was disposed to pay to the liberties and privileges of his people.
A commission had likewise been granted, and some money remitted, in order to raise a thousand German horse, and transport them into England. These were supposed to be in readiness, in order to support the projected insurrections or exercises; though the number seems insufficient for such a purpose: the House took notice of this design, in severe terms: and no measure, surely, could be projected more generally odious to the whole nation. It may, however, be said, that he had now, at last, fallen on the only effectual method for supporting his prerogative. But at the same time be should have been sensible, that, till provided with a sufficient military force, all his attempts, in opposition to the rising spirit of the nation, must, in the end, prove wholly fruitless; and that the higher he screwed up the springs of government, while he had so little real power to retain them in that forced situation, with more fatal violence must they fly out, when any accident occurred to restore them to their natural action.

The Commons next resumed their censure of Buckingham's conduct and behaviour, against whom they were implacable. They agreed to present a remonstrance to the king, in which they recapitulated all national grievances and misfortunes, and omitted no circumstance which could render the whole administration despicable and odious. They observed, in this sense, that it amounted to no less than a toleration, hateful to God, full of dishonour and disprofit to his majesty, and of extreme scandal and grief to his good people: they took notice of the many conductors of this policy, and the petition of right seems to have provided a sufficient remedy; they mentioned the decay of trade, the unsuccessful expeditions to Cadiz and the isle of Rhé, the encouragement given to Arminians, the commissaries for transporting German horse, that for levying illegal impositions; and all these grievances they ascribed solely to the ill conduct of the Duke of Buckingham. This remonstrance was, perhaps, not the less provoking to Charles, because it was a moment pulling at the very bow-string of the subject, they were preserved in it, as in most of the remonstrances of that age, an affected civility and submission in the language. And as it was the first return which he met with for his late beneficial concessions, and for his sacrifices of prerogative, the greatest by far ever made by an English sovereign, nothing could be more the object of just and natural indignation.

It was not with the grounds that the Commons were so fierce and assuming. Though they had already granted the king the supply of five subsidies, they still retained a pledge in their hands, which they thought insured them success in all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had been granted by Parliament, but the Commons had artfully, this session, concealed their intention of invading that branch of revenue, till the royal assent had been obtained to the petition of right, which they justly deemed of such importance. They then openly asserted, that the levying of tonnage and poundage, without consent of parliament, was a palpable violation of the ancient liberties of the people, and an open infringement of the Premises, petition of right, so lately granted.

The king, in order to prevent the finishing and presenting this remonstrance, came suddenly to the parliament, and ended this session by a prorogation.

The first fruit and issue from the embracement of this assembly, Charles began to look towards foreign wars, where all his efforts were equally unsuccessful, as in his domestic government. The Earl of Denbigh, brother-in-law to Buckingham, was despatched to the relief of Rocheste, now closely besieged by hand, and threatened with a blockade by sea: but he returned without effecting any thing; and having declined to attack the enemy's fleet, he brought on the English arms the imputation either of not wishing proper endeavours. In this state of things, however, the duke went to Portsmouth, where he had prepared a considerable fleet and army, on which all the subsidies given by parliament had been expended. This was a step the Commons never expected or suspected the king was likely to take. The Commons, therefore, at the same time, seized this decisive measure of the king's expectation. The same mutinous spirit which had so lately

House of Commons, had diffused itself over the nation; and the commissioners appointed for making the assessments, had conversed at all frauds which might diminish the supply, and to the king's revenues. This national discontent, communicated to a desperate enthusiast, soon broke out in an event, which may be considered as remarkable.

There was one Felton, of a good family, but of an ardent and melanchohlic temper, who had served under the duke in the station of lieutenant. His captain being killed, in the retreat at the isle of Rhé, Felton had applied for the company; and when disappointed, he threw up his commission, and retired in discontent from the army. While this private resentment was boiling in his sullen, unsociable mind, he heard the nation resound with complaints against the duke; and he met with the remonstrance of the Commons, in which his enemy was represented as the cause of every national grievance, and as the great enemy of the public. Religious fanaticism further inflamed these vindictive reflections; and he fancied that he should do Heaven acceptable service, if, at one blow, he dispatched this dangerous foe to religion and to his country.

From these dark views he secretly arrived at Portsmouth, at the same time with the duke, and watched for an opportunity of effecting his bloody purpose.

He engaged in conversation with Soubize, and other French gentlemen; and a difference of sentiment arising arose, the dispute, though conducted with temper and decency, had produced some heat; and the petitioner of right seems to have provided a sufficient remedy; they mentioned the decay of trade, the unsuccessful expeditions to Cadiz and the isle of Rhé, the encouragement given to Arminians, the commissaries for transporting German horse, that for levying illegal impositions; and all these grievances they ascribed solely to the ill conduct of the Duke of Buckingham. This remonstrance was, perhaps, not the less provoking to Charles, because it was a moment pulling at the very bow-string of the subject, they were preserved in it, as in most of the remonstrances of that age, an affected civility and submission in the language. And as it was the first return which he met with for his late beneficial concessions, and for his sacrifices of prerogative, the greatest by far ever made by an English sovereign, nothing could be more the object of just and natural indignation.

It was not with the grounds that the Commons were so fierce and assuming. Though they had already granted the king the supply of five subsidies, they still retained a pledge in their hands, which they thought insured them success in all their applications. Tonnage and poundage had been granted by Parliament, but the Commons had artfully, this session, concealed their intention of invading that branch of revenue, till the royal assent had been obtained to the petition of right, which they justly deemed of such importance. They then openly asserted, that the levying of tonnage and poundage, without consent of parliament, was a palpable violation of the ancient liberties of the people, and an open infringement of the
that they needed not to trouble themselves in that inquiry; that no man living had credit enough with him to have disposed him to such an action; that he had not even intrusted his purpose to any one; that the resolution proceeded only from himself, and the impulse of his own conscience; and that his motives would appear, if his hat were found; for that believing he should perish in the midst of his friends, he went by the shortest way to them.5

When the king was informed of this assassination, he received the news in public with an unmoved and undisturbed countenance; and the courtiers, who studied his looks, concluded, that secretly he was not displeased to be rid of a man who was generally odious to the nation.1 But Charles's command of himself proceeded entirely from the gravity and composure of his temper. He was still, as much as ever, attached to his favourite; and during his whole life, he retained on leave for Buckingham's friends, and a prejudice against his enemies. He urged too, that Felton should be put to the question, in order to extort from him a discovery of his accomplices but the judges declared, that though that practice had formerly been very usual, it was altogether illegal. So much more exact reasoners, with regard to law, had they become, from the jealous scruples of the House of Commons.

Meanwhile the distress of Rochelle had risen to the utmost extremity. That vast genius of Richelieu, who made him form the greatest enterprises, led him to attempt their execution by means equally great and extraordinary. To deprive the king of all succours, he had dared to project the throwing across the harbour a mole of a mile's extent in that boisterous ocean; and having executed his project, he now held the town closely blockaded on all sides. The inhabitants, though pressed with the greatest exigencies of famine, still refused to submit; being supported partly by the lectures of their zealous preachers, partly by the daily hopes of relief from England. After Buckingham's death, the command of the fleet was transferred to the Earl of Lindsey, who, arriving before Rochelle, made some attempts to break through the mole, and force his way into the harbour: but by the delays of the English, that work was not fully finished and fortified; and the judges declared, that though that practice had formerly been very usual, it was altogether illegal. So much more exact reasoners, with regard to law, had they become, from the jealous scruples of the House of Commons.

This was the first necessary step towards the prosperity of France. Foreign enemies, as well as domestic factions, being deprived of this resource, that kingdom began now to enjoy its full splendour, and the publication, even of wise plans, both of war and policy, it gradually gained an ascendant over the rival power of Spain; and every order of the state, and every sect, were reduced to pay subscription to the lawful authority of the sovereign. The victory, however, over the hugonots, was at first pushed by the French king with great moderation. A toleration was still continued to them; and the only arroged and open incitement which, at that time, was granted in any European kingdom.

The failure of an enterprise, in which the English nation, from religious sympathy, so much interested themselves, could not but diminish the king's authority in the parliament during the approaching session; but the Commons, when assembled, found many other causes of complaint to be of a more weighty nature. Buckingham's conduct and character, with some had afforded a reason, with others a pretense, for discontent against public measures: but after his death, there wanted not new reasons and new pretences for general dissatisfaction. Manœuvring the pardon and promotion were taken notice of; still, the marriage of the Coeuris, two clergyman, who, for like reasons, were not less obnoxious to the Commons, had met with like favour from the king: Montague, who had been censured for months before, the crown had been created Bishop of Chichester. They found, likewise, upon inquiry, that all the copies of the petition of right, which were dispersed, had by the king's orders annexed to them the first answer, which had given so little satisfaction to the Commons. An expedition by which Charles endeavoured to persuade the people that he had nowise receded from his former claims and pretensions, particularly with regard to the levying of tonnage and poundage, was taken credit from them.6

The great article on which the House Towneley and of Commons broke with the king, and which was完全是[?] finally created in Charles a disgust to all parliaments, was their claim with regard to tonnage and poundage. On this occasion, therefore, it is necessary to give an account of the controversy.

The duty of tonnage and poundage, in more ancient times, had been commonly a temporary grant of parliament; but it had been conferred on Henry V. and all the succeeding parliaments, during long periods, in order to maintain a naval force for the defence of the kingdom. The necessity of levying this duty had been so apparent, that each king had ever claimed it from the moment of his accession, and had been compelled to accept of it, or else to make up the deficiency, by levying taxes, or by the imposition of heavy duties. It was, however, usually, by vote, conferred on the prince who they found him already in possession of. Agreeably to the inaccurate genius of the old constitution, this abuse, however considerable, had never been perceived nor remedied; though nothing could be of more advantage for the parliament than to prevent the king from having this power. But contrivances of that nature were not thought of during those rude ages: and so complicated and jealous a government as the English cannot subsist without many such refinements; it is impossible to see how favourable every inaccuracy must formerly have proved to royal authority, which on all emergencies was obliged to supply, by discretionary power, the great deficiency of the laws.

The parliament did not grant the duty of tonnage and poundage to Henry VIII. till the sixth of his reign: yet this prince, who had not then raised his power to its greatest height, continued, during that whole time, to levy the imposition. A Parliament, by a steady refusal, to all the demands of merchants who had neglected to make payment to the crown; and though one expression of that bill may seem ambiguous, they employ the plainest terms in calling tonnage and poundage the king's due, even before that duty was granted on him by parliamentary authority.6 Four reigns, and above a whole century, had since elapsed; and this revenue had still been levied before it was voted by parliament. So long had the inaccuracy continued, without being remarked or corrected.

During that short interval which passed between Charles's accession and his first parliament, he had followed the example of his predecessors; and no fault was found with his conduct in this particular. But what was most remarkable in the proceedings of that House of Commons, and what proved beyond controversy that they had seriously formed an opinion favorable to the subject, was, that instead of granting this supply during the king's life-time, as it had been enjoyed by all his immediate predecessors, they voted it only for a year; and, after that should be elapsed, reserved to themselves the power of renewing it, or of renewing the same subscription. But the House of Peers, who saw that this duty was now become more necessary than ever to supply the growing necessities of the crown, and who did not approve of this enervating example, did not grant the dissolution of that parliament followed so soon after, gration it had been the enabling of the king to guard the seas, it did not follow, that because he guarded the seas, he was therefore entitled to this revenue without further formality: since the people had still reserved to themselves the right of judging how far that service merited such a supply. But Charles, notwithstanding his public declaration, was far from assenting to this conclusion in its full extent. The plain consequence, he saw, of all these rigours, and refinements, and inferences, was, that he, without a new grant, ought to have the full and entire revenue of his own, must, of a sudden, even from his accession, become a magistrate of a very different nature from any of his predecessors, and must fall into a total dependence on subjects over whom he had related, put an end, for the time, to their further pretensions.

The following interval between the second and third parliament was distinguished by so many exertions of prerogative, that men had little leisure to attend to the affair of tonnage and poundage, where the abuse of power in the crown might seem to be of a more disputable nature. But after the Commons, during the preceding session, had remedied all these grievances by means of their petition of right, which they deemed so necessary; they afterwards proceeded to take the matter into consideration, and they showed the same intention as formerly. By this means, and on the part of the revenue, very large compliances on the part of the crown. Their sudden prorogation prevented them from bringing their pretensions to a full conclusion.

When Charles opened this session, he had foreseen that such an interest might arise; and he therefore took care, very early, among many mild and reconciling expressions, to inform the Commons, 'That he had not taken these duties as appertaining to his hereditary prerogative; but that it ever was, and still is, his meaning to enjoy them as a gift of his people; and that, if he had hitherto levied tonnage and poundage, he pretended to justify himself only by the necessity of so doing, not by any prerogative of his own.' This concession, which he probably made from the king's moderate temper, now freed from the impulse of Buckingham's violent counsels, might have satisfied the Commons, had they entertained no other view than that of ascertaining their own powers and privileges. But they carried their pretensions much higher. They insisted as a necessary preliminary, that the king should once entirely desist from levying these duties, and that he should take it into consideration, how far he would restore them to the possession of a revenue, of which he had clearly divested himself. But, besides that this extreme rigour had never been exercised towards any of his predecessors, and many obvious inconveniences attended such a course of action; and besides the customs; there were other reasons which deterred Charles from complying with so hard a condition. It was probable that the Commons might renew their former project of making this revenue only temporary, and thereby reducing his prerogative to perpetual dependence; they certainly would cut off the new impositions which Mary and Elizabeth, but especially James, had levied, and which formed no despisable part of the public revenue; and they openly declared, that they had at present many important pretensions, chiefly with regard to religion; and if compliance were refused, no supply must be expected from the Commons.

It is easy to see what an insurmountable labyrinth Charles was now involved. By his own concessions, by the general principles of the English government, and by the force of example, in which he had treated this duty, tonnage and poundage was derived entirely from the free gift of the people; and, consequently, might be withdrawn at their pleasure. If unreasonable in their refusal, they still refused nothing but what was their due. If public necessity required it, it must be thought also to require the king's compliance with those conditions which were the price of obtaining it. Though the motive for they still lay under the reproof of innovation and heresy. The Commons now levelled against them their formidable censures, and made them the objects of daily invective and declamation. Their protectors were stigmatized; their tenets canvassed; their views represented as dangerous and pernicious. To the impartial spectators sure in any such had been at that time in England, it must have given great entertainment, to see a popular assembly, inflamed with faction and enthusiasm, pretend to discuss questions to which the greatest philosophers, in the tranquility of retrenchment, had never hitherto been able to find any satisfactory solution.

Among that complication of disputes in which men were involved, there was a spectacle to be observed, that the apellation puritan stood for three parties, which, though commonly united, were yet actuated by very different views and motives. There were the political puritans, who maintained the highest principles of civil liberty; the puritans in discipline, who were all supposed to be tainted with the ceremonies and episcopal government of the church; and the doctrinal puritans, who rigidly defended the speculative system of the first reformers. In opposition to all these, stood the court party, the hierarchy, and the antipapists; men only with this distinction, that the latter sect, being introduced a few years before, did not, as yet, comprehend all those who were favourable to the church and to monarchy. But, as these parties on every subject dailywarmed, men united themselves more intimately with their friends, and separated themselves wider from their antagonists; and the distinction gradually became quite uniform and regular.

The inquiries and debates concerning tonnage and poundage went hand in hand with these theological or metaphysical controversies. The officers of the customs-house were supposed to be the ministers of the preachers, built during the reigns of James and Charles, and even of Elizabeth, was much governed by the puritanical party, thought that they could not better serve their cause than by branding and punishing the Arminian sect, which, introducing an innovation in the church, were the least favoured and least powerful of all their antagonists. From this measure, it was easily foreseen, that, besides gratifying the animosity of the doctrinal puritans, both the puritans in discipline, and those in politics, would reap considerable advantages. Land, Neile, Montague, and other bishops, who were the chief supporters of episcopal government, and the most zealous partisans of the discipline and ceremonies of the church, were all supposed to be tainted with Arminianism. The same men and their disciples were the strenuous preachers of passive obedience, and of entire submission to princes; and if these could once be convinced that the court was right, it was concluded, that the hierarchy would receive a mortal blow, the ceremonies be less rigorously insisted on, and the king, deprived of his most faithful friends, be obliged to abate those high claims of prerogative, on which at present he insisted.

But Charles, besides a view of the political consequences which must result from a compliance with such pretensions, was strongly determined, from principles of piety and conscience, to oppose them. Neither the dissipation incident to youth, nor the pleasures attending a high fortune, had been able to prevent this virtuous prince from embracing the most sincere sentiments of religion; and that character which, in that religious age, should have been of infinite advantage to him, proved in the end the chief cause of his ruin: merely because the religion adopted by him, was not of that precise mode and sect which his ancestors had followed. His piety, though remote from popery, had a tincture of superstition in it; and, being averse to the gloomy spirit of the puritans, was represented by them as tending towards the abominations of antichrist. Laud also had unfortunately acquired a great excedent over him; and as all those prelates, obnoxious to the Commons, were regarded as his chief friends and most favourite courtiers, he was resolved not to disarm and dishonour himself, by abandoning them to the resentment of his enemies. Being totally unpro-vided with military force, and finding a refractory independent spirit to prevail among the people; the most solid basis of his authority, he thought, consisted in the support which he received from the hierarchy.

In the debates of the Commons, which are transmitted to us, it is remarkable to observe that sparks of that enthusiastic fire, which afterwards set the whole nation in combustion. One House made use of an illustration, which, though familiar, seems to have been borrowed from the writings of Lord Bacon. 1. If a dog alone, said he, the dog is fearful, though ever so fierce by nature: but if the dog have his master with him, he will set upon that man from whom he fled before. This shows, he continued, that he has been by higher, increase in courage and strength: and certainly man, being backed with Omnipotency, is a kind of omnipotent creature. All things are possible to him that believes, and where all things are possible, there is a kind of omnipotence. Wherefore, let it be the unanimous consent and resolution of all us, to make a vow and covenant henceforth to hold fast our God and our religion; and then shall we henceforth expect with certainty happiness in this world. 2. Oliver Cromwell, at that time, by some report or no account in the nation, is mentioned in these debates as complaining of one, who, he was told, preached flat popery. 3. It is amusing to observe the first words of this satirical reproof corresponding with the character of the querist who, by some report or no account in the nation, is mentioned in these debates as complaining of one, who, he was told, preached flat popery.

The inquiries and debates concerning tonnage and poundage went hand in hand with these theological or metaphysical controversies. The officers of the custom-house were supposed to be the ministers of the preachers, and the tonnage and poundage were viewed as a punishment inflicted by the crown in order to the entertainment, if not the ruin, of those who, by some report or no account in the nation, are supposed to have suffered, or to have suffered, by the crown, at that time.

to prison, on account of the last tumult in the House, which was called sedition. With great difficulty, and after several delays, they were released; and the law was generally supposed to be wrested, in order to prolong their imprisonment. Sir John Elliot, Hollis, and Valentine, were summoned to their trial in the king's bench, for seditious speeches and behaviour in parliament; but refusing to answer before an inferior court for their conduct as members of the house, they were imprisoned during the king's pleasure, to find sureties for their good behaviour, and to be bailed, the two former a thousand pounds a piece, the latter five hundred. This sentence, procured by the influence of the crown, served only for the purpose of rendering the seat of parliament, and to acquire an immense stock of popularity to the sufferers, who had so bravely, in opposition to arbitrary power, defended the liberties of their native country. The Commons of England, though an immense body, and possessed of the greater part of national property, were naturally somewhat defenceless; because of their personal equality, and their want of leaders: but the king's severity, if these prosecutions deserve the name, here pointed out leaders to them whose resentiment was inflamed, and whose courage was nowise daunted by the hardships which they had undergone in so honourable a cause.

So much did these prisoners glory in their sufferings, that though they were promised liberty on that condition, they would not condescend even to present a petition to the king, expressing their sorrow for having offended him. They unanimously refused to find sureties for their good behaviour, and were not disposed to submit to such easy terms. Nay, Hollis so industrious to continue his meritorious distress, that, when one offered to bail him, he would not yield to the rule of court, and be himself bound with his friends. Even Long, who had actually found sureties in the chief justice's chamber, declared in court, that his sureties should no longer continue. Yet because Sir John Elliot happened to die while in custody, a great suspicion was raised against the administration; and he was universally regarded as a martyr to the liberties of England.

A.D. 1629.

There now opens to us a new scene. Charles, naturally disgusted with parlament, who, he found, were determined to proceed against him with unfitted rigour, both in invading his prerogative, and refusing all supplies, resolved not to call any more, till he should see greater indication of a compliant disposition in the nation. Having lost his great favourite, Buckingham, he became his own minister; and never afterwards repose in any one such unlimited confidence. As he chiefly follows his own genius and disposition, his measures are henceforward less rash and hasty; though the general tenor of his administration still wants support, his measures being partly legal, and perhaps more of being entirely prudent.

We shall endeavour to exhibit a just idea of the events which followed for some years; so far as they regard foreign affairs, the state of the court, and the government of the nation. The incidents are neither numerous nor illustrious; but the knowledge of them is necessary for understanding the subsequent transactions which are so memorable.

Charles, destitute of all supply, was necessarily reduced to embrace a measure, which ought to have been the result of reason and sound policy: he made peace with the two crowned against which he had hitherto waged a war, entered into without necessity, and conducted without glory.
were overcome by the superior conduct of Gustavus, and the superior valor of the Swedes. What remained of this hero's life was one continued series of victory, for which he was less beholden to fortune, than to the merits which kept him safe in arms and from industry. That rapid progress of conquest, which we so much admire in ancient history, was here renewed in modern annals; and without that cause to which in former ages we are to trace all victory, the martial virtues were not now engaged against an undisarmed and unwarlike people; nor heroes set in opposition to cowards. The veteran troops of Ferdinand, conducted by the most celebrated generals of the age, were, in every encounter, and all Germany was overrun in an instant by the victorious Swede. But by this extraordinary and unexpected success of his ally, Charles failed of the purpose for which he framed the alliance. Gustavus, elated by prosperity, began to form more extensive plans of ambition; and in freeing Germany from the yoke of Ferdinand, he intended to reduce it to subjection under his own. He refused to restore the palatine to his principality, except on conditions which would have kept him in total dependence. And thus the negotiation was protracted; till the battle of Lutter, where the Swedish monarch perished in the midst of an apparent victory which he obtained over his enemy. We have carried on these transactions a few years beyond the present period, that we might not be obliged to return to them; nor be henceforth interrupted in our account of Charles's court and kingdoms. When we consider Charles as presiding in his court, as associating with his family, it is difficult to imagine a character at once more respectable and more amiable. A kind husband, an indulgent father, a gentle master, a steadfast friend; to all these enliges his conduct in private life fully entitled him. As a monarch, too, in the exterior qualities, he excelled to the essential, he was not defective. His address and manner, his sense of the love of parlering the truth, and his respect for his own dignity, his humour, his meekness and formality, in the main corresponded to his high rank, and gave grace to that reserve and gravity which were natural to him. The moderation and equity which shone forth in his temper seemed to secure him a great and dangerous enterprises: the good sense which he displayed in his discourse and conversation, seemed to warrant his success in every reasonable undertaking. Other endowments likewise he had; and perhaps, of his private gentleman, would have been highly ornamental, and which, in a great monarch, might have proved extremely useful to his people. He was possessed of an excellent taste in all the elegance of court life, the love of painting, music, in some degree his favourite passion. Learned beyond what is common in princes, he was a good judge of writing in odiers, and enjoyed, himself, no mean talent in composition. In any other prince, this monarch would have been secure of a prosperous and a happy reign. But the high idea of his own authority which he had imbued, made him incapable of giving way to the spirit of liberty, which began to prevail among his subjects. His politics were not supported by such vigour and foresight as might enable him to subdue their pretensions, and maintain his prerogative at the high pitch to which it had been raised by his predecessors. And, above all, the spirit of enthusiasm being universally diffused, disappointed all the views of human prudence, and disturbed the operation of every motive which usually influences society.

But the misfortunes arising from these causes were yet remote. Charles now enjoyed himself in the full exercise of his authority, in a social intercourse with his friends and courtiers, and in a moderate use of those pleasures which he most affected. Character of the prince. After the death of Buckingham, who had reigned, somewhat alienated Charles from the queen, she is to be considered as his chief friend and favourite. That rustic contempt of the fair sex, which James affected, and which was, on his own part, a very decided trait of his character, made it resemble a little more a fair or an exchange, than the seat of a great prince, was very wide of the disposition of this monarch. But though full of complaisance to the whole sex, Charles reserved all his passion for his consort, to whom he attached himself with unsaken fidelity and confidence. By her sense and spirit, as well as by her beauty, she justified the fondness of her husband; though it is allowed, that, being more polished, studied, and inclined to industry from natural bent, and from industry. That rapid progress of conquest, which we so much admire in ancient history, was here renewed in modern annals; and without that cause to which in former ages we are to trace all victory, the martial virtues were not now engaged against an undisarmed and unwarlike people; nor heroes set in opposition to cowards. And, above all, the spirit of enthusiasm being universally diffused, disappointed all the views of human prudence, and disturbed the operation of every motive which usually influences society.

But the misfortunes arising from these causes were yet remote. Charles now enjoyed himself in the full exercise of his authority, in a social intercourse with his friends and courtiers, and in a moderate use of those pleasures which he most affected. Character of the prince. After the death of Buckingham, who had reigned, somewhat alienated Charles from the queen, she is to be considered as his chief friend and favourite. That rustic contempt of the fair sex, which James affected, and which was, on his own part, a very decided trait of his character, made it resemble a little more a fair or an exchange, than the seat of a great prince, was very wide of the disposition of this monarch. But though full of complaisance to the whole sex, Charles... who embraced his measures, were generally well instructed in sacred antiquity, and had adopted many of those religious edicts which prevailed during the fourth and fifth centuries; when the Christian church, as well known, was already sunk into those superstitions which were afterwards continued and augmented by the policy of Rome. The pious zeal of the sect, with the patience of age, could not fail of giving the English faith and liturgy some resemblance to the catholic superstition, which the kingdom in general, and the puritans in particular, held in the greatest horror and detestation. Men also were apt to think there was but little advantage of the secret method, and that their observances would not be imposed with such unrelenting zeal on the refractory nation; and that Laud’s scheme was to lead back the English by gradual steps to the religion of their ancestors. They considered not, that the very insufficiency of these ceremonies recommended them to the superstitious prelate, and made them appear the more peculiarly sacred and religious, as they could serve to no other purpose. Nor was the re-embellishment to the Romish ritual any objection, but rather a merit, with Laud and his brethren; who bore a much greater kindness to his mother-church, as they called her, than to the sectanes and presbyterians, and frequently recommended her to a true christian appellation; an appellation by the which, they refused, or at least were not scrupled to give them. So openly were these tenets espoused, that not only the discontented puritans believed the church of England to be relapsing fast into Romanism, but they entertained hopes of regaining its authority in this island; and, in order to forward Laud’s supposed good intentions, an offer was twice made him, in private, of a cardinal’s hat, which he declined accepting. The answer was, as he says himself, That something dwell within him, which would not suffer his compliance, till Rome were other than it. A court lady, daughter of the Earl of Devonshire, having turned catholic, was asked by Laud for an act of her conversion. 'Tis chiefly, said she, because I hate to travel in a crowd. The meaning of this expression being demanded, she replied, I perceive your Grace and many others are making haste to Rome; and therefore, in order to prevent my being crowded, I have gone before you. It must be confessed, that though Laud desired not the appellation of papist, the genius of his religion was, though in a less degree, the same with that of the Romish: the same profound respect was exacted to the sacred character, the same submission required to the creeds and decrees of synods and councils, the same pomp and ceremony was affected in worship, and the same superstitious regard to relics, pictures and images. Nor could, therefore, that this prelate was, every where, among the puritans, regarded with horror, as the forerunner of antichrist.

A specimen of the new ceremonies to which Laud sacrificed his own quiet and that of the nation, it may not be amiss to relate those which he was accused of employing in the consecration of St. Catherine’s church, and which were the object of such general scandal and offence. On the bishop’s approach to the west door of the church, a loud voice cried, Open, open, ye everlasting doors, that the King of glory may enter in! Immediately the doors of the church flew open, and the bishop entered. Falling upon his knees, with eyes elevated and arms expanded, he uttered these words: This place is holy; the ground is holy: In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, I pronounce it holy.

Going over to the chancel, he several times took up, from the floor some of the dust, and threw it in the air. When he approached, with his attendants, near to the communion-table, he bowed frequently towards it: and on approaching the church altar, they marched along, some of the psalms: and then said a form of prayer, which concluded with these words: We consecrate this church, and separate unto it as thee holy ground, to be profaned any more to common uses.

After this, turning near the communion-table, solemnly pronounced many imprecations upon such as should afterwards pollute that holy place by musters of soldiers, or keeping in it profane law-courts, or carrying ceremonials of any sort; the bar of the pulpit must be bowed towards the east, and cried, Let all the people say, Amen.

The imprecations being all so piously finished, there were poured out a number of blessings upon such as had any hand in framing and building that sacred and beautiful edifice, and on such as had given, or should hereafter give to it, any chalcges, plate, ornaments, or utensils. At every benediction, he in the same manner bowed towards the east, and cried, Let all the people say, Amen.

The sermon followed; after which, the bishop consecrated and administered the sacrament in the following manner.

As he approached the communion-table, he made many low reverences; and coming up to that part of the table where the bread and wine lay, he bowed seven times. After the reading of many prayers, he approached the sacramental elements, and gently lifted up the corner of the napkin in which the bread was placed. When he held the bread, he suddenly let fall the napkin, flew back a step or two, bowed three several times towards the bread; then he drew nigh again, opened the napkin, and bowed as before.

Next, he laid his hand on the cup, which had a cover upon it, and was filled with wine. He let go the cup, fell back, and bowed three times toward it. He approached again; and lifting up the cover, dipped into the cup. Swearing with a horror, he let fall the cover, started back, and bowed as before. Then he received the sacrament, and gave it to others. And many prayers being said, the solemnity of the consecration ended. The walls and roof of the fabric were then supposed to be sufficiently holy.

Orders were given and rigorously insisted on, that the communion-table should be removed from the middle of the church; or stood in all churches, except in cathedrals. It was placed at the east end, railed in, and denominated an Altar; as the clergyman who officiated received commonly the appellation of Priest. It is not easy to imagine the discontents excited by this innovation, and the suspicions which it gave rise to.

The kneeling at the altar, and the using of copes, a species of embroidered vestment, in administering the sacrament, were also known to be great objects of scandal, as being popish practices; but the opposition rather increased than lessened the zeal of the prelate for the introduction of these habits and ceremonies.

All kinds of ornament, especially pictures, were necessary for supporting that mechanical devotion, which was purposely to be raised in this model of religion: but as these had been so much employed by the church of Rome, and had given rise to so much superstition, or what the puritans called idolatry; it was requisite to import them into English churches, without exciting general murmurs and complaints. But Laud, possessed of present authority, persisted in his purpose, and made several attempts towards acquiring these ornaments. Some of the pictures introduced by him were also found, upon inquiry, to be the very same that might be met with in the missal-book. The crucifix too, that eternal consolation of all pious catholics, and terror of all sound protestants, was not forgotten on this occasion.

It was much remarked, that Sherfield, the recorder of Salisbury, was tried in the star-chamber, for having broken, contrary to the Bishop of Salisbury’s express injunctions, a painted window of St. Edmond’s church in the city. He boasted that he had destroyed these monuments of idolatry: but for this effort of his zeal, he was fined 500 pounds, removed from his office, condemned to make a public acknowledgment, and to be bound to his good behaviour.

Not only such of the clergy as neglected to observe every ceremony, were suspended and deprived by the high commission courts; but many others were heard, by way of excommunication, imposed on the churchwardens; and they were sworn to inform against any one who acted contrary to the ecclesiregular in his expense, he wanted money for the support of government; and he levied it either by the revival of ancient levies, and imposition of new duties, or by loans, and any violations, such as made the crown more disguised, of the privileges of the nation. Though humane and gentle in his temper, he gave way to a few severities in the star-chamber and high commission, which seemed necessary, in order to suppress the practice of certain abuses of law and justice, and represent the rising spirit of liberty throughout the kingdom. Under these two heads may be reduced all the remarkable transactions of this reign, during some years: for, in peaceable and prosperous times, where a revenue was called for, no objections on the part of the crown, nor any thing remarkable, but what is, in some degree, blamed, or blamable. And, lest the hope of relief or protection from parliament might encourage opposition, Charles issued a proclamation, in which he declared, "That whereas, for several ill ends, the calling again of a parliament is divulged; though his majesty has shown, by frequent meetings with his people, his love to the use of parliaments: yet the late abuse having, for the present, driven him unwillingly out of that course; he will account it presumption for any one to prescribe to him any time for the calling of that assembly." This was generally construed as a declaration, that during this reign no more parliaments were intended to be summoned. And, indeed, no more additional impostions were exacted. Even new impostions were laid on several kinds of merchandise.

The custom-house officers received orders from the council to enter into any house, warehouse, or cellar; to search any trunk or chest; and to break any bulk whatever; in default of the payment of customs.

In order to exercise the militia, and to keep them in good order, each county, by an edict of the council, was assessed for the maintenance of a master-master, appointed for that service.

Compositions were openly made with recusants, and the papist religion became a regular part of the revenue. This was all the persecution which it underwent during the reign of Charles.

A commission was granted for compounding with such as were possessed of crown lands upon defective titles; and on this pretence, some money was exacted from the people.

There was a law of Edward II. by which it was required of the clergy and other ecclesiastics, that they should give a declaration of the sums they received from the king, their benefactors, and of all other persons, with the names of the persons. This was a measure which, though it was not strictly enforced, was attended with some inconvenience to the clergy, and obliged them to keep a careful account of all sums received from any person.

The principles which existed at this time were not entertaining of the crown, merely as a support of the government, and they were not put into practice during the time that the crown was receiving money from the people.

she has pierced with her infidelity, superstition, and idolatry. He was questioned in the high-commission court, for this insult on the queen; but, upon his submission, dismissed.\(^8\)

Leighton, who had written libels against the king, the queen, the bishops, and the whole administration, was condemned by a very severe, if not a cruel, sentence; but the deference of officers was allowed for some time, in expectation of his submission.\(^1\) All the severities, indeed, of this reign, were exercised against those who triumphed in their sufferings, who courted persecution, and bracketed ambition with zeal, and piety may be deemed the more just, but the less prudent. To have neglected them entirely, had it been consistent with order and public safety, had been the wisest measure that could have been embraced; as perhaps it had been the most severe punishment that could have been inflicted on these zealots.

In order to gratify the clergy with a magnificent fabric, subscriptions were set on foot, for repairing and rebuilding St. Paul's; and the king, by his counsels and example, encouraged this laudable undertaking.\(^4\) By order of the privy council, St. Gregory's church was removed, as an impediment to the project of extending and beautifying the cathedral. Some houses and shops, likewise, were pulled down, and compensation was made to the owners.\(^5\) As there was no immediate prospect of assembling a parliament, such acts of power in the extremity of his thousands did not occur, and the people have entertained some scruple with regard to them. It must be remarked, that the puritans were extremely averse to the raising of this ornament to the capital. It savoured, as they pretended, of papish superstition.

A stamp duty was imposed on cards: a new tax, which, of itself, was liable to no objection; but appeared of dangerous consequence, when considered as arbitrary and illiberal.

Monopolies were revived; an oppressive method of levying money, being unlimited, as well as destructive of industry. The last parliament of James, which abolished monopolies, had left an equitable exception in favor of new inventions; and on presence of these, and of erecting new companies and corporations, was this grievance now renewed. The manufacture of soap was given to a company who paid a sum for their patent.\(^6\) Leather, salt, and many other commodities, even down to linon rape, were put under restrictions.

It is affirmed by Clarendon, that so little benefit was reaped from these projects, that of 200,000 pounds thereby levied on the people, scarcely 1500 came into the king's coffers. Thouless accused Pope of the inconsideration of exaggerations to the disadvantage of Charles's measures; this fact, it must be owned, appears somewhat incredible. The same author adds, that the king's intention was to tax all ecclesiastics, but was dissuaded from it by the refusal reasonable supplies to the crown. An impudent project to offend a whole nation, under the view of punishment; and to hope, by acts of violence, to break their refractory spirits, without being possessed of any force to prevent resistance.

The council of York had been first erected, after a rebellion, by a patent from Henry VIII. without any authority of parliament; and this exercise of power, like many others, was indulged to that arbitrary monarch. This council had long acted chiefly as a criminal court; but, besides some innovations introduced by James, Charles thought proper, some time after Wentworth was made president, to extend its powers, and to give it a large civil jurisdiction, and that in some respects discretionary.

It is not improbable that the king's intention was only to prevent inconvenient, which arose from the bringing of every cause, from the most distant parts of the kingdom, into Westminster-hall: but the consequence, in the mean time, of this measure, was the putting of all the northern counties out of the protection of ordinary law, and

The court of star-chamber extended its authority; and it was matter of complaint, that it encroached upon the jurisdiction of the other courts; imposing heavy fines and inflicting severe punishment, beyond the usual course of justice. Sir David Foulks fined 1500 pounds, chiefly because he had dissuaded a friend from complying with the commissioners of knighthood.

Prynne, a barrister of Lincoln's-inn, had written an enormous quarto of a thousand pages, which he called

\textit{Hastrum Major.}\n
Its professed purpose was to decry stage-plays, comedies, interludes, music, dancing; but the author himself took occasion to decry against hunting, public festivals, Christmas-keeping, boozing, and maypoles. His zeal against all these levities, he says, was first moved by observing, that plays sold better than the cheapest sermons, and that they were frequently printed on finer paper than the Bible itself. Besides, that the players were often paupers, and desperately wicked; the play-houses, he affirms, are Satan's chapels, the play-actors little better than incarnate devils; and so many steps in a dance, so many pages to a bell. The chief crime of Nero he represents to have been, his frequenting and acting of plays; and those, who nobly conspired his death, were principally moved to it, as he affirms, by their indignation at that enormity. The same author says, it is a like punishment, to burn a book, and to burn the queen.

It was thought somewhat hard, that general invectives against plays should be interpreted into enmity against the king and queen, merely because they were frequented these dissenter sermons, and because the queen sometimes acted a part in pastoral and interludes, which were represented at court. The author, it must be owned, had, in merrier terms, blamed the hierarchy, the censures, the innovations, the immoralities, and the new superstitions, introduced by Laud;\(^7\) and this, probably, together with the obstinacy and petulance of his behaviour before the star-chamber, was the reason why his sentence was so severe. He was condemned to be put to the pillory in two places, Westminster and Cheapside; to lose both his ears, one in each place; to pay 5000 pounds fine to the king; and to be imprisoned during life.

This same Prynne was a great hero among the puritans; and it was chiefly with a view of mortifying that sect, that, though of an honourable profession, he was condemned by the star-chamber to so numerous a punishment. The thorough-paced puritans were disposed to the contempt of all externality, and austerity of their manners, and by their aversion to all pleasure and society. To inspire them with better humour was certainly, both for their own sake and that of the public, a laudable intention on the part of the court; but whether pillories, fines, and prisons, were proper proceedings for that purpose, may admit of some question.

Another expedient which the king tried, in order to impose cheerfulness into the national devotion, was not perhaps more successful. He renewed his father's edict for allowing sports and recreations on Sunday to such as attended public worship; and he ordered his proclamation for that purpose to be publicly read by the clergy after divine service.\(^8\) Those who were puritanically affected refused obedience, and were punished by suspension or deprivation.

The differences between the sects were before sufficiently great; nor was it necessary to widen them further by these inventions.

Some encouragement and protection, which the king and the bishop's gave to wakes, church-ales, brade-ales, and other cheerful festivals of the common people, were the objects of like scandal to the puritans in religious worship.\(^9\)

This year Charles made a journey to Scotland, attended by the court, in order to hold a parliament there, and to pass through the ceremony of his coronation. The nobility and gentry of both kingdoms ravaged each other, in expressing all duty and respect to the king, and in showing mutual friendship and regard to each other. No one could have suspected, from exterior appearances, that such dreadful scenes were approaching. One chief article of business (for it deserves the name) which the king transacted in this parliament, was, besides obtaining some supply, to procure authority for ordering the habits of clergymen. The act did not pass without opposition and difficulty. The dreadful surplus was before men's eyes; and they apprehended, with some reason, that under sanction of this law, it would soon be introduced among them. Though the king believed that his prerogative was superior to all others, he did not think fit to direct; yet every business that belongs to the exterior government of the church, was deemed a matter of too great importance to be ordered without the sanction of a particular statute.

Immediately after the king's return to England, he heard of Archbishop Abbot's death; and, without delay, he conferred that dignity on his favourite, Laud; who, by this accession of authority, was now enabled to maintain ecclesiastical discipline with greater vigour, and to aggraviate the general discontent in the nation. Laud obtained the bishopric of London for his friend Juxon; and, about a year after the death of Sir Richard Weston, created Earl of Portland, had interest enough to engage the king to make that peer his treasurer. He had been a person of great integrity, mildness, and humanity, and ended with a good understanding.Yet did this last promotion give general offence. His birth and character were too obvious to be muzzled; hence to the highest offices of the crown. And the clergy, it was thought, were already too much elated by former instances of the king's attachment to them, and needed not this further encouragement to assume dominion over the clergy. The parliaments, likewise, were much discontented with Juxon, notwithstanding his eminent virtues, because he was a lover of profane fields and hunting. A.D. 1631. Ship-money was now introduced. The ship-money, first writs of this kind had been directed to sea-port towns only; but ship-money was at this time levied on the whole kingdom; and each county was rated at a particular sum, which was afterwards assessed upon individuals. The amount of the whole tax was very moderate, little exceeding 200,000 pounds; it was levied upon the people with equality: the money was entirely expended on the navy, to the great honour and advantage of the kingdom: as England had no military force, while all the rest of Europe was nearly in a state of a fleet seemed absolutely necessary for her security: and it was obvious that a navy must be built and equipped at leisure, during peace; nor could it possibly be fitted out on the sudden, when the enemy became urgent. Yet all these considerations could not reconcile the people to the imposition. It was entirely arbitrary: by the same right any other tax might be imposed: and men thought a powerftul fleet, though very desirable both for the credit and safety of the kingdom, but an unequal recompense for their liberties, which, they apprehended, were thus sacrificed to the obtaining of it.

England, it must be owned, was, in this respect, unhappy in its present situation, that the king had entered a very different idea of the constitution, from that which began in general to prevail among his subjects. He did not regard national privileges as sacred and inviolable, that nothing but the most extreme necessity could justify an infringement of them. He considered himself as the supreme magistrate, to whose care Heaven, by his birthright, had committed his people, whose duty it was to provide for their security and happiness, and who was vested with ample discretionary powers for that salutary purpose. If the observance of ancient laws and customs was consistent with the present convenience of government, he thought himself obliged to comply with that rule; as the easiest, the safest, and what proceeded the most probably from wise and well-considered nature; when the character of circumstances, especially if derived from the obstinance of the people, required a new plan of administration, national privileges, he thought, must yield to supreme power; nor could any offer of the state oppose any right to the will of the sovereign, directed to the good of the public. That these principles of government were derived from the uniform tenor of the English laws, it would be rash to deny; but admitting them, and taking into consideration, the impatient humour of the people, and the variety of events, had, no doubt, in different ages, produced exceptions and contradictions. These observations alone may be established on both sides, that the appearances were sufficiently strong in favour of the king to apologizse for his following such maxims; and that public liberty must be so precarious under this exorbitant prerogative, as to render an opposition not only excusable, but laudable, in the people.

Some laws had been enacted during the reign of Henry VIII. against depopulation, or the converting of arable lands into pasture. By a decree of the star-chamber, Sir Anthony, did not quite lose the taint of that office. This severe sentence was intended to terrify others into composition; and above 30,000 pounds were levied by that expedient. Like compositions, or, in default, fine or imprisonment, for not supporting the government on the king's forests; whose bounds, by decrees deemed arbitrary, were extended much beyond what was usual! The bounds of one forest, that of Rockingham, were increased from six miles to sixty. The same repressive law, which made the people liable to the king voluntary supplies, disposed them with better reason to murmur against these irregular methods of taxation.

Morley was fined 10,000 pounds for reviling, challenging, and striking, in the court of Whitbyhall, Sir George Toulao, one of the king's servants. This fine was thought exorbitant; but whether it was compounded, as was usual in fines imposed by the star-chamber, we are not informed.

Allison had reported, that the Archbishop of York had incurred the king's displeasure, by asking a limited toleration for the catholics, and an allowance to build some churches for the exercise of their religion. For this slander and unjust, though strongly urged, his pretence, the star-chamber to be fined 1000 pounds, to be committed to prison, to be bound in his good behaviour during life, to be whipped, and to be set on the pillory, at Westminster, and to suffer eloquence, which the king had been an accompani in the guilt, was condemned by a sentence equally severe. Such events are rather to be considered as rare and detached incidents, collected by the severe scrutiny of historians, than as proofs of the prevailing genius of the king's administration, which seems to have been more gentle and equitable than that of most of his predecessors: there were, on the whole, only five or six such instances of rigor during the course of fifteen years, which elapsed before the meeting of the long parliament. And it is also certain, that scandal against the great, though seldom prosecuted at present, is, in the eye of the law, a great crime, and subjects the offender to very heavy penalties.

There are other instances of the high respect paid to the nobility and to the great in that age; when the powers of monarchy, though disputed, still maintained themselves in their pristine vigour. Clarendon tells us a pleasant story, yet if the Plaisantes come, that is, if any just or important occasion come in, it must be held or restrained here, the king and the court must be and broken as easy as the bounds of Somerset. The king's prerogatives are not to be contended with, nor can any man, without committing impious treasons, withstand them. He gives authority from the same: the king's crown must be taken from him. Somerset's hair must be cut off, before his visage can be any sat at. Hence it is, that neither the king's act, nor any act of parliament, can give away his prerogatives."

that receptacle of pirates, by whom the English commerce, and even the English coasts, had long been infested.

Burton, a divine, and Bustwick, a physician, A.D. 1657, were tried in the star-chamber for seditions and schismatical labels, and were condemned to the same punishment that had been inflicted on Tyne.

Tyne himself was tried for a new offence; and, together with another fine of 5000 pounds, was condemned to lose that remained of his ears. Besides that these writers had been attacked with greater severity, and the ceremonial, rites, and government of the church, the very answers which they gave in to the court were so full of contumacy and of invectives against the prelates, that they were unanswerable. Though various attempts were made, however, which they underwent, being so unworthy men of their profession, gave general offence; and the patience, or rather alacrity, with which they suffered, increased still further the indignation of the public. The severity of the star-chamber, which was generally ascribed to Laud’s passionate disposition, was, perhaps, in itself somewhat miserable; but it will naturally to us appear enormous, who enjoy, in the utmost latitude, that liberty of the press, which is esteemed so necessary in every monarchy confined by strict legal limitations. But as these limitations were not regularly fixed during the age of Charles, nor at any time before; so was this liberty totally unnecessary, and, as it is now, was it so calculated for the increase of that liberty, which is incompatible with all good government. No age or nation, among the moderns, had ever set an example of such an indulgence: and it seems unreasonable to judge the measure of the preservation of the nation during one period, by the maxims which prevail in another.

Burton, in his book where he complained of innovations, mentioned among others, that a certain Wednesday had been appointed by his majesty to be celebrated without any sermon. The intention, as it was pretended, of that novelty was, by the example of a fast without sermon, to suppress all the Wednesday lectures in London. It is observable, that the church of Rome and that of England, being both of them lovers of form and ceremony and order, are more friends to prayer than preaching; while the puritanical sectaries, who find that the latter method of address, being directed to a numerous audience present and visible, is more moving and animating, have always regarded it as the chief part of divine service. Such circumstances, though minute, it may not be improper to transmit to posterity; that those who are curious of tracing the history of the human mind may remark how far its several singularities coincide in different ages.

Certain zealots bad erected themselves into a society for buying in of impropriations, and transgressions thereof to the church: and great sums of money have been bestowed on the society for these purposes. But it was soon observed, that the only use which they made of their funds, was to establish lecturers in all the considerable churches; men, who, without being subjected to episcopal authority, employed themselves entirely in preaching and spreading the fire of puritanism. Laud took care, by a decree which was passed in the court of exchequer, and which was much complained of, to abolish this society, and to stop their progress. It was however, still observed, that throughout England the lecturers were all of them puritanically affected; and from them the elogymen, who were the Earl of Northumberland, lord of manors, and of the people, commonly received the reproachful appellation of dumb dogs.

The puritans, restricted in England, shipped themselves off for America, and laid there the foundations of a government which possessed all the liberty, both civil and religious, of which they found themselves bereaved in their native country. But their enemies, unwilling that they should any where enjoy ease and contentment, and dreaded perhaps the dangerous consequences of so persecuted a people, laid in the hands of the legislature, power of making laws for extinguishing the pure and simple forms of religion; and instead thereof, they exclaimed against the indiscriminate exercise of the civil and ecclesiastical power.

This year the king sent a squadron against Salié; and with the assistance of the Emperor of Morocco, destroyed the chief town of the Barbary pirates.
colon, prevailed on the king to issue a proclamation, de-barring these devotees access even into these inhospitable deserts. Eight ships, lying in the Thames, and ready to sail, were detained by order of the council; and in these were embarked Sir Arthur Hazleig, John Hambleden, John Pym, and Oliver Cromwell, who had resolved for ever to abandon their native country, and fly to the other extremity of the globe; where might they enjoy lectures and discourses of any length or form which pleased them.
The king had deserted full leisure to return the exercise of his authority.

The Bishop of Norwich, by rigorously insisting on uniformity, had banished many industrious tradesmen from this city, and forced them into exile. The Duke of Grafton began to be more intent on commerce than on orthodoxy; and thought that the knowledge of useful arts and obedience to the laws formed a good citizen; though attended with errors in subjects where it is not allowable for human nature to expect any positive truth or certainty.

Complaints about this time were made, that the petition of right was, in some instances, violated, and that, upon a commencement by the king and council, bail or release had been refused to Jennings, Partridge, and Danvers.

Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, a man of spirit and learning, a popular prelate, and who had been lord-keeper, was found guilty by the star-chamber, committed to the Tower during the king’s pleasure, and suspended from his office. This severe sentence was founded on favor-ables pretences, and was more ascribable to Lord’s vengenance, than to any guilt of the bishop. Land, however, left the court the next day, and promised to the king the good offices of the prelate with King James. But so implacesable was the haughty prelate, that he raised up a new prosecution against Williams, on the strongest pretence imaginable.
In order to effect the same, he also mentioned, some officers had been sent to seize all the furniture and books of his episcopal palace of Lincoln; and in rummaging the house, they found in a corner some neglected letters, which had been thrown away by the bishop. These, two or three were written to one Oxshaldstone, a schoolmaster, and were directed to Williams. Mention was there made of a little great man; and in another passage, the same person was denominated a little great man. By assurances and constructions, these epithets were applied to Laud; and on no better foundation was Williams tried anew, as having received scandalous letters, and not discovering that private correspondence. For this the fine of 8000 pounds was levied on him: Oxshaldstone was likewise brought to trial, and condemned to pay a fine of 5000 pounds, and to have his ears nailed to the pillory before his own school. He saved himself by flight; and left a note in his study, where he said, "Thus he was gone beyond Canterbury." 8

These proceedings of Williams seem to have been the most iniquitous measure pursued by the court during the time that the use of parliaments was suspended. Williams had been indicted for all his fortune to the favour of James; but having quarrelled, first with Buckingham, then with Laud, and then with Hambleden, he threw himself into the country day; and with great firmness and vigour opposed all the measures of the king. A creature of the court to become its obstinate enemy, a bishop to countenance puritans; these circumstances excited indignation, and engaged the masters in those securer measures. Williams had been so wanton in his attacks, and so refractory a spirit must by any expedient be broken and subdued. In a former trial which Williams underwent, 9 (for these were not the first,) there was mentioned, in court, a story which, as it discovers the genius of parties, may be worth recalling. Sir John Langley came to him to prosecute the puritans, the prelate asked, what sort of people some puritans were? Sir John replied, "that to the world they seemed to be such as would not swear, whore, or be drunken; but they would be, cozen, and deceive; that they would frequently hear two sermons a-day, and repeat them too, and that sometimes they would fast all day long." The character must be conceived to be satirical; yet it may be allowed, that that sect was more averse to such irrefragables as proceed from the excess of gaudy and pleasure, than to those enormities which call the most destructive to any church. The prelate were opposed to the very genus and spirit of their religion; the latter were only a transgression of its precepts; and it was not difficult for a gloomy enthusiast to convince himself, that a strict observer of the one would alone for any violation of the other.

In 1632, the treasurer, Portland, had insisted with the vintners, that they should submit to a tax of a penny a quart upon all the wine which they retailed. But they rejected the demand. In order to punish them, a decree suddenly, without much inquiry or examination, passed in the star-chamber, prohibiting them to sell or dress virtuals in their houses. 10 Two years after they were questioned for the breach of this decree; and in order to avoid punishment, they agreed to lend the king six thousand pounds. Being threatened, during the subsequent years, with further prosecutions, and with further demands, they had to submit to pay half of that doty which was at first demanded of them. 11 It required little foresight to perceive that the king’s right of issuing proclamations must, if prosecuted, draw on a power of taxation.

Liberals and puritans preserved their number of publishing and dispersing sedition pamphlets. He was ordered to be examined; but refused to take the oath usual in that court, that he would answer interrogatories, even though they might lead him to accuse himself. For the very contempt, as it was interpreted, he was condemned to be whipped, pilloried, and imprisoned. While he was whipped at the cart, and stood on the pillory, he harangued the populace; but it was about as effectually as the preaching of bishops. From his pockets also be scattered pamphlets, said to be sedition; because they attacked the hierarchy.
The star-chamber, which was sitting at that very time, ordered him immediately to be gaged. He ceased not however, though both gagged and pilloried, to stamp with his foot and gesticulate, in order to show the people, that, if he had it in his power, he would still harangue them.
This his favour gave fresh provocation to the star-chamber;
and they sentenced him to be imprisoned two years, and to be loaded with irons. 12 It was found difficult to break the spirits of men who placed both their honour and their conscience in suffering.

The trial of the church appeared in another instance less tragic. Archy, the king’s fool, who by his office had the privilege of jesting on his master, and the whole court, happened unluckily to try his wit upon Laud, who was too exacting to be offended. For having arrived from Scotland of the first communications excited by the liturgy, Archy, seeing the primative pass by, called to him, Who’s fool now, my lord? For this offence Archy was ordered, by sentence of the council, to have his coat pulled over his head, and to be dismissed the king’s service.

Here is another instance of that rigorous subjection in which the court was held by the king. A number of men of Lincoln’s-on, headed by their captains, having drank drunken confusion to the archbishop, were, at his instigation, cited before the star-chamber. They applied to the Earl of Dorset for protection against being summoned. Sir John Dorset, one of the drawers, said, Dorset. One of the drawers, they said. Where did he stand, when you were supposed to drink this health? unjoined the earl. He was at the door; they replied, going out of the room. *Tha’s he cried, the drawer was mistaken: You are mistaken. You called me to associate myself among the enemies; and the fellow was gone before you pronounced the last word. This hint supplied the young gentlemen with a new method of defence: and being advised by Dorset to behave with great humility and great submission to the privy; the modesty of their carriage, the ignominy of their apology, with the patronage of noble lord, saved them from any severer punishment than a reproof and admonition, with which they were dismissed.

This year John Hampden acquired, by his obstinacy, almost entire disapprobation of the commonwealth, throughout the nation, and has merited great renoun with posterity, for the bold stand which he made in defence of the laws and liberties of his country. After the imposing of such a fine from a power of the nation, and of the crown, as it had proposed this question to the judges: "Whether in a case of necessity, for the defence of the kingdom, he might not impose this taxation; and whether he were not sole judge of the necessity? These guardians of law and liberty replied, with great complacency, "That in a case of necessity he might impose this taxation, and that he was sole judge of the necessity." Hampden had been rated at twenty shillings, for an estate which he possessed in the county of Buckingham: yet, notwithstanding this declared opinion of the judges, notwithstanding the great power and sometimes rigorous maxims of the crown, notwithstanding the small prospect of relief from parliament; he was taxed, rather than to chance to an illegal impost, to stand a legal prosecution, and expose himself to all the indignation of the court. The case was argued during twelve days in the exchequer-chamber, between Mr. Justice Jeffreys and Mr. Justice Alderson, with the utmost anxiety, every circumstance of this celebrated trial. The event was easily foreseen: but the principles, and reasonings, and behaviour of the parties engaged in the trial, were much examined and improved into the law and equity of the case, so that paid to the one side, except the hatred which attended the other. It was urged by Hampden's counsel, and by his partisans in the nation, that the plea of necessity was in vain imposed on the law, because the very plea of necessity to abolish all law, and, by irresistible violence, to dissolve all the weaker and more artificial ties of human society. Not only the prince, in cases of extreme distress, is exempted from the ordinary rules of administration; all orders of men are then levied; and any individual may consult the public safety by any expedient which his situation enables him to employ. But to produce so violent an effect, and so hazardous to every community, an overstart, in the assumption of a necessity which is merely fictitious and pretended. Where the peril is urgent and extreme, it will be palatable to every member of the society; and though all ancient rules and customs were exposed, as well as men were, men were ready, of themselves, to submit to that irregular authority, which is exerted for their preservation. But what is there in common between such suppositions, and the present condition of the nation? England enjoys a profound peace with all her neighbours: and what is more, all her neighbours are engaged in furious and bloody wars among themselves, and by their mutual enmities further insure their tranquillity. The very writs themselves, which are issued for the levying of ship-money, contradict the supposition of necessity, and pretend only that the seas are infested with pirates; a slight and temporary inconvenience, which may well await a legal supply from parliament. The exchequer-chamber is a court of admiralty; which proves a very calm and deliberate species of necessity, and one that admits of delay much beyond the forty days requisite for summoning that assembly. It is strange too, that an extreme necessity which is always apparent, and usually comes to a sudden crisis, should now have continued, without intermission, for near four years, and should have remained, during so long a time, invisible to the king and the crown. After all, that the king is sole judge of the necessity: what is this but to subject all the privileges of the nation to his arbitrary will and pleasure? To expect that the public will be convinced by such reasoning, must aggravate the general indignation; and to have recourse against such persons and their property, so cruel a mockery of their understanding.

In vain are precedents of ancient writs produced: these writs, when examined, are only found to require the securities of the commonwealth, the security of the crown, and the charge of the counties, to send their ships for the defence of the nation. Even the prerogative, which empowered the crown to issue such writs, is abolished, and its exercise made subservient to the demands of the commonwealth, and all the authority which remained, or was afterwards exercised, was to press ships into the public service, to be paid for by the public. How wide are these precedents and these writs? How is the king to levies into the public service, to build new ships, to victual and pay them, for the public: nay, to furnish money to the crown for that purpose? What security either against the further extension of this claim, or against diverting to other purposes the public money so levied? The plea of necessity would warrant any other taxation as well as that of ship-money: whenever any difficulty shall occur, the administration, instead of endeavouring to elude or overcome it by gentle and prudent measures, will instantly represent it as a reason for infringing all ancient laws and institutions: and if such maxims and such practices prevail, what has become of national liberty? What authority is left to the great body of the nation, and to that very petition of right, which, in the present reign, had been so solemnly enacted by the concurrence of the whole legislature?

The defenceless condition of the kingdom while unprotected with an adequate and secure revenue, established revenues, with the utmost care and frugality, to equip and maintain one; the impossibility of obtaining, on reasonable terms, any voluntary supply from parliament: all these are reasons of state, not topics of law. If these reasons support the king so far as to dispense with the legal rules of government; let him enforce his edicts by his court of star-chamber, the proper instrument of irregular and absolute power; not prostitute the chartered authority of the nation's parliament converted into an instrument of arbitrary and despotic power. If he has none other than this authority, he can have none other than that authority.

Notwithstanding these reasons, the prejudiced judges, fourscore excepted, gave sentence in favour of the crown. He paid the tax, but he was not convinced: for he, which he had so generously sacrificed his safety and his quiet: the people were roused from their lethargy, and became sensible of the dangers to which their liberties were exposed. All the individual and general questions were agitated in every company; and the more they were examined, the more evidently it did appear to many, that liberty was totally subverted, and an unusual and arbitrary authority exercised over the kingdom. Slavish principles, they said, concur with illegal practices; ecclesiastical tyranny gives aid to civil usurpation; iniquitous taxes are supported by arbitrary punishments; and all the privileges of the nation, transmitted through so many ages, secured by so many laws, and purchased by the blood of so many heroes and patriots, now lie prostrate at the feet of the monarch. What though public peace and national industry increased the commerce and opulence of the kingdom? This advantage was temporary. The pasture was not sufficient to supply the shipping: which proves a very calm and deliberate species of necessity, and one that admits of delay much beyond the forty days requisite for summoning that assembly. It is strange too, that an extreme necessity which is always apparent, and usually comes to a sudden crisis, should now have continued, without intermission, for near four years, and should have remained, during so long a time, invisible to the king and the crown. After all, that the king is sole judge of the necessity: what is this but to subject all the privileges of the nation to his arbitrary will and pleasure? To expect that the public will be convinced by such reasoning, must aggravate the general indignation; and to have recourse against such persons and their property, so cruel a mockery of their understanding.

oppressions which they felt, or the greater ills which they apprehended, from the combined encroachments of church and state.

CHAP. LIII.

A D. 1674.

The grievances under which the English labour'd, when considered in themselves, without regard to the constitution, scarce deserve the name; nor were they either burdensome on the people's properties, or any way shocking to the natural humanity of mankind. Even the imposition of ship-money, independent of the consequences, was a great and evident advantage to the public, by the judicious use which the king made of the money levied by that expedient. And though it was justly apprehended, that such precedents, if patient'y submitted to, would end in a total disuse of parliaments, and in the establishment of arbitrary authority; Charles dreaded the imposition of it, not common'y much affected with consequences, and require some striking motive to engage them in a resistance of established government. All ecclesiastical affairs were settled by law and uninterrapted precedent; and the church became a considerable barrier to the power, both legal and illegal, of the crown. Peace too, industry, commerce, opulence; nay, even justice and lenity of administration, notwithstanding some very few exceptions; all these were enjoyed by the people; and every other blessing of government, except liberty, or rather the present exercise of liberty and its proper security. It seemed probable, therefore, that affairs might have continued on the same footing in England had it not been for the neighbourhood of Scotland; a country more turbulent, and less disposed to submission and obedience. It was thence that the discontent first arose; and it is therefore time for us to return thither, and to give an account of the state of affairs in that kingdom.

Discontents in Scotland.

Though the pacific and not unskilful government of James, and the great authority which he had acquired, had much allayed the feuds among the great families, and had established law and order throughout the kingdom; the Scottish nobility were still possessed of the chief power and influence over the people, the property was excepted from the jurisdictions and the feudal tenures increased their authority; and the attachment of the gentry to the heads of families established a kind of voluntary servitude under their chief. Besides that lordship had much loosened the king's connexions with the nobility, who resided chiefly at their country seats, they were in general at this time, though from slight causes, much dissatisfied with the court. Charles, from the natural piety or superstition of his temper, was extremely attached to the ecclesiastics; and as it is natural for men to persuade themselves that their interest coincides with their inclination; he had established it as a fixed maxim of policy, to increase the power and authority of that body. The prelates he thought, established regularity and discipline among the clergy; the clergy inculcated obedience and loyalty among the people: and as that rank of men had no separate authority, and no independency but on the crown; the royal power, it would seem, might, with the greater safety, be intrusted in their hands. Many of the prelates, therefore, were raised to the chief dignities of the state. Spotswood, Archbishop of St. Andrews, was created chancellor; nine of the bishops were privy counsellors: the Bishop of Ross aspired to the office of treasurer; some of the prelates possessed places in the exchequer; and it was even entertained to revive the first institution of the college of justice, and to share equally between the clergy and laity the whole judicial authority. These advantages possessed by the church, and which the bishops did not always enjoy with suitable modesty, disgusted the haughty nobility, who, desiring themselves much secure of their property, and qualities to this new order of men, were disinclined to find themselves inferior in power and influence. Interest joined itself to ambition, and begat a jealousy, lest the episcopal sees, which, at the Reformation, had been piled to the bishops, should again assume the precedence of that order. By a most useful and beneficial law, the impropriations had already been ravished from the great men; competent salaries had been assigned to the impoverished clergy from the national estate; and what remained, the proprietor of the land was empowered to purchase at a low valuation. The king likewise, warranted by ancient law and practice, had declared for a general resurrection of all crown lands, alienated by his predecessors; and though he took no step towards the execution of this project, the very pretension to such power had excited jealousy and discontent.

Notwithstanding the tender regard which Charles bore to the whole church, he had been able in Scotland, to acquire only the affection of the superior rank among the clergy. The ministers in general equals, if not exceeding, the nobility, in their prejudices against the court, traitors against the people, whose independence, and connexions with each other, resulted from the want of unity; though the establishment of the hierarchy might seem advantages to the inferior clergy, both as it erected dignities to which all of them might aspire, and as it bestowed a lustre on the whole order. This body, however, was not in the way; these views had no influence on the Scottish ecclesiastics.

In the present disposition of men's minds, there was another circumstance which drew consideration, and counterbalanced power and riches, the equal foundations of distinction among men; and that was, the fervour of piety, and the rhetoric, however barbarous, of religious lectures and discourses. Checked by the prelates in the licence of speaking, the disputation regarding episcopal jurisdiction both as tyranny and a usurpation, and maintained a purity among ecclesiastics to be a divine privilege, which no human law could alter or infringe. While such ideas prevailed, the most moderate exercise of authority would have given disgust; much more, that extensive power, which the king's indulgence encouraged the prelates to assume. The jurisdiction of presbyters, synods, and other democratical courts, was, in a manner, abolished by the bishops; and the general assembly itself had not been summoned for several years. A new oath was arbitrarily imposed on intrants, by which they swore to observe the articles of Perth, and submit to the liturgy and canons. And in a state of things, in which persons, during a course of thirty years, had been changed by means of the innovations introduced by James and Charles.

The people, under the influence of the nobility and clergy, could not but be discontented with the prelates who prevailed among these two orders; and where real grounds of complaint were wanting, they greedily laid hold of imaginary ones. The same horror against popery, with which the English puritans were possessed, was observable among the populace in Scotland; and among these, as being more uncultivated and uncivilized, seemed rather to be inflamed to a higher degree of ferocity. The genius of religion, which prevailed in the court and among the prelates, was a great obstacle to an opposite plan of government, and such affinity to the Roman worship, led them to mollify, as much as possible, these severe prejudices, and to speak of the catholics to more charitable language, and with more moderate expressions. From the great fear of popery was easily raised; and every new ceremony or ornament, introduced into divine service, was part of that great mystery of iniquity, which, from the encouragement of the court and the bishops, was extended to the nation.

The few innovations, which James had made, were considered as preparatives to this grand design; and the further alterations attempted by Charles, were represented as a plain declaration of his intentions. Through the whole course of this reign, nothing had more foul influence, in both kingdoms, than this groundless apprehension, which with so much industry was propagated, and with so much credulity was embraced, by all ranks of men.

Amidst these dangerous complaints and terrors of religious innovation, the civil and ecclesiastical liberties of the nation were imagined, and with some reason, not to be altogether free from invasion. The examination of the high commission by James, without any authority of law, seemed a considerable encroachment of the crown, and erected the most dangerous and arbitrary of all courts, by a method equally dangerous and arbitrary. All the steps towards the settlement of episcopacy had indeed been taken with consent of parliament: the articles of Perth were confirmed in 1621; in 1633, the king had obtained a general ratification of every ecclesiastical establishment; but these laws had less authority with the nation, as they were known to have passed contrary to the sentiments even of those who voted for them, and were in reality extorted by the authority and importunity of the sovereign. The means, however, which both James and Charles had employed, in order to reinforce the parliament, were entirely regular; and no reasonable pretence had been afforded for representing these laws as null or invalid.

But the most dreaded among the greater part of the nation another principle, of the most important and most dangerous nature, and which, if admitted, destroyed entirely the validity of all such statutes. The ecclesiastical authority was supposed to be finally independent, and no act of parliament, nothing but the consent of the church itself, was represented as sufficient ground for the introduction of any change in religious worship or discipline. And though James had obtained the vote of assemblies for receiving episcopacy and his new rites, it must be confessed that such irregularities had prevailed in constituting these ecclesiastical courts, and such violence in conducting them, that there were some grounds for denying the authority of the Supreme Head. The least consent, attended with such invidious circumstances, would rather be prejudicial to his measures, had wholly laid aside the use of assemblies, and was resolved, in conjunction with the bishops, to govern the church by an authority, to which he thought himself fully entitled, and which he believed inherent in the crown.

The king's great aim was to complete the work so happily begun by his father; to establish discipline upon a regular system of canons, to introduce a liturgy into public worship, and to render the ecclesiastical government of all his kingdoms regular and uniform. Some views of policy were imposed upon it by the most urgent motives, which were derived from principles of zeal and consequence.

Introduction of the canons and jurisdiction were promulgated in 1635; and liturgy was received by the nation, though without much appearing opposition, yet with great inward apprehension and discontent. Men felt displeasure at seeing the royal authority highly exalted by them, and represented as absolute and uncontrollable. They saw these speculative principles reduced to practice, and a whole body of ecclesiastical laws established without any previous consent either of church or state. They dreaded lest, by a parity of reason, like arbitrary authority, from like premises and principles be assumed in civil matters; and, indeed, they remarked, that the delicate boundaries which separate church and state were already passed, and many civil ordinances established by the canons, under colour of ecclesiastical authority, might be assumed in civil matters; and all negligence with which these important edicts had been compiled, when they found that the new liturgy or service-book was everywhere, under severe penalties, enjoined by them, though it had not yet been composed or published, brought upon them, and the very reception of it, as the people are most affected by what is external and exposed to the senses, it was apprehended that the chief difficulty would consist.

The liturgy which the king, from his own authority, imposed on Scotland, was copied from that of England: but lest a servile imitation might shock the pride of his ancient kingdom, a few alterations, in order to save appearances, were made in it; and in that shape it was transmitted to the bishops at Edinburgh.1 But the Scots had universally entertained a notion, that though riches and worldly glory had been shared out to them with a bountering hand, they still retained their spirit, and a more abundant and more genuine than were enjoyed by any nation under heaven. Even their southern neighbours, they thought, though separated from Rome, still retained that great tincture of piety, and, their liturgy was represented as a species of mass, though with some less show and embroidery. Great prejudices, therefore, were entertained against it, even considered in itself; much more when regarded as a preparative, which was soon to introduce into Scotland all the abominations of popery. And as the very few alternations which distinguished the new liturgy from the English, seemed to approach nearer to the doctrine of the real presence; this circumstance was deemed an undoubted confirmation of every suspicion with which the people were possessed.2

Easter-day was, by proclamation, appointed for the first reading of the service in Edinburgh: but in order to judge more surely of men's sentiments, the copies of these services were not delivered till the 23rd of July; and they even gave notice, the Sunday before, of their intention to commence the use of the new liturgy. As no considerable symptoms of discontent were apprehended, the privy-council, being present. But no sooner had the dean opened the book, than a multitude of the nearest sort, most of them women, clapping their hands, cursing, and crying out, A pope! a pope! anticleric! stone him! raised such a tumult, that it was impossible to proceed with the service, much less to separate the popish from the church building in order to appease the populace, had a stool thrown at him: the council was insulted: and it was with difficulty that the magistrates were able, partly by authority, partly by force, to expel the rabble, and thus the doors against them. The tumult, however, still continued without: stones were thrown at the doors and windows: and when the service was ended, the bishop, gorgeously, was attacked, and narrowly escaped from the hands of the enraged multitude. In the afternoon, the privy-seal, because he carried the bishop in his coach, was so pelted with stones, and hooted at with execrations, and reviled by the populace, that his servants, with drawn swords, had not kept them off, the bishop's life had been exposed to the utmost danger.

Though it was violently suspected, that the low populace, who alone appeared, had been instigated by some of higher condition, yet no proof of it could be produced; and every one spoke with disapprobation of the licentiousness of the giddy multitude. It was not thought safe, however, to hazard a new insult with any new attempt to read the liturgy; and the people seemed, for the time, to be appeased and satisfied. But it being known that the king still persevered in his intentions of imposing that mode of worship, men fortified themselves still further in their prejudices against it; and great multitudes resolved to come to Edinburg, in order to oppose the introduction of so hated a novelty.3 It was not long before they broke out in the most violent disorder. The Bishop of Galloway was attacked in their chariot, and the chamber where the privy-council was sitting. The council itself was besieged and violently attacked: the town-council met with the same fate: and nothing could have saved the lives of all of them, but their flight to the castle, which at last, after some confused confusion and dispersed the multitude. In this sedition, the actors were of some better condition than in the former; though nobody of rank seemed, as yet, to countenance them.4

All men, however, began to unite and to encourage each other, in opposition to the religious innovations introduced into the kingdom. Petitions to the council were signed and presented by persons of the highest quality: the women took part, and, as was usual, with violence: the clergy, everywhere, loudly declaimed against popery and the liturgy, which they represented as the same. The pulpit resounded with vehement invectives against antichrist; and the population, who for the first time witnessed what was termed a papist in Balhame's arms, united in itself stupid and senseless, but whose mouth had been opened by the Lord, to the admiration of the whole world.1 In short, whatever mingling with faction, private interest with the state, liberty, sympathy, or party, on all hands was abandoned to the most dangerous insurrection and disorder.
